Mistakes in the name or description of legatees may be corrected whenever it can be clearly shown by the will itself what was intended; 10 Hare 345; 8 Md. 496; 15 N. H. 817; 4 Johns. Ch. 607; 23 Vt. 336; 7 Ired. Eq. 201; 15 Gray 347; 59 N. Y. 441; L. R. 10 Eq. 29.

The only instances in which parol evidence is admissible to show the intention of the testator as to a legatee imperfectly described, is that of a strict equivocation; that is, where it appears from extraneous evidence that two or more persons answer the description in the will; 5 M. & W. 303; L. R. 2 P. & D. 8; L. R. 11 Eq. Cas. 578; 15 N. H. 330; 49 Me. 288; 24 Pa. 199; 59 N. Y. 441; 183 U. S. 210; see 120 id. 586; and to explain names in the will, which the testator has used and which are peculiar or incomprehensible owing to testator's idiosyncrasies or other reasons; 2 P. Wms. 141; 4 Johns. Ch. 607; 5 H. L. Cas. 168. See 50 N. J. Eq. 554. Extrinsic evidence is admissible to remove latent ambiguity in a will; but as to the character and extent of such evidence see LATENT AMBIGUITY.

By statute in Massachusetts legacies may be distributed by order of court to such persons as seem indicated by will. Laws 1895, ch. 184.

Interest of legatee. Property given specifically to one for life, and remainder over, must be enjoyed specifically during the life of the first donee, although that may exhaust it; 4 Myl. & Cr. 299; 2 Myl. & K. 703; L. R. 11 Eq. 80; 45 N. H. 261; 6 Gill & J. 171; 17 S. & R. 293; 2 Md. Ch. 190. But where the bequest is not specific, as where personal property is limited to one for life, remainder over, it is presumed that the testator intended the same property to go over, and if any portion of it be perishable, it shall be sold and converted into permanent property, for the benefit of all concerned; 2 Myl. & K. 699; 7 Ves. 187; 4 Myl. & C. 296; L. R. 4 Eq. Cas. 295. See 76 Iowa 836.

In personal property there cannot be a remainder in the strict sense of the word, and therefore every future bequest of personal property, whether it be preceded or not by any particular bequest, or limited on a certain or uncertain event, is properly an executory bequest, and falls under the rules by which that mode of limitation is regulated; Fearn, Cont. Rem. 401, n. An executory bequest cannot be prevented or destroyed by any alteration whatsoever in the estate, out of which or after which it is limited; 8 Co. 96 a; 10 id. 476. And this privilege of executory bequests, which exempt them from being barred or destroyed, is the foundation of an invariable rule, that the event on which a limitation of this sort is permitted to take effect must be such that the estate will necessarily vest in interest from the time of its creation within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years thereafter and the fraction of another year, allowing for the period of gestation, afterwards; Fearn, Cont. Rem. 431.

Where the legacy is payable at a future time a question often arises as to when the legacy vests. The rule seems to be that if a legacy is payable or to be paid at a future time, then a vested interest is conferred on the legatee ex instanti the testator dies, transmissible to his executors or administrators; 31 Beav. 435; 44 N. H. 281; 1 Ves. 217; 2 Sim. & S. 505; 48 Me. 257; 9 Cush. 516; 2 Edw. Ch. 156. But if it be payable at, if, when, in case, or provided a certain time comes or contingency arrives, then the legatee's right depends upon his being alive at the time fixed for payment; 62 Me. 449; 37 Pa. 105; 3 R. I. 226; 106 Mass. 28; 4 Dana 572; 5 Beav. 391. For exceptions to this rule see 2 Will. Ex. 1224.

No particular form of words is requisite to constitute one a residuary legatee. It must appear to be the intention of the testator that he shall take the residue of the estate, after paying debts and meeting all other appointments of the will; 2 Jac. & W. 399; 44 N. H. 235; 9 Leigh 361; 40 Conn. 264. The right of the executor to the residue of the estate when there is no residuary legatee is well established, both at law and in equity, in England, except so far as it is controlled by statute; 2 P. Wms. 340; 3 Atk. 228; 7 Ves. 288; but the rule has been controlled in equity by aid of slight presumptions in favor of the next of kin; 1 Bro. C. C. 201; 14 Sim. 8, 12; 2 Sm. & G. 241; 14 Ves. 197; and is now altered by stat. 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 40. The rule never obtained in this country, it is believed, to such a great extent; 3 Binn. 557; 9 S. & R. 424; 6 Mass. 153; 2 Hayw. 298; 4 Leigh 163; 1 Penning. 44.

A general residuary clause carries property, a gift of which has failed by reason of misdescription; 53 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 345; and though a general residuary clause carries lapsed or void legacies, it does not include any part of the residue itself which fails; 15 R. I. 138. See, generally, 9 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 200, n.

The assent of the executor to a legacy is requisite to vest the title in the legatee; 1 Bail. 504; 4 Fla. 144; 19 Ala. 666; 11 Humphr. 559; 11 Gratt. 724; 8 How. 170; 2 Det. & B. 254. But this seems to be merely a necessary requirement to adjust the matter to the reasonable convenience of the executor; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 498. This will often be implied or presumed; 23 Ala. 326; 6 Pick. 128; 1 Bail. Ch. 517; 10 Hare 177; 9 Exch. 680; as where the legatee was in possession of the thing at the decease of the testator, and the executor acquiesces in his right; 47 Fed. Rep. 250. See 6 Call 55. The premature assent of an executor named where another qualifies will not avail; 4 Dev. & B. 401; nor will an assent before the issue of letters testamentary; 19 Ala. 666; otherwise in England where the doctrine was that the authority of the executor was derived from the will; Wms. Exrs. 303, 1378. If the assent is unreasonably withheld, it may be compelled by a court of equity; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 162; 6 Dana 148; 1 Ind. 570; 3 Redf. 514; Crowe. Ex. & Ad. 491.

A legatee cannot sue for his legacy until the time given to the executor for payment has expired. This time is commonly one year; 16 Beav. 298; 15 Ala. 507; 2 Edw. Ch. 202. So also the assent of the legatee is required to complete the gift, although it is presumed, after the will is proved, unless the legacy is actually declined, and in that case the bequest is subject to distribution as intestate property; 15 Me. 207; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 499. Of cumulative legacies one onerous and the other beneficial, the latter cannot be accepted and the former declined; 8 Myl. &

K. 254; but an intention will control if expressed in the will; 11 Jur. N. S. 824; Wms. Ex. 1448.

Abatement. The general pecuniary legacies are subject to abatement whenever the assets are insufficient to answer the debts and specific legacies. The abatement must be upon pro rata; 4 Bro. Ch. 349, 350; 106 Mass. 100; 71 Pa. 383; but a residuary legatee has no right to call upon general legatees to abate proportionally with him; 1 Dr. & S. 623; L. R. 3 Ch. App. 587; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 555. And, generally, among general legatees there is a preference of those who have relinquished any right in consideration of their legacy over mere volunteers; 106 Mass. 100; L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 714. Specific legatees must abate, pro rata, when all the assets are exhausted except specific devises, and prove insufficient to pay debts; 1 P. Wms. 679; 2 Bla. Com. 513; but in ordinary cases of a deficiency of assets, the specific legacy will not be liable to abate with the general legacies; 1 Vern. 81; 1 P. Wms. 422; 3 id. 365; 3 Bro. C. C. 100; 3 Wms. Ex. 436. See 1 Rep. Leg. 150; 1 Belt, Supp. Ves. 209, 231; 2 id. 112. Specific bequests and devises cannot be forced to abate in relief of a pecuniary legacy by contributing to payment of costs of administration and funeral expenses; Moore's Estate (O. Ct.), 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 459. A bequest to a widow in lieu of dower is not subject to abatement in case of a deficiency of assets, but will be preferred to other general legacies; 3 Misc. Rep. 123. Demonstrative legacies will not abate with general legacies; 11 Ves. 607; 11 Cl. & F. 509; 25 N. Y. 128. Where an estate is insufficient to pay all the legacies, the general will abate before the specific legacies; 115 N. C. 398. Demonstrative legacies are subject to abatement, but specific legacies are not; 40 W. Va. 349. Demonstrative legacies are a prior claim on the fund out of which they are payable, but if it is insufficient the legacies must be reduced proportionally; 22 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 853. In default of special provision the following order is observed in calling upon the estate to supply a deficiency of assets; (1) General residuary estate; (2) Estate devised for payment for debts; (3) Real estate descended; (4) Real estate devised subject to debts; (5) General legacies; (6) Specific legacies and devises pro rata; 11 Pa. 72. Legacies given by a codicil are on the same footing as legacies in the original will, when the estate is insufficient to pay them all in full; 16 R. I. 98. See ABATEMENT; DEMONSTRATIVE LEGACY.

Ademption of legacies. A specific legacy is revoked by the sale or change of form of the thing bequeathed; as, by converting a gold chain into a cup, or wool into cloth, or cloth into garments; 2 Bro. C. C. 110; 7 Johns. Ch. 262; see 113 N. Y. 560; so if a debt specifically bequeathed be received by the testator the legacy is adeemed; 3 Bro. C. C. 431; 7 Johns. Ch. 202; 23 N. H. 218; 10 Ohio 64; 48 La. Ann. 278; and so of stock, which is partially or wholly disposed of by testator before his death; 6 Pick. 212; 28 Pa. 263; 1 Ves. Sen. 426; 7 Johns. Ch. 258.

A demonstrative legacy is not adeemed by the sale or change of the fund; 15 Ves. 364; 6 H. L. Cas. 883; 11 Cl. & F. 509; 16 Pa. 275; 25 N. Y. 128; 13 Allen 236; 118 Ind. 147.

The doctrine of ademption does not apply to demonstrative legacies inasmuch as they are payable out of the general estate, if the fund out of which they are payable fail; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1131; 2 Wms. Ex. 692. Where a legacy is given for a specified purpose, it is in the nature of a specific legacy, and if such purpose is accomplished by the testator in his lifetime there is an ademption of the legacy; 38 N. J. Eq. 91; so where a legacy was given expressly to pay a debt, the legacy was held adeemed or satisfied; 89 Barb. 507; 6 Ch. App. 186. Where the payment made by the testator subsequent to the execution of a will is equal to or exceeds the amount of the legacy, it will be deemed a satisfaction or an ademption thereof, but where it is less than the amount of the legacy, it is deemed a satisfaction pro tanto, and if the difference between the amounts be slight, it may be deemed a complete satisfaction or ademption; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1111; 47 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 376. A bequest to a son of a certain sum payable out of the shares of the daughter's children, and providing that on such payment the son shall surrender an agreement of the daughter to pay him the amount of such legacy, is a bequest for a particular purpose, and hence is adeemed by payment by the testator, during his life of the daughter's debt to the son; 47 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 376. See ADEMPMENT.

A legacy to a child is regarded in courts of equity as a portion for such child; hence, when the testator, after giving such a legacy, settles the child and gives a portion, it is regarded as an ademption of the legacy. And it will make no difference that the portion given in settlement is less than the legacy; it will still adeem the legacy pro tanto; 5 My. & C. 29; L. R. 14 Eq. 236; 16 N. Y. 9; 15 Pa. 212; 5 Rand. 577; 2 Story Eq. Jur. § 1111. See 81 Ga. 734; 126 Ill. 37. The principle of the ademption of legacies by gifts made during testator's life is applicable to a residuary legacy, where such appears to be the clear intent; 1 Misc. Rep. 58.

Payment of legacies. A legacy given generally, if no time of payment be named, is due at the death of the testator, although not payable until the executor has time to settle the estate in due course of law. See DEVISE. Legacies are not due by the civil law or the common law until one year after the decease of the testator and from that time interest is chargeable on them. The same term is generally allowed the executor in the American states to dispose of the estate and pay debts, and sometimes, by special order of the probate court, this is extended, from time to time, according to circumstances; 12 N. Y. 474; 41 N. H. 391; 21 Md. 158; 105 Mass. 431; Rep. Leg. 850; 4 Cl. & F. 270; 5 Binn. 475.

The great rule in legacies is, that if the testator's estate is not sufficient for paying all his debts and legacies, first, the debts must be paid in full; secondly, the specific legacies are to be paid; thirdly, general legacies are to be paid, in full if possible, if not, pro rata.

If given by will, an annuity is a legacy; 61 Miss. 372; and under a charge of legacies, an annuity will be included unless the testator expressly distinguishes between annuities and legacies; 3 App. Cas. 989; 3 De G. & G. 601; 2 Ves. Jr. 218. See CHARGE.

An annuity given by will shall commence at the death of the testator, and the first payment fall due one year thereafter; 3 Madd. 167; 1 Sumn. 19; 42 Barb. 538; 5 W. & S. 30.

In the civil law a distinction is made between an annual legacy and the legacy of a usufruct in that whereas the legacy of a usufruct was only one legacy of a right to enjoy as long as it shall last, an annual legacy contained as many legacies as it may last years; Dom. Civ. L. § 3572; Mack. Rom. L. § 763; and a similar distinction is made between gifts of the income and profits of particular funds and annuities payable from time to time, in that the latter are at each time of payment gross sums to be regarded as separate legacies at each recurring period. In this respect it is often difficult to determine to which particular class a gift belongs. A bequest of the income of certain shares of bank stock during life was held not an annuity, and the devisee was required to pay the tax on the stock, the court admitting the difficulty and citing 18 Pick. 128, as an authority for the opposite view; 10 R. I. 455.

The importance of the distinction is evident when it is remembered that the gift of the produce of a fund, without limit as to time, has been held to amount to a gift of the fund itself whether the gift be made directly or through a trustee; 44 N. J. Eq. 450; 50 id. 522; 151 Mass. 241; while an annuity charged upon personality is usually dependent on the legatee's life, the fund reverting to the residuary legatee; 6 Johns.

Ch. 70; 135 Mass. 83.

It has been held that there is no substantial difference between the gift of an annuity for life and of the interest or income of a fund for life; nor between the gift simply of interest and of interest payable annually; 136 Pa. 374; 170 id. 242.

A distinction is taken between an annuity and a legacy, in the matter of interest. In the latter case, no interest begins to accumulate until the end of one year from the death of the testator; 1 Sch. & L. 301; 17 S. & R. 396; 2 Rop. Leg. 1253; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 632. In cases where a legacy is given a child as a portion, payable at a certain age, this will draw interest from the death of the testator; L. R. 1 Eq. 389; 11 Ves. 2; 5 Binn. 477, 479; 4 Rawle 113; but this rule does not apply when any other provision is made for the child; 9 Beav. 164; 19 Pa. 49; 16 N. J. Eq. 243; 41 N. H. 393; 14 Allen 239. The qualified recognition of a legacy by an executor will not carry with it the right to interest thereon, prior to demand for its delivery; 45 La. Ann. 962. See INTEREST.

Where legatees are under disabilities, as infancy or coverture, the executor cannot discharge himself by payment, except to some party having a legal right to receive the same on the part of the legatee, which in the case of an infant is the legally-appointed guardian; 1 Johns. Ch. 3; 106 Mass. 596; 1 P. Wms. 285; and, at common law, in the case of a married woman, the husband; 1 Vern. 261; but in the latter case the executor may decline to pay the legacy until the husband make a suitable provision out of it for the wife, according to the order of the court of chancery; 8 Bligh 224; Bisph. Eq. § 109. By statute in England and in some of the United States the executor is allowed in such cases to deposit the money on interest, subject to the order of the court of chancery; 2 Will. Ex. 1407.

The executor is liable for interest upon legacies, whenever he has realized it by investing the amount; L. R. 5 Ch. App. 233; 114 Mass. 404; 16 How. 542; and usually with annual rests; 29 Beav. 586; 23 N. J. Eq. 192; 109 Mass. 541. Where an executor was compelled to pay money out of his own funds on account of the devastavit of a co-executor, and the matter had lain along for many years on account of the infancy of the legatees, no interest was allowed under the special circumstances until the filing of the bill; 9 Vt. 41.

The better opinion is that at common law no action lay against an executor for a general legacy; 5 Term 680. But in case of a specific legacy it will lie after the assent of the executor; 5 Gray 67; 114 Mass. 26; and in the United States assumpsit will generally lie for all legacies even before assent by the executor; 30 N. H. 505; 6 N. J. L. 432; 12 Pa. 341; 2 Johns. 243; 6 Conn. 176; 2 Hayw. 158; 63 Me. 537.

The proper remedy for the recovery of a legacy is in equity; 5 Term 690; 35 N. H. 349; 71 N. C. 281; 35 N. H. 339; Wms. Ex. 2005. See 64 Vt. 598. In most of the United States statutory proceedings to recover legacies are provided in the orphans' or probate courts. As to federal jurisdiction over the administration of estates, see EXECUTOR.

By a recent statute in Louisiana it is provided that a legatee who has paid a debt for which bequeathed realty was mortgaged has no recourse against heirs or legatees under universal title; Laws 1896, ch. 72.

Doubtful points in the settlement of an estate are sometimes settled by mutual agreement of all parties interested, if sui juris; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 476. This right is sometimes extended by legislation permitting the executor, etc., in cases deemed proper by a court of equity, to bind future contingent interests of persons not capable of acting for themselves; id. See FAMILY ARRANGEMENT.

Satisfaction of debt by legacy. In courts of equity, if a legacy equal or exceed the debt, it is presumed to have been intended to go in satisfaction; but if the legacy be less than the debt, it shall not be deemed satisfaction pro tanto; 16 Vt. 150; 12 Mass. 391; 8 S. & R. 54; 8 Cow. 246; 1 Lowell 418.

This rule, founded on a series of equity precedents, was said by Judge Redfield to maintain "a kind of dying existence;" 2 Redf. Wills 185, 186; and it is termed by a later author "whimsical and unsatisfactory"; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 469. See Bronson, J., in 2 Hill 576; Wms. Ex. 1297. The courts allow very slight circumstances to rebut this presumption of payment: as, where the debt was not contracted until after the making of the will; 2 P. Wms. 343; 3 P. Wms. 353; 4 Madd. 825; or the debt is unliquidated; 1 P. Wms. 299; or due upon a bill or note negotiable; 3 Ves. 561; 1 Root 159; 1 Allen 129; where the legacy is made payable after the debt falls due; 3 Atk. 96; where the intention appears otherwise; 2 Ves. 635; 2 G. & J. 185; 1 P. Wms. 410; or where the legacy is of a different nature from the debt; 1 Atk. 428; 3 id. 65; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1110. Satisfaction is not favored in America.

Release of debt by a legacy. If one leave a legacy to his debtor, it is not to be regarded as a release of the debt unless that appears to have been the intention of the testator; 4 Bro. C. C. 226; 15 Sim. Ch. 554; 5 Ala. 245; 153 Pa. 402; and parol evidence is admissible to prove this intention; 5 Ves. 341; 23 Beav. 404; 2 Dev. Ch. 488.

Where one appoints his debtor his executor, it is at law regarded as a release of the debt; Co. Litt. 264; 8 Co. 136 a; but this is now controlled by statute in England and in many of the United States; 116 Mass. 552; 15 Pa. 533; 9 Conn. 470; 7 Cow. 781. But in equity it is considered that the executor is still liable to account for the amount of his own debt; 13 Ves. Ch. 282, 284.

Where one appoints his creditor executor, and he has assets, it operates to discharge the debt, but not otherwise; 2 Will. Ex. 1816; 1 Salk. 304. See CHARGE; DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY; WILL. BEQUEST.

LEGACY DUTY. A legacy tax in Great Britain, the rate of which rises according to the remoteness of the relationship of the legatee, and reaches its maximum where he is not related to the testator. See 53 L. J. Ch. 645; 26 Ch. Div. 538; COLLATERAL INHERITANCE TAX; TAX.

A duty of trifling amount was first imposed only on legacies of the value of £20 and upwards. Later, a duty was imposed on the value of legacies of the like value and also upon every part of any residuary personal estate of the value of £100, the rate of the duty running from two per cent. in the case of any brother, sister, nephew, or niece, to six per cent. in the case of a stranger. The incidence and the rate of duty were subsequently varied by a multiplicity of acts; and now legacy duty is payable in respect of a deceased person domiciled in the United Kingdom on every legacy and on every succession upon the intestacy of such a person, except where exemption is specifically allowed. Leaseholds are not subject to legacy duty; but succession duty is paid on them. The effect of the Stamp Act, 1815, x. 2, Sch. (Pt. III.) and of the Finance Act, 1910, is that the rates of the duty are in the case of (1) a husband or wife or lineal ancestor or lineal descendants of the deceased, one per cent., (2) of brothers or sisters of the deceased or their lineal descendants, five per cent., and (3) of any other person whatsoever, ten per cent. But no legacy duty and no succession duty is payable (1) where the principal value of the property passing and liable to estate duty (excluding property in which the deceased never had an interest and property of which he was never competent to dispose and which on the death passes to anyone other than the husband, wife or lineal ancestor or descendant) does not exceed £15,000 and (2) where the total legacies or successions derived by the same person do not exceed £1,000 or, in the case of a widow or child under twenty-one of the deceased, £2,000 (Finance Act, 1910, s. 68). Except in these cases, legacy duty is payable on everything except realty in addition to estate duty. Byrne. See DEATH DUTIES.

LEGAL. That which is according to law. It is used in opposition to equitable; as, the legal estate is in the trustee, the equitable estate in the cestui que trust.

LEGAL ASSETS. Such property of a testator in the hands of his executor as is liable to debts in temporal courts and to legacies in the spiritual, by course of law; equitable assets are such as are liable only by help of a court of equity. 2 Will. Ex. 1408-1431. The distinction is not important in the United States; 1 Ashm. 347. See STORY, Eq. Jur. § 551; 2 Jarm. Wills, 543; Crow. Ex. & Ad. 421, 423.

LEGAL CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION.

LEGAL COSTS. The term "legal costs" of said suits could mean only such costs as the law required the State to pay. 101 Ky. 601, 42 S. W. 108.

LEGAL CRUELTY. Such conduct on the part of a husband as will endanger the life, health, or limb of his wife, or create a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt; such acts as render cohabitation unsafe, or are likely to be attended with injury to the person or to the health of the wife; 36 Ga. 286; 2 Curt. Eccl. 281; 19 Cal. 626; 44 Ala. 698; 103 Ill. 477; 50 Wis. 254; 60 How. Pr. 151; 73 N. Y. 369; 33 N. J. Eq. 458. That which merely wounds the feelings without being accompanied by bodily injury or actual menace does not amount to legal cruelty; 30 Gratt. 807; 3 Metc. 257; 9 C. E. Greene 338; 10 Neb. 144; as the infliction of mental suffering cannot constitute cruelty unless it endangers the life or health of the person injured; [1895] Prob. 315; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 566; 48 La. Ann. 1194; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 328; but it has been held that there may be such legal cruelty as to endanger the health of the wife without threats of bodily injury; as where a husband subjected his wife to a severe course of what he deemed to be affectionate moral discipline, and by so doing broke down her health and rendered a serious malady imminent; L. R. 2 P. & M. 31; 111 Mass. 327; so compelling a wife to live at times in an attic without any conveniences whatever, leaving her for a period of six weeks without means to pay her board, and using insulting and abusive language to her is legal cruelty; 103 Mich. 646; and falsely accusing her of unchastity; 8 Ore. 100; 45 Mich. 150; 60 How. Pr. 151 (but contra where the husband has reason to suspect his wife of infidelity; 73 N. Y. 369). A public accusation of unchastity, either in or out of the presence of the wife, is a greater degree of legal cruelty than one made in private; 76 Ind. 136; 84 La. Ann. 611; 45 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 761; and it is legal cruelty for a wife to accuse her husband constantly, publicly, and without cause, of unfaithfulness to her, thereby disgracing him and endangering his means of livelihood; 49 Mich. 417; but it has been held that adultery itself is not cruelty; 64 Cal. 282. Where acts of violence have been condoned, wilfully depriving a wife of her proper position in the household, neglecting her, degrading her to the level of a servant, and compelling her to do the menial work of the house, and to take her meals and to sleep apart from the rest of the household, was held, in itself, legal cruelty; 72 L. T. 295. The husband is responsible for the ill-treatment of his wife by persons whom he supports in his house in spite of her remonstrances, and where she is justified in apprehensions of personal violence from them, she is entitled to a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and personal indignities; 9 Ore. 452; excessive sexual intercourse is legal cruelty, and it may be shown by the wife's testimony; 58 N. H. 569. See 32 N. J. Eq. 475. A husband who unreasonably and brutally effects sexual intercourse with his wife to the injury of her health, when he knows that it will cause her injury and suffering, is guilty of intolerable cruelty such as will authorize a divorce; 61 Conn. 283. The refusal of a husband to have sexual intercourse with his wife is not cruel and inhuman treatment or ground for a divorce a vinculo; 63 Wis. 553.

Desertion and failure to support a wife when during the time she had been seriously ill and greatly in need of the assistance, and of the society, nursing, and comfort of her husband, was held legal cruelty on the ground that it inflicted on her mental suffering and public disgrace; 79 Ind. 368. A wife is entitled to a divorce for legal cruelty where the acts complained of are the result of insane delusion; 38 N. J. Eq. 458. But it has been held that a single act of personal violence does not constitute cruelty; 51 Md. 72; and that insulting and degrading language to her is not ground for a divorce, although in case of actual cruelty it may be shown in aggravation; 69 Ala. 84; and misunderstandings and difficulties between husband and wife will not afford a foundation for a divorce; 34 La. Ann. 185; nor will a succession of petty annoyances, complaints, fault-finding, and disparagement of the husband's common sense constitute legal cruelty to him; 49 Mich. 639. In the case of Russell v. Russell the English court of appeal held that: (1) A false charge of having committed an unnatural crime circulated by a wife against her husband, although published to the world and persisted in after she did not believe its truth, is not sufficient evidence of legal cruelty to entitle the husband to a judicial separation; (2) but was enough to justify the court in refusing a petition of the wife for a restitution of conjugal rights; [1895] Prob. 315. This case had been tried before Pollock, B., and a special jury in April, 1895, and on questions put by the court to the jury, the latter found that Lady Russell had been guilty of cruelty, and that in her conduct and correspondence she had not acted bona fide. The judge (1) made a decree for judicial separation in favor of the husband and (2) dismissed the petition of the wife for restitution. On appeal of Lady Russell the decision was as stated supra, reversing on (1) and affirming on (2). Both parties appealed to the House of Lords, when the appeal of the countess was withdrawn and a motion for reinstatement denied, leaving the refusal of restitution by the court of appeal the final decision; while the decision that a judicial separation was not warranted was affirmed by the Lords; [1897] App. Cas. 395. See 25 Am. L. Reg. 840; CRUELTY; DIVORCE.

LEGAL DUTY. That which the law requires to be done or forbore to a determinate person, or to the public at large, and is correlative to a right vested in such determinate person. 111 N. C. 94. See DUTY.

LEGAL ESTATE. One the right to which may be enforced in a court of law. It is distinguished from an equitable estate, the right to which can be established only in a court of equity.

The party who has the legal title has alone the right to seek a remedy for a wrong to his estate, in a court of law, though he may have no beneficial interest in it. The equitable owner is he who has not the legal estate, but is entitled to the beneficial interest.

The person who holds the legal estate for the benefit of another is called a trustee; he who has the beneficiary interest and does not hold the legal title is called the beneficiary, or, more technically, the cestui que trust.

When the latter has a claim, he must enforce his right in a court of equity for he cannot sue any one at law in his own name; 1 East 497; 8 Term 322; 1 Saund. 158, n. 1; 2 Bingh. 20; still less can he in such court sue his own trustee; 1 East 497.

LEGAL FRAUD. See FRAUD.

LEGAL HEIRS. See HEIR, LEGAL.

LEGAL IMPOSSIBILITY. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

LEGAL INCAPACITY. See INCAPACITY; LIMITATIONS.

LEGAL INTEREST. See INTEREST.

LEGAL IRREGULARITY. See IRREGULARITY.

LEGAL MALICE. An expression used as the equivalent to constructive malice or malice in law. 53 Me. 503. See MALICE.

LEGAL MERCHANDISE. Under the words "other legal merchandise" in a charter party, the charterer is at liberty to ship any lawful article he pleases, but is bound to pay the same amount of freight the vessel would have earned if loaded within the terms of the charter. 18 L. J. C. P. 74; 6 C. B. 791.

LEGAL MORTGAGE. A first mortgage. This is unquestionably so as regards land, because it is only the first mortgage which can grant the legal estate in land; and it has been held that where there was an agreement to give a legal mortgage of a ship, the expression signified a first mortgage. 11 W. R. 28.

A conveyance expressly intended to be a mortgage. Anderson. A transfer of the legal title to land with the right to redeem the same. English.

LEGAL NEGLIGENCE. See NEGLIGENCE.

LEGAL NOTICE. Such notice as is adequate in point of law, such notice as the law requires to be given for the specific purpose or in the particular case. A legal notice to quit is a notice provided by law as distinguished from one provided by contract. 57 L. J. Q. B. 225; 20 Q. B. D. 374.

LEGAL OBLIGATION. See DUTY; OBLIGATION.

LEGAL PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES. See LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES.

LEGAL PROCESS. See PROCESS.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES. The primary meaning of the terms "representatives," "legal representatives," "personal representatives," or "legal personal representatives," is executors and administrators in their official capacity; 30 L. J. Ch. 793; L. R. 4 Eq. 359; and it cannot be construed as excluding them; 99 Mass. 342; see 45 N. Y. 563; 83 Me. 295; but the meaning may be controlled by the context; 32 Mo. App. 211. It may mean the next of kin; 8 W. N. C. Pa. 209; 4 De G. & J. 477; 26 Beav. 26; 61 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 331; 28 L. J. Ch. 835; 16 Sim. 329. It has been held to mean next of kin according to the statute of distribution; 13 L. J. Ch. 147; Willard, Ex.; and heirs or legal descendants; 71 Ill. 91; and heirs, assignees or receivers; 26 Cal. 23; 73 Md. 59; 15 Ill. 574; 45 Ohio St. 133; 92 U. S. 724; see 117 U. S. 591, where the term was said to be not necessarily restricted to the personal representatives of the deceased, but is sufficiently broad to cover all persons who with respect to his property stand in his place and represent his interests, whether transferred to them by his act or by operation of law, reversing 11 Fed. Rep. 573. When used with reference to land, it ordinarily means those to whom the land descends; 130 Ind. 251. See PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES; LAPSED LEGACY.

Within the meaning of a life insurance policy it has been held to mean wife and children rather than administrators; 125 N. Y. 411, reversing 56 Hun 12; 28 Ill. App. 608; and the widow, orphan, heir, assign, or legatee of the member; 2 Mackey 70; but it has been held, where nothing shows that the words were used with a different meaning, the words legal representatives make the proceeds a part of the assets of the insured; 78 Ill. 147. The words families, heirs, or legal representatives are held to include those who would take property as in cases of intestacy; 112 N. Y. 637, reversing 48 Hun 472; and where the benefit appears to have been intended for the family it may mean heirs or next of kin; 41 Mo. 563.

The rule that devises lapse by the death of the devisee is not changed by adding to the devise the words "to have and to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns forever"; 118 N. Y. 896. See LAPSED DEVISE; LAPSED LEGACY.

One who represents the person and controls the rights of another, usually an executor or administrator. The term imports a higher authority than agent; for an agent acts for his principal, who retains the beneficial right; but the legal representative succeeds to the place of the former owner, and is vested with his title. Abbott. The term is used to describe a party in interest whose identity is uncertain, but who has succeeded, or will succeed, to the right of the deceased, either by operation of law or by grant. Id.; 18 Ill. 472.

LEGAL RESIDENCE. If a person has actually removed to another place with the intention of remaining there for an indefinite time and as a place of fixed domicile, it is deemed his "legal residence," notwithstanding he may entertain a "floating intention" to return at some future period. 162 Ky. 685, 173 S. W. 109.

A "legal residence" (domicile) can not, in the nature of things, co-exist in the same person in two States or countries. 87 Ky. 245, 8 S. W. 440.

LEGAL TENDER. That currency which has been made suitable by law for the purposes of a tender in the payment of debts.

The following descriptions of money are legal tender in the United States:—
All the gold coins of the United States are a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, and, when reduced in weight below such standard tolerance, they are a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Treasury notes and standard silver dollars for all payments.

Silver coins of a smaller denomination than one dollar, for all sums not exceeding ten dollars.

The minor coins, five, three, two, and one cent pieces, for all amounts not exceeding twenty-five cents.

As to trade dollars, see DOLLAR. See EAGLE; HALF EAGLE.

By acts of Feb. 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, congress authorized the issue of notes of the United States, declaring them a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. 12 Stat. L. 343, 532, 709. These notes are obligations of the United States, and are exempt from state taxation; 7 Wall. 26; but where a state requires its taxes to be paid in coin, they cannot be discharged by a tender of these notes. A debt created prior to the passage of the legal tender acts, and payable by the express terms of the contract in gold and silver coins, cannot be satisfied by a tender of treasury notes; 7 Wall. 229, 258; 12 id. 687. The legal tender acts are constitutional as applied to pre-existing contracts, as well as to those made subsequent to their passage; 13 Wall. 457, per Strong, J., overruling the previous opinion of the court in 8 Wall. 604, per Chase, C. J. See 17 Am. L. Reg. 193; 19 id. 73; 25 id. 601. Congress has the constitutional power to make the treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, in time of peace as well as in time of war; 110 U. S. 421.

A postage currency has also been authorized, which was receivable in payment of all dues to the United States less than five dollars. They were not, however, a legal tender in payment of private debts. (Act of Congress, approved July 17, 1862.) See GOLD; MONEY; SILVER.

LEGALIS HOMO (Lat.). A person who stands rectus in curia, who possesses all his civil rights. A lawful man. One who stands rectus in curia, not outlawed nor infamous. In this sense are the words probi et legales homines.

LEGALIZATION. The act of making lawful.

By legalization is also understood the act by which a judge or competent officer authenticates a record, or other matter, in order that the same may be lawfully read in evidence.

LEGALIZE. To confirm acts already done, not to authorize new proceedings in the future. 102 Mass. 128.

To give the authority of law to that which lacks such authority: as, to legalize a nuisance; length of time will not legalize a nuisance; slavery was a legalized social relation. Anderson. Id.

LEGATINE CONSTITUTIONS. The name of a code of ecclesiastical laws, enacted in national synods, held under legates from Pope Gregory IX. and Clement IV., in the reign of Hen. III., about the years 1230 and 1238. 1 Bla. Com. 83. Burn says, 1237 and 1268. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law, 80 d.

LEGATARY. One to whom anything is bequeathed; a legatee. This word is sometimes though seldom, used to designate a legate or nuncio.

LEGATEE. The person to whom a legacy is given.

The court will apply the popular rather than the technical meaning to the term "legatee" in a will, and read it as if it were "distributee," when, after looking at all the circumstances, and all the clauses of the will, the alternative is between this disposition and a total failure of the dispositive scheme for want of certainty, and that seems to have been the testator's meaning; 23 Ga. 571. See LEGACY.

See ALL LEGATEES; LEGATEE AND DEVISEE.

LEGATEE AND DEVISEE. Recognizing the generally careless, inadvertent, and interchangeable use of these words, it was held that the words "legatee" and "devisee" shall each be held to convey the same idea; and to embrace and include either real or personal property, or both. 112 S. W. 627.

LEGATES. Legates are extraordinary ambassadors sent by the pope to catholic countries to represent him and to exercise his jurisdiction. They are distinguished from the ambassadors of the pope who are sent to other powers.

Legatus à latere hold the first rank among those who are honored by a legation; they are always chosen from the college of cardinals, and are called à latere, in imitation of the magistrates of ancient Rome, who were taken from the court or side of the emperor. Legati missi are simple envoys.

Legati nati are those who are entitled to be legates by birth.

Legati dati are those who have authority from the pope by special commissions. See A LATERE. FOREIGN MINISTER.

LEGATION. An embassy; a mission. All persons attached to a foreign legation, lawfully acknowledged by the government of this country, whether they are ambassadors, envoys, ministers, or attachés, are protected by the act of April 30, 1790, from violence, arrest, or molestation; 1 Dall. 117; 1 Wash. C. C. 232; 11 Wheat. 467; 1 Miles 366; 1 N. & M'C. 217; 1 Baldw. 240. See AMBASSADOR; ARREST; PRIVILEGE.

LEGATORY. The third part of a freeman's personal estate, which by the custom of London, in case he had a wife and children, the freeman might always have disposed of by will. Bacon, Abr. Customs of London (D 4). See DEAD MAN'S PART.

LEGATUM. A legacy given to the church or an accustomed mortuary. Cowel.

LEGEM HABERE. Capable of giving evidence upon oath.

LEGEM JUBERE. See LEGEM SCISCERE.

LEGEM SCISCERE (Lat.). To give consent or authority to a proposed law.

LEGES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Laws proposed by a magistrate of the senate and adopted by the whole people in comitia centuriata. See POPULISCRITUM; LEX.

In English Law. Laws.

Leges scriptæ, written or statute laws.

Leges non scriptæ, unwritten or customary laws; the common law, including general customs, or the common law properly so called; and also particular customs of certain parts of the kingdom, and those particular laws that are, by custom, observed only in certain courts and jurisdictions. 1 Bla. Com. 67. "These parts of law are therefore styled leges non scriptæ, because their original institution and authority are not set down in writing, as acts of parliament are, but they receive their binding force from long and immemorial usage." 1 Steph. Com. 40, 46. See LAW; JUS; LEX; JUS PRAETORIUM.

LEGES BARBARORUM. Folk Laws. The oldest monuments of Teutonic legal history have received the name of Leges Barbarorum. But the title is apt to be misleading. Even in the Frank kingdoms, where the conscious imitation of Rome was strongest, there is at first no attempt at legislation in the modern sense. Beyond doubt the Leges were, in most cases, the work of kings, to the extent that they were drawn up by royal direction, and published under royal auspices. Quite possibly, too, the kings who collected them took the opportunity of modifying certain details during the process. But the notion of the king, i. e. the State, as the source of legislation is yet far distant. Several of these codes profess to give their own account of the way in which they were drawn up, and despite of all the criticism which has been directed against the more extravagant pretensions of the so-called historical school, there can be little doubt that these accounts contain a large element of truth. Jenks, 1 Sel. Essays in Anglo-Am. Leg. Hist. 69.

LEGES ET CONSUETUDINES

REGNI. A regular collective name of English law since the latter half of the 12th century at the latest, in other words, ever since English law has had any terminology of its own; in the 14th century "lex et consuetudo regni nostri" was well established as meaning the Common Law. Pollock, 1st Book of Jurispr. 4th ed., 253.

LEGES EDWARDI CONFESSORIS. Profess to be an official collection of laws, drawn up in 1070 from the mouths of local juries by wise and skillful officials. Unfortunately there is no reason to suppose that it was; and, if it were, the result is certainly not to be found in the Leges Edwardi. Byrne; Jenks' Short Hist. Eng. L.

LEGES HENRICI PRIMI. Laws of Henry I. So called because they are laws which commence with a charter of that monarch. They were compiled probably about the year 1118 and are an attempt to compile a general statement of the principles of English law. They are printed in Thorpe's Ancient Laws of England; i. 497-608. Byrne.

LEGES JULIÆ. Laws enacted during the reign of Augustus or of Julius Cæsar which, with the lex æbutia, effectually abolished the legis actiones.

Lex Julia ambitus. A law to repress illegal methods of seeking office. Inst. 4, 18.

Lex Julia cessio Bonorum. A law allowing debtors to make a voluntary assignment of their property. Inst. 3, 12; Sohm, Rom. L. 211.

Lex Julia de Adulteriis. The law relating (1) to divorce, requiring the presence of seven witnesses and a libellus repudiis to show the fact of repudiation and (2) prohibiting the husband from alienating or mortgaging any fundus italicus comprised in the dos. This provision was extended by Justinian to any fundus dotialis whatever. Sohm, Rom. L. 374, 386.

Lex Julia de Annona. A law to repress combinations for heightening the price of provisions.

Lex Julia de Maritandis Ordinibus. A law forbidding senators and their children to intermarry with freedmen or infames, and freedmen to marry infames. Inst. 2, 9.

Lex Julia de Residuis. A law punishing those who gave an incomplete account of public money committed to their charge. Inst. 4, 16.

Lex Julia et Papia Poppæ. See LEX PAPIA POPPÆ.

Lex Julia Majestatis. A law which inflicted the punishment of death on all who attempted anything against the emperor or state, and condemning the wrongdoer after his death. Inst. 4, 18.

Lex Julia Peculatus. A law punishing those who had stolen public money or property or anything sacred or religious. Magistrates and those who had aided them in sustaining public officers during their administration were punished capitally; other persons were deported. Inst. 4, 18, 9.

Lex Julia Repetundarum. A law for the punishment of magistrates and judges who received bribes. Inst. 4, 18.

LEGES PUBLILIAE. Roman laws (B. C. 339) which made the confirmation of the Roman senate (patrum auctoritas) unnecessary to the validity of the law of the plebeians. The patres were required to ratify beforehand the votes of the comitia centuriata, and one of the two censors was to be a plebeian. Hunter, Rom. L. 7, 13, 62.

LEGIOSUS. Subjected to a course of the law. Cow.

LEGIS ACTIO. Actio represented a right of the plaintiff not only as against the defendant, but also against the magistrate—a right to have a judicium placed at his disposal or to have a private individual appointed for the purpose of deciding by his judgment the question at issue between him and his adversary. The actio rested in early times on lex or on custom with the force of lex, and for this reason it was called legis actio.

There were five of the legis actiones: (1) the legis actio sacramenti, (2) the legis actio per judicis postulationem, (3) the legis actio per condictionem, (4) the legis actio per manus injectionem, (5) the legis actio per pignoris captionem. Private law granted a legis actio either directly or indirectly, and a private right which was not directly enforceable by the ordinary civil procedure could nevertheless secure a trial or actio by a solemn affirmation or a solemn act of execution, which latter could be either personal or real. The general form of action was actio sacramenti, the other forms being restricted to such cases as were determined by statute (lex) or ancient custom with statutory force. The special legis actiones were all modes of enforcing obligatory rights, or, in other words, they were forms of social or real personal actions. But whenever the claim was not personal, but real, the legis actio sacramenti was the sole form available. Sohm, Rom. L. 153.

The procedure in these actions was open only to Roman citizens and the parties were almost always obliged to appear personally, but an assertor liberatus could appear to claim freedom of a person wrongfully treated as a slave. The necessity of adherence to the prescribed forms was so rigid that if, in an action for damage to a vineyard, the plaintiff used the word vites instead of the general word arbores employed in the law of the Twelve Tables, he lost his action, and if an action failed, even on the most technical ground, the plaintiff had no further legal remedy. The sentence was ordinarily to give the thing demanded, not a pecuniary equivalent. Sand. Just. Introd. § 96.

LEGISLATION. The act of giving or enacting laws. See STATUTE; CONSTITUTIONAL; LEGISLATIVE POWER. LOCAL LEGISLATION.

LEGISLATIVE INTENT. Where the Legislature has enacted two or more statutes, which from their wording appear to be inconsistent, or in conflict with the State or Federal Constitutions, there is an ambiguity, the courts construing the statutes are permitted to look beyond their words as to the legislative purpose. 131 Ky. 551, 115 S. W. 703.

LEGISLATIVE POWER. Authority exercised by that department of government which is charged with the enactment of laws as distinguished from the executive and judicial functions. The law-making power of a sovereign state.

The authority conferred by or exercised under the constitution of a state or of the United States, to make new laws or to alter or repeal existing ones.

A law in the sense in which the word is implied in these definitions is a rule of civil conduct, or a statute described by the legislative will, and not law in the more general sense in which the term is applicable to that which owes its origin, either wholly or in part, to the judicial power. See LAW; JUDGE-MADE LAW; JUDICIAL

POWER. The separation of the three powers of government which underlie all modern civilized government has been discussed under the title EXECUTIVE POWER, in which, as well as in the title JUDICIAL POWER, many of the questions arising in connection with the difference of the spheres of action of these three powers have been discussed, and to these titles reference should be made and they should be read in connection with this title.

"Legislation is essentially an act of sovereign power; . . . the very definition of law, . . . shows the intrinsic superiority of the legislature. It may be said, the power of the legislature, also, is limited by prescribed rules. It is so. But it is nevertheless the power of the people and sovereign as far as it extends." Gibbon, J., in 12 S. & R. 380.

"Plenary power in the legislature for all the purposes of civil government is the rule. A prohibition to exercise a particular power is the exception." 15 N. Y. 532.

"The legislative power of a state extends to everything within the sphere of such power, except as it is restricted by the Federal Constitution or that of the state." Swayne, J., in 19 Wall. 576.

"The state does not act by its people in their collective capacity, but through such political agencies as are duly constituted and established. The legislative power is the supreme authority except as limited by the constitution of the state, and the sovereignty of the people is exercised through their representatives in the legislature, unless, by the fundamental law, power is elsewhere reposed." Fuller, C. J., in 144 U. S. 25. "Irrespective of the operation of the Federal Constitution and restrictions asserted to be inherent in the nature of American institutions, the general rule is that there are no limitations upon the legislative power of the legislature of a state, except those imposed by its written constitutions." Fuller, C. J., in 148 U. S. 661.

It is in the legislative department that the supreme and absolute authority is vested; 1 Bla. Com. 52, 142; Locke, Govt. ch. xii. xiii. par. 153.

"The legislative power is that which has the right to direct how the force of the community shall be employed for preserving the community and the members of it." Locke, Govt. ch. xii. par. 143. But it was only upon the ruins of the royal prerogative, so far as concerned the right to dispense with any statute, that the foundations were laid on which by a steady, if at times an interrupted growth, was built up the final omnipotence of parliament. The power of the king was defined by the decision in Golden v. Hales, Comb. 21; s. c. Show. 475. See also 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 29, n.

A state constitution, adopted before that of the United States, is a result of all the plenary legislative power of the people untrammelled by any higher law; 154 N. Y. 61.

It has always been understood that the sovereignty of the federal government is in congress, though limited to specified objects. "The wisdom and the discretion of congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied, to secure them from its abuse." 9 Wheat. 187, per Marshall, C. J.

Legislative discretion is of two kinds, legal and political. "Legal discretion is limited. It is thus defined by Lord Coke: Discretio est discernere per legem quid sit iustum. Political discretion has a wider range. It embraces, combines, and considers all circumstances, events, and projects, foreign or domestic, that can affect the national interests. Legal discretion has not the means of ascertaining the grounds on which political discretion may have proceeded." Hall, Am. L. J. 235.

While each of the three departments of government is essential to the existence of a state, as modern government is understood, it is undoubtedly true that the strongest is the legislative. That would result from its control of the public purse, if from nothing else; but notwithstanding this fact, the judiciary which is in theory the weakest of the departments has held its own place as a co-equal and co-ordinate department, and after the lapse of a century it is said "that the three departments still retain their balance, each with its prerogatives unimpaired." 1 Post. Const. § 45.

Besides the vantage ground which the legislative department naturally occupies as contrasted with the other two by reason of the character of its functions, it has been said that it is the branch of the government which has grown the most. And it is suggested, that coming as it does from the people, much is tolerated which would not be permitted in the other departments; Miller, Const. U. S. 95. It has been maintained by some writers that congress has encroached permanently upon the other departments, but this opinion is controverted; 1 Post. Const. § 45, n. 11. There is no question as to the importance of the constitutional restraint upon the power of congress. Montesquieu said that the English constitution would perish if the legislative power should become more corrupt than the executive; and a later writer considered that while it was important to restrain the executive power, it was still more important to restrain the legislative; De Lolme, Const. 190.

It has been said that: "In the United States, all legislative power exists in two forms, viz. —1st. As political or sovereign power, the nation as a whole embodying the political sovereignty supreme and unlimited; 2d. As civil or delegated power, the legislature representing the legal sovereignty as bounded by constitutional limitations. Political legislation, therefore, being among the powers of sovereignty, belongs exclusively to the people as a nation.

Civil legislation, being morally an act of agency performed by the delegates or representatives of the people, belongs to the legislature proper, and indirectly to the judiciary in the exercise of a supervisory power arising out of actual controversy. In the hierarchy of government the people frame the constitution, the constitution creates the legislature, and the legislature enacts the laws." Ordron. Const. Leg. 15.

The legislative institutions of England are considered by the best constitutional historians to have been of Teutonic origin; id. 62; Freeman, Eng. Const. 18.

The ancient Teutonic assembly in its twofold operation is thus described by Tacitus: "About minor matters the chiefs deliberate; about the more important, the whole tribe. Yet even when the formal decision rests with the people, the affair is always thoroughly discussed by the chiefs. They assemble, except in the case of sudden emergency, on certain fixed days, either at new or at full moon, for this they consider the most auspicious season for the transaction of business. Their freedom has this disadvantage, that they do not meet simultaneously, or as they are bidden, but two or three days are wasted in the delays of assembling. When the multitude think proper, they sit down armed. Silence is proclaimed by the priests, who have on these occasions the right of keeping order. Then the king or the chief, according to age, birth, distinction in war, or eloquence, is heard, more because he has influence to persuade, than because he has power to command. If his sentiments displease them, they reject them with murmurs; if they are satisfied, they brandish their spears. The most complimentary form of assent is to express approbation with their weapons." Church and Brodribb's translation of Agricola and Germania, 95, 96.

"Such," it is said, "was the earliest form of our racial legislature of which there is record. And in it were the germs of all that came after it. The essential features of Saxon mark-moot, shire-moot, folk-moot and witenagemot; of Norman great council; of parliament; of colonial and state legislature; and of the American congress, were historically derived from this ancient and original Teutonic source." Stevens, Sources of the Constitution 60.

The same view of the origin of our legislative institutions is taken by another writer on the subject who says: "The present congress of the United States is a national legislature, and its source may be traced through the British parliament to the meetings in the woods described by Tacitus." 1 Post. Const. 87. So also it was said by the great Freuchman by whom first was given verbal expression to the modern system of government: "Ce beau système a été trouvé dans les bois." Montesquieu, L'Esprit des Loix, xi. ch. vi. Foster gives an interesting account of some primitive legislative assemblies of a whole people which are still in existence; of which probably no more perfect democracy has ever existed than the town meeting of New England. See 1 Post. Const. § 47; Spencer, Pol. Inst. § 49; Town Meeting.

Going back still further it is said that the Aryan instinct of popular government finds expression in representative government, and confides the law-making power to a legislative assembly, and to a personal sovereign, the latter system being always adhered to among the Oriental nations and those of Europe not affected by Aryan origin or admixture; Ordronaux, Const. Leg. 8.

The legislative system of America is undoubtedly derived from that of England; the senate being a development from the house of lords and the privy council, and the house of representatives confessedly from the house of commons. The earliest impressions which were received of legislative authority in England, reflected the characteristic powers of ancient Teutonic assemblies, — the exercise of authority over tribal or national affairs, and the combining of judicial with legislative functions. Stevens, Sources of the Constitution 88. This authority gives an interesting and instructive sketch of the growth of legislative power as it is known in England and America. Prior to Edward the Confessor, the powers of the witenagemot were very great, extending to the making and unmaking of kings; including lease, taxation, treaties, land grants, control of military and naval forces, and ecclesiastical officers, including also the functions of a supreme court of justice. It survived the Norman conquest theoretically with the same powers, but practically they were minimized by the emperor and his successors, the same time that they observed the formality of professing to act by its counsel and advice. With the Plantagenets the legislative power increased, and under Edward I. parliament attained the perfected organization of the two houses, and the essentials of its subsequent authority which was subject to fluctuations through frequent alternations of power and weakness led up to the contest with the Stuarts and the final overthrow both of the throne and the lords, which, it is said, was "so disastrous that neither has since that time been held in the same manner as the state." After a partial reaction, the revolution of 1688 finally established the legislative power in England, and through the opposing forces of the rise of the cabinet system, the feebleness of the first two Georges, and on the other hand, the assertion of the royal power by George III., there happened to be at the period of colonial growth in America, and the establishment of American independence, that condition of distinct and independent executive and legislative power which left its impress upon the American constitution; although in England the result of the cabinet system was the development of the final domination of the crown by parliament; id. ch. 4.

The same author finds several points in which the legislative procedure in the United States is traced naturally to that of England. The system of originating legislation by bills passed by both houses and submitted to the approval or veto of the executive, he traces back to the period when parliament began to take the initiative, and legislation arose from its petitions to the king. A like origin is attributed to certain privileges possessed by each house, such as, on the one hand, the judicial rights of the senate and the power of impeachment and of initiating money bills in the house. So also the privilege of members of both houses of freedom of speech, freedom from arrest, and the provision that each house is the judge of the election and qualification of its members; id.

Most of the American constitutions provide, in express though in different terms, for the separation of the three powers of government. See EXECUTIVE POWER. The constitutions of the United States, and a few of the states, do not have such a formal provision, but simply vest in the legislature, the legislative power; in the courts, the judicial power; in the executive, the executive power. These various constitutional provisions are collected in Stimson, Am. Stat. L. § 200. In most of them there is not only an express separation of powers, but also a prohibition against the assumption or discharge of the functions of any one department by a person or persons exercising the functions of another. And the Ohio constitution, Art. 2, § 32, provides that the legislature can exercise no judicial power not expressly conferred by the constitution. It is generally conceded, however, that those constitutions which simply vest the three powers in three distinct departments operate as clearly and distinctly as enjoining the separation of the departments as those in which there is an express provision, and this may be accepted as a settled principle of American constitutional law. In an early case it was said that "no power can be properly a legislative and properly a judicial power at the same time; and as to mixed powers, the separation of the departments in the manner prescribed by the constitution precludes the possibility of their existence." 2 D. Chip. 77. It is true, as suggested by another court, that there are many minor duties devolving upon a government which cannot be assigned, strictly speaking, to any one of the three departments; 84 Cal. 520. A suggestion has been made to characterize these nondescript duties as "administrative," but it is very truly remarked that this "does not much mend the matter, for it is at once obvious that this does not make a fourth department, but merely gives a name to a group of duties taken from the legislative and executive departments." 81 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 498. It might be added that the term administrative in this sense might have an application under the systems of continental Europe, where the executive exercises certain legislative functions not belonging to the office as we understand it. See EXECUTIVE POWER. The three departments are not merely equal, but exclusive, in respect to their duties, and absolutely independent of each other; 109 Ind. 8; one cannot inquire into the motives underlying the action of another; 8 id. 208. The executive power is much more easily defined than the other two. The greater difficulty of determining the boundary line between legislative and judicial power has been already alluded to under the latter title, as also have some of the reasons why the legislature has continued to exercise some powers which in their nature are judicial, even after the general acceptance of the theory that they should be separated. The difficulties of the subject arise more particularly in the determination of what are legislative and what are judicial acts, rather than in the scientific definition of the distinctive powers. The statement of the principles upon which the definitions rest is comparatively easy, and the cases abound in statements which in varying terms express the difference with sufficient accuracy; some of these cases have been cited in the other titles referred to. A terse expression is that of Mr. Justice Field: "The distinction between a judicial and a legislative act is well defined. The one determines what the law is, and what the rights of the parties are, with reference to transactions already had; the other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it." 99 U. S. 761. Another early statement of the distinction is: "A marked difference exists between the employment of judicial and legislative tribunals. The former decide upon the legality of claims and conduct, and the latter make rules upon which, in connection with the constitution, those decisions should be founded. It is the province of judges to determine what the law is upon existing cases. In fine, the law is applied by the one and made by the other. To do the first, therefore, to compare the claims of the parties with the law of the land before established, is, in its nature, a judicial act. But to do the last, to pass new rules for the regulation of new controversies, is, in its nature, a legislative act." 1 N. H. 204. "The distinction between legislative and judicial acts is that the former establishes a rule regulating and governing matters occurring after its passage, while the latter determines rights and obligations concerning matters which already exist, and have transpired before the judicial power is invoked to pass upon them." 68 Cal. 197; 4 Ill. 238; 1 N. H. 204. In cases where the doubt can be otherwise resolved, probably the best solution of the difficulty may be found in the suggestion that: "Since the legislative department is the broadest in scope, and perhaps corresponds most nearly to the original depositary of all the powers," or, it might be added, of the ultimate sovereignty, "it seems logical to leave to it the residuum, and say that everything not clearly executive or clearly judicial is legislative." 81 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 438. "And, in general, it is to be borne in mind that the question always is, not what is the etymological meaning of legislative and judicial, but what were in fact the functions of legislature and courts, respectively, at the time the constitution in question was framed." Id.; 30 W. Va. 482; 55 N. H. 179. It is of course to be borne in mind that this question is to be dealt with, so far as the states are concerned, solely with reference to the state constitution. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States which forbids the legislature of a state to exercise judicial functions; 2 Pet. 418.

In the earlier development of constitutional government in the United States the separation of the powers of government was less strictly observed than has been necessarily done under the later constitutions, in which it is expressly provided for and insisted upon; it may be remarked that the provisions of later constitutions on this subject are directed more particularly to the restraint of the legislative power within what are considered its proper bounds, with the view to abolish or avoid the abuses thought to attend the exercise of it in the past.

Mr. Justice Miller, in alluding to the settlement of the principle that the courts under the United States constitution are purely judicial bodies, observes that, under United States laws, the converse of this proposition does not hold good as to legislative bodies. He illustrates this by a case in which it was held that a territorial statute of Oregon divorcing a husband and wife, the former being a resident of Oregon and the latter with her children residents of Ohio, where they had been left by the husband under a promise to return or send for them, was a legitimate exercise of legislative power according to the then prevailing judicial opinion of the country, and the understanding of the legal profession at the date of the act creating the territorial government; 125 U. S. 190; and he adds by way of comment: "So extreme a case as this, where manifest injustice was done under the form of law, shows that legislatures ought not to exercise judicial powers; or, at least, if they do exercise them, should be required to cite in all interested parties before they do it." Miller, Const. U. S. 356. The passage of divorce bills by legislatures has, at times, been very frequent in some states; but the tendency of public opinion is decidedly in the line of the comment of Mr. Justice Miller above cited. It is undoubtedly the most extreme case of exercise of legislative power which verges nearly upon the judicial.

In many of the later state constitutions the legislature is expressly prohibited from passing divorce bills, but in the absence of such provision it has been held that the legislature has the power; 2 Kelly 191; 8 Yerg. 77; 125 U. S. 190. The recognition of this power in the United States was simply a continuance of the rule which was in force in England at the time of our independence; and it was treated as a matter of history that the power existed. The English parliament has always passed such bills, and may do so at the present time, except so far as the power may be considered modified by the divorce act of 1857; L. R. 11 App. Cas. 294; 12 id. 812, 861, 864; 18 id. 741.

In states where there was an express division of governmental powers the question has arisen in several cases whether the power to grant a divorce was so far judicial as to make its exercise by the legislature unconstitutional. It has been so held in several cases; 4 Mo. 147; 12 id. 498; 17 id. 590; 28 id. 192; 4 Fla. 23; see 12 Pa. 351. In some cases it has been held that a legislative divorce was valid where the court had no jurisdiction; 51 Me. 480; 2 G. Greene 604; but not otherwise, under a constitution separating the powers; 16 Me. 479. On the other hand it has been held that such action by the legislature is not an invasion of the judicial power; 6 Conn. 547; 2 Md. 429; 2 Wash. Ter. 8; and the United States supreme court in a case cited supra held that the separation of governmental powers, and the implied prohibitions resulting therefrom were not intended to exclude the legislative power over the marriage relation; 125 U. S. 190. In Delaware, where the practice of legislative divorces has always prevailed, while as an original question it was considered that the power might be doubted, it was considered that too many rights of person and property would be disturbed to warrant the court in doing otherwise than to uphold legislative divorces; 4 Harring. 442. And in Kentucky there have been a number of intimations on the subject, the result of which seems to be that the separation of the governmental powers would be violated by legislative divorces; 3 B. Monroe 90; at least after the commencement of a suit in the courts; 9 id. 295; that where it was founded on the application of one party for breach of contract by the other, it was judicial; 7 Dana 184; but not where it was for the benefit of and acquiesced in by both parties; 1 Metc. (Ky.) 819. The theory of the last case would seem to violate the doctrine which underlies divorce as a judicial proceeding, that no divorce should be obtainable by collusion. It is very well understood that this principle is constantly violated, but usually sub silentio and certainly without formal recognition by the court. See also 18 L. R. A. 95, where cases arising under different constitutional provisions are collected; DIVORCE.

In some early cases efforts were made to obtain legislative relief from what were considered "hard cases" in the courts, and acts granting an appeal in a special case were held to be an encroachment upon the judicial power; 2 D. Chip. 77; 3 Greenl. 298; but in a similar case from Connecticut it was held an act of judicial and not legislative authority, but was sustained upon the ground that under the then existing constitution of Connecticut, judicial power was not forbidden to the legislature; 3 Dall. 398. Though the idea of the effect of the constitutional separation of powers was not at first easily understood, it was made apparent as cases were passed upon by the courts that their judgments were subject to no control by the other departments of the government except such as might be given to them by constitutional provisions concerning pardons; 31 Gratt. 105; nor is interference by the legislature permissible "to change the decision of cases pending before the courts, or to impair or set aside their judgments, or to take cases out of the general courts of judicial proceedings;" 2 Allen 361. It has been held that the legislature cannot regulate the issuing of injunctions; 5 Cal. 73; interpret such existing laws as do not apply to its own duties; 43 Mo. 410; 16 N. Y. 424; grant a new trial, or direct the court to order it; 15 Pa. 18; open a judgment to let in garnishees to amend and set aside a verdict obtained against them; 4 R. I. 324; make a judgment of a justice of the peace final and conclusive (under the constitution of the state); 5 Ark. 358; authorize the sale and conversion into personalty of land devised in perpetuity for a charitable use; 1 Houst. 580; give construction to a charter; 64 Miss. 378; legalize defective pleadings without first requiring them to be amended; 31 Cal. 196; remit fines and forfeitures; 26 Ala. 439; provide by resolution that a criminal should be discharged by a court; 7 Humph. 152; validate a transaction which the courts have held void; 129 Mass. 559; or ascertain indebtedness and direct payment between parties; 10 Yerg. 59; 4 Ill. 238. In short, the determination of a question of right, or obligation, or of property as the foundation of a proceeding is a judicial act and not within the legislative power; 68 Cal. 197; 99 U. S. 761. The legislature cannot declare what the law was, but what it will be; 2 Cra. 272.

"It is perhaps true that the lines which separate the legislative and the judicial power are sometimes not very clearly defined, but they are becoming more and more so. That is a judicial power which, in a controversy, decides the right to property between citizens or proper parties. Such a determination is not a legislative power. If a legislature, or at least such a body acting within the dominion of the government of the United States, should undertake to declare that certain property which belonged to A should become the property of B, it would be an invasion of the judicial function, and therefore wholly inoperative and void. No court would hesitate to declare that such a determination was within the province of the courts alone; that the legislature could not effect it, because of this separation of the judicial and legislative powers which is made by the constitution." Miller, Const. U. S. 348. See 1 De Tocqueville, Dem. in America 58.

The legislature has power when unrestrained by a constitutional provision to make a void thing valid by a curative statute; 18 Ind. 338; to declare that executions provisionally issued by justices of the peace, more than two and less than five years after the judgments on which they were issued were rendered, shall not be invalid on that account; 19 Miss. 17; or to authorize the reopening of judgments in which the state is plaintiff for the purpose of setting up a new defence; 26 Cal. 135. But it cannot overthrow judgments by legislative mandate, curative statutes, or otherwise; 107 Ind. 31; nor render valid a judgment which would otherwise be void, since the effect would be the rendition of a judgment by the legislature which is beyond its power; 58 Mich. 364; 40 N. J. L. 383; even if expository statutes be held effective from their date, being practically a new enactment to give them retroactive effect would reverse decisions already made, and they cannot control the interpretation of the courts in dealing with causes of action already accrued; 3 Cra. 194; 11 Mass. 396; 11 Pa. 489; Cooley, Const. Lim. [94]; 31 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 440. See RETROSPECTIVE; STATUTE; EX POST FACTO.

In most of the cases above referred to the distinction between judicial and legislative power is sharply defined, but the cases which present difficulty are of a different character. Cases of a class presenting more difficulty arise under statutes authorizing the organization of municipal corporations and the change of their boundaries by the courts. Such acts have been held to present judicial questions; 43 Ia. 253; 23 Neb. 426; 42 Kan. 627; 44 id. 577; 48 id. 738; 5 id. 673. A critical examination of these cases and the authorities upon which they were based results in the conclusion that they did not "afford a very secure foundation for a decision that needs authority to rest on and . . . will be generally regarded as out of harmony with the principles heretofore laid down as settled." The real nature of the proceedings it is said are "more apparent in the Kansas cases because they masquerade less in the guise of an ordinary lawsuit." 31 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 443. The writer just cited suggests that the mere necessity of determining facts does not constitute a judicial act, nor is a question judicial simply because it calls for judgment and discretion. The subdivision of a state for the purpose of local government is pre-eminently a subject for legislative action. The practical effect of the Kansas statute was said by the court to be the submission to a judge in advance of its enactment the question of the legality of a city ordinance; 43 Kan. 633; and this it is suggested was sufficient to cast doubt upon its validity.

The decision of questions of public policy relating to the organization of municipal corporations cannot be exercised by a judge, but properly belongs to the legislative department; 54 N. J. L. 289; in this case it was held that a justice of the supreme court could not be authorized by an act of assembly to decide within what territory resident voters should be permitted to assume municipal existence and authority. It is well settled that more abstract questions or moot cases cannot be submitted for the decision of the court; Cooley, Const. L. 139; 1 Ind. 21; 8 Mo. 313; accordingly it has been held that: "Whether cities, towns or villages should be incorporated, whether enlarged or contracted in their boundaries, presents no question of law or fact for judicial determination. It is purely a question of policy to be determined by the legislative department." 73 Ill. 152; 30 Minn. 540; 29 Mich. 451; 24 N. Y. 86; 70 Cal. 461. Upon the same principle it was held that the division of a state into drainage districts and their organization was a legislative function and could not be delegated to executive officers if it could be delegated at all; 59 Cal. 634. So an act authorizing a court upon petition of taxpayers to supersede, revoke, and annul municipal ordinances was a grant of legislative power and void; 80 W. Va. 478; there is no legislative power to confer upon the judiciary the power of taxation; 43 N. J. L. 348; or to require courts to state in writing the reasons of their decisions; 13 Cal. 24; or to appoint surveyors; 58 Mich. 364; or judges to write headnotes for their opinions; 118 Ind. 88; or to fix railroad rates or transportation; 72 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 718.

But courts have no power to inquire into the necessity for an act creating a new judicial district, as that is purely a legislative question; 82 Pac. Rep. (Wyo.) 850.

The question whether a law is wise or just is a legislative and not a judicial question; 180 U. S. 581. So congress can determine whether claims upon the public treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations, and upon principles of right and justice; and having decided such questions in the affirmative, and having appropriated public money for the payment of such claims, its decision can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the government; 103 U. S. 427.

The courts have no power to inquire whether notice of an application to the legislature for local or special legislation required by the state constitution, and legislation defining it, has been given. But the legislature is the sole judge of that, and the passage of an act is a legislative judgment that it was properly done; 29 Fla. 1.

The provision of the Chinese Deportation Act of May 6, 1892, which puts the burden of proof upon a Chinese laborer arrested for having no certificate, and requires proof by one capable white witness that he was a resident of the United States at the time of the passage of the act, is within the legislative power to prescribe rules with respect to the admissibility and effect of evidence; 149 U. S. 698.

Legislative power to pass a statute is not established by the enactment of previous statutes of the same character, unless such legislation has been uniform and its validity acquiesced in; 6 App. Div. N. Y. 277.

The legislative power has been held to authorize acts—to make conspiracy to do an act punishable more severely than the doing of the act itself; 169 U. S. 590; to prohibit the removal into a court of errors and appeals of cases of contested elections; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 880; to provide that courts shall be open at any place in the district where the judge may be; 42 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 107; to deprive individuals of the right to engage in liquor traffic, though such power is not expressly granted by the constitution, and there is a general reservation to the people of all rights not enumerated; 42 S. C. 229; to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors; 123 U. S. 828; to authorize a particular person to act as guardian without bond; 116 N. C. 795; to convert real into personal estate for purposes beneficial to those interested, not sui juris; 16 Mass. 326; but not for those who are qui juris; 53 N. Y. 245; 2 Seld. 353.

A provision in the charter of a railroad company authorizing the guardian of a minor to agree upon the amount of damages for taking the land of a minor is not an invasion of the judicial power but is an exercise of legislative power only; 69 Miss. 989.

The legislature has no power to reimburse a public officer for money lost in his official capacity, particularly where the money belonged to the state school fund, and was not raised by taxation; and the officer repaid the money lost out of his private funds; 188 Ind. 321.

A question which has given rise to much discussion is the authority of the legislature to require what are known as advisory opinions from courts or judges upon general questions submitted as distinguished from the questions naturally arising in a litigated case. As to the effect of such opinions as precedents, see PRECEDENT. It was early settled as to the federal judges that their judicial duties did not require or empower them to answer such questions; see 4 Am. Jur. 293; 2 Dall. 410, n.; 13 How. 52, n. In some states there are constitutional provisions authorizing the request for such opinions, and in other states there are statutes merely, at least one of which has been held unconstitutional; 10 Minn. 78; s. c. 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 181-3, and notes; and it has been said, "one would expect the same decision with regard to the others if they were contested;" 31 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 456.

In Massachusetts, where there is a constitutional authority for such questions (with reference to a statute making education compulsory), the justices declined to give an opinion when "required" to do so by the legislature, assigning the reason that the legislature had power to ask for such opinions only "upon important questions of law and upon solemn occasions;" 148 Mass. 623. This decision is criticised in an elaborate article, which discusses the power historically and reviews the opinions given by judges in all the states having constitutional provisions on the subject; 24 Am. L. Rev. 369. See also 126 Mass. 557; Thayer, Legal Effect of Opinions of Judges (Pamphlet).

Not only is it beyond the power of the legislature to confer non-judicial functions upon courts and judges, but also, to vest judicial power in any one else. Hence a statute authorizing the election, by agreement of parties, of a member of the bar to try a case in which a judge is interested, was held void; 39 Wis. 390.

Congress can neither withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which from its nature is the subject of a suit at common law, or in equity, or admiralty, nor bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination; 18 How. 272.

As to the legislative power to provide for taking private property for public use, and the legislative function of determining what is a public use, see EMINENT DOMAIN.

As to the authority of the courts to declare statutes unconstitutional and invalid, see CONSTITUTIONAL AND JUDICIAL POWER. In the former is also discussed the theory sometimes advanced, but having no substantial basis of authority, that upon some higher ground than that of constitutionality the acts of the legislature may be reviewed by the courts. In a line with the authorities there cited on this subject, and speaking upon the point that the legislative power operating upon proper subject-matter is uncontrolled otherwise than by constitutional restriction, it was said by Storrs, J., speaking for the supreme court of Connecticut: "The defendant insists that we should pronounce the law now in question to be void, on the ground that it is opposed to natural right, and the fundamental principles of civil liberty. We are by no means prepared to accede to the doctrine involved in this claim, that, under a written constitution like ours, in which the three great departments of government, the executive, legislative, and judicial, are confided to distinct bodies of magistracy, the powers of each of which are expressly confined to its own proper department, and in which the powers of each are unlimited in its appropriate sphere, except so far as they are abridged by the constitution itself, it is competent for the judicial department to deprive the legislature of powers which they are not restricted from exercising by that instrument. It would seem to be sufficient to prevent us from thus interposing, that the power exercised by the legislature is properly legislative in its character, which is unquestionably the case with respect to the law we have been considering, and that the constitution contains no restriction upon its exercise in regard to the subject of it." 25 Conn. 290. "I am opposed to the judiciary attempting to set bounds to legislative authority, or declaring a statute invalid upon any fanciful theory of higher law or first principles of natural right outside the constitution. If the courts may imply limitation, there is no bound to implication except judicial discretion, which must place the courts above the legislature and also the constitution itself. This is hostile to the theory of the government. The constitution is the only standard for the courts to determine the question of statutory validity." Hubbard, J., in 18 N. Y. 878; 13 N. Y. 430; Iredell, J., in 8 Dall. 886.

It is well settled that the validity of an exercise of legislative power is presumed, and must be sustained by the court unless it can be clearly shown to be in conflict with the constitution. The principle is thus well stated: "But it is to be borne in mind, that in determining the question whether a statute is within the legitimate sphere of legislative action, it is the duty of courts to make all reasonable presumptions in favor of its validity. It is not to be supposed that the law-making power has transcended its authority, or committed, under the form of law, a violation of individual rights. When an act has been passed with all the requisites necessary to give it the force of a binding statute, it must be regarded as valid, unless it can be clearly shown to be in conflict with the constitution. It is therefore incumbent on those who deny the validity of a statute, to show that it is a plain and palpable violation of constitutional right." 16 Gray 417. It is a well-settled principle of American constitutional law that the legislative power of the state is unlimited except by constitutional prohibition, while that of the Federal congress, though equally unlimited within the scope of its granted powers, is limited to the exercise of these powers. "The distinction between the United States constitution and our state constitution is, that the former confers upon congress certain specified powers only, while the latter confers on the legislature all legislative power. In the one case the powers specifically granted can only be exercised. In the other, all legislative powers not prohibited may be exercised." Church, C. J., in 46 N. Y. 401, 404.

"With as full respect for the authority of former decisions as belongs, from teaching and habit, to judges trained in the common-law system of jurisprudence, we think that there may be questions touching the powers of legislative bodies, which can never be finally closed by the decisions of a court, and that the one that we have here considered is of this character." 16 How. 869.

Among the administrative rules laid down by Judge Cooley and quoted with great approval by Professor Thayer, is this: "When a statute is adjudged to be unconstitutional, it is as if it had never been. Rights cannot be built up under it; contracts which depend upon it for their consideration are void; it constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it, and no one can be punished for having refused obedience to it before the decision was made. And what is true of an act void in toto is true also as to any part of an act which is found to be unconstitutional, and which, consequently, is to be regarded as having never, at any time, been possessed of any legal force." Cooley, Const. Lim. 188 and cases cited; 1 Thayer, Cas. Const. L. 175. Other authorities, however, have taken a different view, and the expression that a law is declared by the courts to be unconstitutional and void has been characterized as a common misapprehension as to the effect of a judicial decision upon the constitutionality of a law. It is said that what the court really does in such a case is to ignore the statute and decide the case in hand as if it did not exist; 80 W. Va. 479; the question is simply whether the act furnishes the rule to govern the particular case, and the general abstract question of the constitutionality of an act cannot be directly presented; 9 Ohio St. 543; "The act is not stricken from the statute book, and it is not superseded, revoked, or annulled. If the courts afterwards change their minds, as did the Supreme Court of the United States in the legal tender cases, the statute is just as effective as if it had never been pronounced unconstitutional." 31 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 448. The latter view is undoubtedly correct. It was an early custom for the legislature to repeal laws which had been held to be unconstitutional; 19 Am. L. Rev. 188. It is nevertheless true that the practice of the government would rather have seemed to have settled down to the view expressed by Judge Cooley as it is customary where serious doubt is expressed regarding the constitutionality of a law, to have presented to a court a test case and when a decision has been rendered by the court of last resort adverse to the statute, it is acquiesced in by the other departments of the government. Familiar and recent instances of this were the decisions adverse to the federal income tax law and the Pennsylvania alien tax law, each of which were held to be unconstitutional and thereupon no further attempt was made to enforce them.

It is a familiar principle that one legislature cannot limit or control the legislative actions of its successors and needs no citation to support it; 5 Cow. 588. In a late case this principle was reiterated and it was said to be necessary that each successive body should be left untrammelled except by the restraints of the fundamental law; 111 N. Y. 132; 153 U. S. 628.

The legislature has power to make a contract binding on the state; it is a necessary attribute of sovereignty; 16 How. 369; and it may by such contract, based on a consideration, exempt the property of an individual or corporation from taxation, either for a specified period or permanently; 8 Wall. 430, 439; see also 3 How. 133. In these cases there was a line of very vigorous dissenting opinions in one of which Mr. Justice Miller said: "We do not believe that any legislative body sitting under a state constitution of the usual character has a right to sell, to give, or to bargain away forever the taxing power of the state." 8 Wall. 441.

Nor can the police power be bartered away or shackled by any one legislature. It may, for example, create a corporation with power to do the business of handling and slaughtering live stock, but it cannot continue that right so that no future legislature can repeal or modify it, or grant similar privileges to others; it cannot by contract with an individual restrain the power of a subsequent legislature to legislate for the public welfare and to that end to suppress practices tending to corrupt public morals; 111 U. S. 746; 48 Miss. 147; 84 N. Y. 657, 663; 97 U. S. 28, 28; 101 id. 814; 197 U. S. 659.

When its power has not been exceeded and the state is bound by its action, a legislature has no power to revoke its own grants; 6 Cra. 87; 8 Wheat. 1.

Some of the most important questions under this title relate to the subject of the delegation of power. The general doctrine as to delegation of governmental powers has been briefly stated, and some authorities cited, elsewhere. See DELEGATION.

The general principle that the legislative power cannot be delegated is thus tersely expressed by Chief Justice Gibson: "Under a well-balanced constitution the legislature can no more delegate its proper function than can the judiciary." 5 W. & S. 288. And see Locke, Civ. Govt. § 142.

It has very often been said,—that legislative power cannot be delegated is elementary law. The difficulty is in determining what authority or discretion may be conferred on a body other than the legislature without contravening constitutional principle. The general question was the subject of extended discussion in a case sustaining the validity of an act conferring upon railroad commissioners the power to determine what are reasonable rates for transportation; 83 Minn. 281.

In that case the court quotes from a previous decision (39 Minn. 474) the general rule against the delegation of legislative power, as requiring the legislature to pass upon two things, the authority to make, and the expediency of the enactment. The court then proceeds to lay down a limitation for the rule growing out of the necessity of the exercise of discretion and judgment in the exercise of certain powers. Attention is directed to the difficulty in many cases of discriminating between what is properly legislative and what may be executive or administrative duty, and it is said that, while still recognizing the difference between the departments of government, "the maker of the law may commit something to the discretion of the other departments, and the precise boundary of this power is a subject of delicate and difficult inquiry into which a court will not necessarily enter." (10 Wheat. 1, 46.) The principle is repeatedly recognized by all courts that the legislature may authorize others to do things which it might properly, but cannot conveniently or advantageously, do itself. All laws are carried into execution by officers appointed for that purpose; some with more, others with less, but all clothed with power sufficient for the efficient execution of the law. These powers often necessarily involve in a large degree the exercise of discretion and judgment even to the extent of investigating and determining the facts and acting upon them in accordance with the facts as thus found. In fact this must be so, if the legislature is to be permitted effectually to exercise its constitutional powers. If this was not permissible, the wheels of government would often be blocked and the sovereign state find itself hopelessly entangled in the meshes of its own constitution. A number of examples are given of statutes granting discretionary powers to officers charged with the execution of the laws; power given to boards in control of public institutions to make contracts, adopt rules, etc.; the assessment of property for the purpose of taxation; the exercise of the police power in requiring and granting licenses, and the conclusion is stated in the exact words of Judge Ranney, quoted infra. The decision of the Minnesota case was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon grounds not affecting the general statement of the doctrine of the delegation of legislative power; 134 U. S. 418.

This question was elaborately considered by the supreme court in Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649. In this case it was held that the authority conferred by a tariff act upon the president to suspend by proclamation the free introduction of sugar, etc., when he should be satisfied that any country producing such articles imposed duties or other exactions upon agricultural or other products of the United States, did not conflict with the recognized principle that congress could not delegate its legislative power to the president. The law was complete when it was declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency, the president was the mere agent to ascertain the event upon which the legislative will was to take effect. The court quotes with approval the language, often cited, of Ranney, J., in 1 Ohio St. 88: "The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made." Two Pennsylvania cases are quoted with approval as follows: "Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it cannot be said that the exercise of such discretion is the making of the law." 21 Pa. 188, 202. "To assert that a law is less than a law, because it is made to depend on a future event or act, is to rob the legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed, or to things future and impossible to fully know." The proper distinction, the court said, was this: "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the law-making power, and must, therefore, be subject to inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation." 73 Pa. 491, 498.

The authority given by congress to the secretary of war to prescribe rules and regulations for the use, administration, and control of canals, etc., owned or operated by the United States, is held not to be a delegation of legislative power, and rules made pursuant thereto have the force of law; 74 Fed. Rep. 207. So also an act is valid which authorizes the secretary of war in his discretion to require the alteration of bridges which are obstructions to navigation; 82 Fed. Rep. 592.

A very important branch of this subject is the question of legislative power to make the enactment of a law depend in one form or another upon the result of a submission to a popular vote. There have been many cases upon the subject and some conflict of opinion, but the right of the legislature to refer to the voters of a district or territory, such as a county or municipality, a question local in its nature would seem to be quite well settled. Such questions are the division of a county or township and the formation of a new one; 5 Gill 1; see also 24 Wis. 149; 55 Mo. 295; the reuniting of two separate ones which were formerly one; 8 Pa. 391; 51 Ill. 94; 46 Me. 206; 49 Cal. 478; whether a general school law shall be operative in a particular municipality; 45 Mo. 459; as to the location of a county seat; 10 Pa. 214; 38 Wis. 504; 51 Ill. 37; or its removal; 82 Md. 528; so whether a municipality may make an improvement or incur a debt; 8 Leigh 120; 45 Ala. 696; 23 N. Y. 439; 12 Ohio N. S. 596, 624; 21 How. 539, 547; 23 id. 381; 3 Wall. 327, 634; 44 Mo. 504; 17 Cal. 23; 24 Ill. 75; or have a revision of its charter; 54 Ga. 317; or the regulation of live stock in a subdivision of a county; 87 Tex. 598. Such questions as these, it is said, may always with propriety be referred to the voters of a municipality for decision; Cooley, Const. Lim. [120], where a very large number of cases are collected.

Upon the question whether this principle may be applied to the state at large and the operation of a law be made to depend upon the result of a popular vote, the weight of judicial opinion is decidedly to the effect that it is an unlawful delegation of legislative power; 2 La. 165; 9 id. 203; 48 Cal. 279, 313; 26 N. Y. 470; 17 Mo. 539; 45 id. 458; 83 id. 606; 17 Tex. 441; 4 Ore. 132; 73 Ga. 604; 25 Md. 562; 73 id. 428.

Earlier cases, however, have maintained this view more strongly than later ones. The ground upon which the doctrine of the invalidity of such legislation is based is very well stated in the leading case of Bartow v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 489. In that case it was said by Ruggles, C. J., that the exercise of such power by the people is forbidden by necessary implication. The entire power of legislation is vested in the legislature, and it has no power to submit a proposed law to the people who voluntarily surrendered the power of direct legislation when they adopted as a form of government a representative democracy.

There are, however, opposing opinions expressed with much force. Redfield, C. J., considers the arguments by which the doctrine is sustained to be "the result of false analogies and so founded upon a latent fallacy," though he admits that he was "at first, without much examination, somewhat inclined to the same opinion." 26 Vt. 357.

The argument pressed as against the prevailing doctrine is that it is competent for the legislature to pass a law which shall only take effect upon the happening of a contingency and that it is no extension of this principle to provide that the contingency shall be a popular vote in its favor; Dixon, C. J., in 38 Wis. 291. In the Vermont case the act held valid was to take effect in any contingency; but in case of a popular vote being against it, the time when it should take effect was postponed to a later day; and in the Wisconsin case an act taxing shares in national banks was to take effect only after approval of a majority of the electors voting on the subject at a general election. In another case similar to that in Vermont the court was equally divided; 3 Mich. 343.

This question of the submission of the legislation to a popular vote has been specially considered in connection with so-called local option laws as to which there has been strong pressure of public opinion tending towards the relaxation of the strictness of the earlier rule and the tendency to hold that the question, whether a general police regulation should be of force in a particular locality, might be submitted to the voters of the district. As to cases on this subject, see DELEGATION; LIQUOR LAWS; LOCAL OPTION.

With respect to any subject matter proper to be submitted to a popular vote it is held that the expression of the sovereign will of the legislature that a particular proposition or question be so submitted need not take the form of a law, but it may be in the form of a joint resolution; the secretary of state must certify to the proper officers of the various counties in the state a joint resolution passed by the legislature, that the question whether a constitutional convention should be held should be submitted to the people; and in case of his refusal he may be compelled by mandamus to do so; 68 N. W. Rep. (N. Dak.) 418.

Acts held invalid as an improper delegation by the legislature of the police power are a provision that a boiler inspector's act shall not apply to boilers inspected by insurance companies and certified by their authorized inspectors to be safe; 68 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 77; an act providing that hogs shall not run at large in a county, if the county courts on petition of voters direct that the act be enforced therein; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 666; an act directing the insurance commissioner to prescribe a standard policy and forbidding the use of any other; 166 Pa. 73; acts authorizing insurance commissioners to adopt a printed form of fire policy with conditions indorsed thereon, which, as nearly as possible, in type and form shall conform to that adopted by another state; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 738; 59 Minn. 182. In the last case it was admitted that an act similar to that of Pennsylvania would be invalid, but it was unsuccessfully contended that the legislative direction to conform as nearly as possible to a specified policy would take the case out of the principle laid down by the Pennsylvania court. So also was an act permitting a justice to put a person charged with drunkenness as a disorderly person under recognizance to take the treatment of a private corporation administering a cure for drunkenness, and providing that on reports showing compliance, he should be acquitted and discharged; 99 Mich. 117.

A law providing for the adjustment of state bonds, and authorizing judges to decide which of two sections of the act should take effect, gives them legislative power and is void; 29 Minn. 474; in this case the subject was very elaborately argued, and the distinction between legislative and judicial power is very clearly stated by the court. See supra.

The legislature cannot leave to commissioners the power to decide in what proportion the expense of laying out and opening a public avenue should be imposed on townships of a county or wards of a city; 87 N. J. L. 12.

Acts held not to be a delegation of legislative power and therefore valid, are authorizing the fish commissioners to give permits to take fish for propagation at times and by methods otherwise prohibited; 101 Mich. 98; requiring carriers of passengers to furnish their agents with certificates of authority to sell tickets, on which a license shall be issued by the state; 57 Minn. 347; authorizing a court to issue certificates of incorporation to municipalities; 89 W. Va. 179; permitting the board of supervisors of counties to determine whether a county shall come within or remain without the provisions of an act to establish law libraries; 99 Cal. 571; providing that an act in relation to public roads shall not go into effect until recommended by the grand jury; 91 Ga. 770; authorizing railroad and warehouse commissioners to make a schedule of a maximum rate of charges for each railroad company in the state; 140 Ill. 861; authorizing the union of two railroad companies and that the united company may discontinue such operations of the road as the directors deem necessary; 66 N. H. 569; authorizing railroad commissioners to regulate freights; 70 Ga. 694; or to make reasonable regulations for the prevention of excessive charges and unjust discrimination; 111 N. C. 403; or to order a company to remove grade crossings and on its failure to do so to determine the portion of the expense thereof which is to be paid by the company; 62 Conn. 527; to provide that the mayors of cities of a certain class may be elected by the people or appointed by the council as provided by ordinance; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 629; to authorize park commissioners to determine where and of what material sidewalks and road beds shall be constructed; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 405; to authorize a state medical board to exercise powers of registration and examination; 88 Ohio L. J. 239; s. c. 47 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 1041.

Authority to transfer cases pending in a territorial court to the federal courts may be delegated to a constitutional convention, upon the admission of the territory as a state; 82 Fed. Rep. 340.

The legislature cannot delegate its law-making power, but it has the power to create municipal corporations and to invest them with the powers of local government, including particularly local taxation and police regulation; Cooley, Const. Lim. [191]. Judge Cooley considers that local self-government being a part of the English and American system, it is to be understood that even if it is not expressly recognized in a constitution, the instrument is presumed to contemplate its existence and continuance; id. [35]; 28 Mich. 228; 55 N. Y. 50. It is a legitimate exercise of sovereignty belonging to the legislative power of a state to create corporate bodies for municipal purposes with the means of self-government; 8 Humph. 1; or to delegate to municipal assemblies the power of enacting ordinances relating to local matters; 164 U. S. 471. This is not regarded as a delegation of legislative power, because the local board or municipal body which is invested with such powers is regarded as exercising them as an agency for local legislation of the sovereign power of the state. The settled judicial opinion is thus well expressed: "It seems to be generally conceded that powers of local legislation may be granted to cities, towns, and other municipal corporations. And it would require strong reasons to satisfy us that it could have been the design of the framers of our constitution to take from the legislature a power which has been exercised in Europe by governments of all classes from the earliest history, and the exercise of which has probably done more to promote civilization than all other causes combined; which has been constantly exercised in every part of our country from its earliest settlement, and which has raised up among us many of our most valuable institutions." Bell, J., in 10 Fost. 292; 114 Mass. 214; 65 Pa. 78; 29 Wis. 415; 15 N. Y. 532; 45 Mo. 459; 50 Ala. 486. The creation of such corporations and the grant to them of powers of local legislation do not divest or impair the general legislative power and control of the state legislature, which may increase, diminish, or take away such powers, amend the charter, overrule their legislative action, or abolish them altogether. There can be acquired by the municipal corporation as against the state no vested right in the rights and franchises granted to it, and the municipal charter does not constitute a contract, so that such legislation would be considered in violation of the constitutional provision protecting the obligation of contracts; Cooley, Const. Lim. [192]. This principle is recognized in the Dartmouth College case; 4 Wheat. 518; Dillon, Municipal Corporations §§ 24, 30, 37; see 24 Mich. 87; and it may be affirmed that it is supported by a uniform current of authority. It is true that here and there may be found expressions by courts and judges, which, to the casual reader, would give the impression that there may be some inviolable character attached to a grant of municipal franchises, but an examination of such cases will usually, if not invariably, disclose the fact that the expressions referred to go beyond the proper consideration of the case in question, and in any case are unsupported by authority. The true principle is thus stated: "Public corporations are but parts of the machinery employed in carrying on the affairs of the state; and they are subject to be changed, modified, or destroyed as the exigencies of the public may demand. The state may exercise a general superintendence and control over them and their rights and effects, so that their property is not diverted from the uses and objects for which it was given or purchased;" 18 Ill. 30. The complete legislative control over municipal corporations is said to be subject to some limits, of which some are "expressly defined; others spring from the usages, customs, and maxims of our people; they are a part of its history, a part of the system of local self-government, in view of the continuance and perpetuity of which all our institutions are framed, and of the right to which the people can never be deprived through express renunciation on their part." Cooley, Const. Lim. [230]. See IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

Such is the right of choosing under forms and restrictions prescribed by the legislature, officers of local administration, and the determination by the local administration of the pecuniary burdens it will assume; Cooley, Const. Lim. [230]; so it has been held that the legislature cannot divest a municipal corporation, of property legally acquired by it; R. M. Charl. 842. As the rule is sometimes expressed, municipal powers may be changed by the legislature if vested rights acquired thereunder are saved; 13 Cal. 343; 27 How. Pr. 342.

Where the legislature uses its power to change or modify the political rights and privileges of municipal corporations, a distinction is drawn between those rights and mere property rights acquired by the corporation, which are protected for the same reasons and upon the same principle as are similar rights in individuals; Cooley, Const. Lim. [237], where the cases are collected.

In any state the legislative power must spend its force within its own territorial limits. It cannot make laws by which people outside of the jurisdiction must govern their actions except as they choose to resort to the remedies provided by the state or deal with property situated within it. See FOREIGN CORPORATIONS; LEX FORI. It can have no authority upon the high seas beyond state lines because that is the point of contact with other nations and brings into operation and consideration the principles of international law with which the federal government alone can deal. See FISHERY; SEA. As a general rule the state cannot provide for the punishment of acts committed beyond the state boundary, because such acts, if offences at all, are such only against the sovereignty within whose limits they have been done; Cooley, Const. Lim. [126]. In some cases, however, where "the consequences of an unlawful act committed outside the state, have reached their ultimate and injurious result within it, it seems that the perpetrator may be punished as an offender against such state." Id. Such cases arise most frequently where property is stolen in one jurisdiction and carried into another, or where a homicide is committed by a mortal blow in one jurisdiction while death results in another; see 8 Mich. 320; 11 id. 327; 2 Park. Cr. R. 590; 36 Miss. 593; 16 Wis. 328; 35 N. C. 603.

The legislative power over a place purchased by the United States with the consent of the legislature of the state, is transferred from the state to the federal government, except as restrained by some qualification in the expression of state consent; 53 Pa. 492. See JURISDICTION.

LEGISLATURE. That body of men which makes the laws for a state or nation. See LEGISLATIVE POWER. The deliberative, representative bodies that make the laws for the people of the respective States. 253 U. S. 227.

LEGITIMACY. The state of being born in lawful marriage. See BASTARD; PRESUMPTION; INTENDMENT OF LAW; CHILD.

LEGITIMACY DECLARATION ACTS. English statutes which provide that any natural born subject of the queen, being domiciled in England or Ireland, or claiming any real or personal estate in England, may apply to the high court of justice for a decree declaring that the petitioner is the legitimate child of his parents, and that the marriage of his father and mother, or of his grandfather and grandmother, was a valid marriage, or for a decree declaring that his own marriage was valid. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 93.

LEGITIMATE. That which is according to law.

To make lawful; to confer legitimacy; to place a child born before marriage on the same footing as those born in lawful wedlock. 26 Vt. 653.

LEGITIMATION. The act of giving the character of legitimate children to those who were not so born.

Legitimation is a fiction of the law, whereby one born out of lawful wedlock is considered the offspring of the marriage between the parents. 24 La. Ann. 580.

In Louisiana, the Civil Code, art. 217, enacts that "children born out of marriage, except those who are born of an incestuous or adulterous connection, may be legitimated by the subsequent marriage of their father and mother, whenever the latter have legally acknowledged them for their children, either before their marriage, or by the contract of marriage itself."

The legitimation of natural children was permitted in none of the earlier German codes, except the Lombard, and was strongly opposed to the whole spirit of German family law, but that the father could, by symbolic forms, acknowledge his natural child and give him a place and protection within his household is proved from German and Scandinavian sources. Among the Anglo-Saxons, a child born in unlawful marriage had no rights of inheritance, and it may be inferred that all other rights of kindred were denied to it except that of protection, even when acknowledged by the father. Essays, Ang.-Sax. L. 126. In the conflict between the church and the law at the Herton parliament in regard to the question whether a bastard could be legitimated, the barons declared with one voice that they would not change the laws of England, and that nothing could make a bastard legitimate, although it was contended that the old English custom authorized legitimation by allowing the parents on the occasion of their marriage to place such children beneath the cloak under which they stood whilst the marriage ceremony was performed, the children thereby becoming "mantle children," but this practice the king's court of Henry II. had rejected and that of Henry III. refused to retreat from the precedent. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 695.

In Maine, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, the Dakotas, Idaho, Montana, and New Mexico, marriage of the parents legitimizes an illegitimate child.

In Massachusetts, Vermont, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arizona, in addition to the marriage of the parents the father must have acknowledged or recognized the child as his.

In New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Louisiana, both parents must acknowledge, but in the last named state the acknowledgment is made either by an authentic act before marriage or by the contract of marriage, and an exception is made of those children born of an incestuous or adulterous connection. In California, Nevada, the Dakotas, and Idaho, a public acknowledgment by the father of an illegitimate child, receiving such child (with the consent of his wife, if married) into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were legitimate, thereby renders it legitimate for all purposes. Acknowledgment by either or both parents, or by the father with the consent of his wife, or by the mother with the consent of her husband, will legitimize a child. In Michigan, if the father, by writing executed, acknowledged, and recorded like deeds of real estate, but with the judge of probate, acknowledge such child, he is legitimate for all purposes. In North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, and New Mexico the putative father of a bastard has a process in court by which he may legitimize the child.

A question considerably discussed in England is where one who is domiciled in a country sustaining the doctrine legitimatio per subsequens matrimonium marries a woman who had before the marriage a child by him, the husband having been domiciled prior thereto in a country where the doctrine does not prevail. In one case the exact question arose where the husband domiciled in England went to France, and before changing his domicile cohabited with a French woman who had by him a daughter, and afterwards becoming domiciled in France, he married the woman at the British Embassy in English form, and later in French form with recognition of the child, but the latter was held not to be legitimate; 2 K. & J. 595; s. c. 25 L. J. Ch. 631. This case is the subject of severe criticism in an article in 22 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th. 171, where the English cases touching upon the subject are carefully reviewed, with the conclusion that "it is not rash to say that before the case last mentioned such authority as existed on the point was in favor of the legitimacy." See 7 Cl. & F. 817, 842; 11 Eq. 474; 17 Ch. Div. 266; 24 Ch. Div. 637; [1892] 3 Ch. 88; L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 441. See BASTARD; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; CHILD.

LEGITIME. In Civil Law. That portion of a parent's estate of which he cannot disinherit his children without a legal cause.

The civil code of Louisiana declares that donations inter vivos or mortis causa cannot exceed two-thirds of the property of the disposer, if he leaves at his decease a legitimate child; one-half if he leaves two children; and one-third if he leaves three or a greater number. Under the name of children are included descendants of whatever degree they may be; it must be understood that they are only counted for the child they represent.

In Holland, Germany, and Spain, the principles of the Falcidian law, more or less limited, have been generally adopted; Coop. Just. 516.

In the United States, other than Louisiana, and in England, there is no restriction, except as to the widow's rights, on the right of bequeathing. But this power of bequeathing did not originally extend to all a man's personal estate: on the contrary, by the common law, as it stood in the reign of Henry II., a man's goods were to be divided into three equal parts, one of which went to his heirs or lineal descendants, another to his wife, and the third was at his own disposal; or, if he died without a wife, he might then dispose of one moiety, and the other went to his children; and so e converso if he had no children, the wife was entitled to one moiety, and he might bequeath the other; but if he died without either wife or issue, the whole was at his own disposal; Glanville, l. 2, c. 5; Bracton, l. 2, c. 26; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 346. The shares of the wife and children were called their reasonable part:

LELVES. See LEWES.

LEND. In a will, the words "I do lend to B's four children, C, D, E, and F, all my estate, real and personal," with a further direction that the estate should be kept together until C arrived at 21 years, when it was to be equally divided among the children, their heirs and assigns forever, the word lend was held not to tie up the estate to the time of the death of the children. 5 Ired. L. 361.

LENDER. He from whom a thing is borrowed. The bailor of an article loaned. See BAILMENT; LOAN.

LENT. The annual forty days of penitence and fast from Ash Wednesday until Easter. (Sax., lenden, the springs). The quadragesimal fast. A time of abstinence Wharton.

LEOD. The people; the nation; the country. Spelman, Leodes.

LEODES. A vassal or liege man; service; a were gild. Spelman.

LEOHT-GESCEOT. A tax for supplying a church with lights. Anc. Inst. Eng.

LEONINA SOCIETAS. An attempted partnership in which one party was to bear all the losses, and have no share in the profits. This was a void partnership in the Roman law. Brown.

LEP AND LACE. A custom in the manor of Writtle in Essex, that every cart, except that of a nobleman, which went over Greenbury within that district should pay 4d. to the lord. Blount.

This Greenbury was conceived to have been accidentally a market-place, on which account this privilege was granted. Id.

LEPPE AND LASSE. See LEP AND LACE.

LEPROZO AMOVENDO. An ancient writ that lay to remove a leper or leprosy who thrust himself into the company of his neighbors in any parish. Reg. Orig.

LESE MAJESTÉ (Fr.). High treason. Burrill; 2 Reeves' Hist. Eng. L., 6.

LESION. In Civil Law. A term used to signify the injury suffered, in consequence of inequality of situation, by one who does not receive a full equivalent for what he gives in a commutative contract.

The remedy given for this injury is founded on its being the effect of implied error or imposition; for in every commutative contract equivalents are supposed to be given and received. Persons of full age, however, are not allowed in point of law to object to their agreements as being injurious, unless the injury be excessive; Pothier, Obl. p. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 3, § 4. But minors are admitted to restitution, not only against any excessive inequality, but against any inequality whatever; Pothier, Obl. p. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 3, § 5; La. Code. art. 1833. See FRAUD; GUARDIAN; SALE.

LESSPIGEND. An inferior officer in the forests who cared for the vert and venison.

LESS. In a mining lease, a covenant to pay certain royalties where "less than" a stated quantity is gotten, is applicable to a case where none is gotten. 26 L. J. Ex. 41; 1 H. & N. 195. The words "less than" have been held synonymous with "not exceeding"; 21 L. J. Ex. 180; 7 Ex. 591.

LESSA. A legacy. Mon. Ang., t. 1, p. 562.

LESSEE. He to whom a lease is made. He who holds an estate by virtue of a lease. The word has been held to include the assignee of a lease. Cab. & El. 348. See LANDLORD AND TENANT.

LESSOR. He who grants a lease. See LEASE; LANDLORD AND TENANT.

LESTAGE, LASTAGE (Sax. last, burden). A custom for carrying things to fairs in markets. Fieta, l. 1, c. 47; T. L. See LASTAGE.

LESWES. Pastures. Co. Litt. 4 b.

LET. Hindrance; obstacle; obstruction.

To lease; to grant the use and possession of a thing for compensation. It is the correlative of hire. As an operative word in a lease, it is synonymous with demise; 12 M. & W. 68; 13 L. J. Ex. 135; 1 C. P. D. 132; 45 L. J. C. P. 405. See DEMISE; HIRE. To award a contract of some work to a proposer, after proposals have been received. 35 Ala. 33.

LETTER. He who, being the owner of a thing, lets it out to another for hire or compensation. Story, Bailm. § 369. See HIRING.

LETTER. An epistle; a despatch; a written message, usually on paper, folded up and sealed, and sent by one person to another. 1 Cal. 582. It will include the envelope in which it is sent. 19 Blatchf. 10.

Property in. Letters written by one person to another are the property of the latter, and he has a right not only to have them produced for use in litigation, but delivered up to him as the true owner. A writer of letters has a special property in them to prevent their publication or communication to other persons; 50 How. Pr. 194; 2 Story 100; 6 McLean 128; 6 Blatchf. 285. See 7 Alb. L. J. 19.

Letters written to a wife by a former husband belong to her and not to his estate, or to her second husband; 2 Bush 480; see 64 Vt. 450; and the recipient of a letter has no such property in it as passes to his executor as an asset of the estate; 22 How. Pr. 198.

Where a bill in equity charged that the defendant surreptitiously and illegally took from the trunk of the plaintiff's son and from the plaintiff's own bureau certain letters written by the plaintiff to her son, and by her son to her, it was held that the special right in the letters written by plaintiff was one that could only be adequately protected in equity, and that the court having jurisdiction for discovery should go on and order all the letters to be restored; 180 Pa. 14. See INJUNCTION; PRIVACY.

Letters in evidence. A letter is not admissible in evidence without proof of its being genuine, and such proof cannot be supplied solely by what appears on its face, as its contents, the letter head, etc.; 93 Ga. 648; but letters received in the regular course of business responsive to letters on the same subject, with proper letter-heads, envelopes, etc., are presumably authentic, according to their purport; 61 Fed. Rep. 804. In order to prove a memorandum, under the statute of frauds, a letter and envelope are considered as one document; 76 L. T. Rep. 441.

Letters in themselves inadmissible are so if they communicate any fact to the party against whom they are read which either affects the right in question or explains his subsequent conduct; 22 E. C. L. R. 273, 845. A letter stating particular facts cannot be read in evidence merely because it was sent, but if the party to whom it was addressed wrote an answer, such answer might be read as evidence against the party who wrote it, and the letter to which it was an answer would be admissible for the purpose of explaining such answer. A letter and answers thereto are subject to the same rule as applies to a conversation; if part is given in evidence by one party, the other party is entitled to have the whole produced; 4 Rob. 12; 41 Miss. 81. Failure to answer a letter is not generally deemed an admission of its contents; 97 N. Y. 1.

Letters in evidence fall within the general rule as to written documents; 27 L. J. C. P. 193; their construction is for the court unless extrinsic circumstances be capable of explaining them; 27 L. J. Ex. 84; but if they are written in so dubious a manner as to be capable of different constructions, or to be unintelligible without the aid of extrinsic circumstances, their meaning becomes a question for the jury; 1 Term 182; 8 C. B. 44; so the jury must deal with the whole question, where a contract is made partly by letter and partly oral; 17 C. B. n. s. 107.

It is a general prima facie presumption that all documents were made on the day they bear date, and this presumption obtains where the document is a letter; 2 Ex. 191, 196; 6 Bing. N. C. 801; 2 B. & Ad. 502; 2 M. & H. 853; but the date of a letter is not evidence that it was forwarded on that day; 53 Fed. Rep. 485; 102 Mass. 177; nor can the date of the receipt of a letter be established by witnesses who base their calculations upon its date; the date of a letter does not prove the date of its receipt, or the time of mailing it, or that it was ever mailed; 53 Fed. Rep. 485. In an action for criminal conversation, where the letters offered are those of a wife to a husband, to show the terms on which they lived; evidence must show when they were written; 1 B. & Ald. 90; 9 C. & P. 195; 2 Stark. 198.

Postmarks on letters are prima facie evidence that the letters were in the post at the time and place specified; 3 Stark. 64; 7 East 65; 29 How. St. Tr. 103; 3 Fed. Rep. 494; 1 Camp. 215; 2 id. 620; 7 M. & W. 515; 7 H. L. Cas. 646; although it be shown that in aid of justice, postmasters sometimes furnish empty envelopes bearing the post-office stamp, where they have never in fact been in the mail; 1 Fed. Rep. 126. Postmarks are evidence that the letter was mailed and sent, rather than that it was merely put in the post office; 15 Conn. 206; 16 Vt. 63; 4 R. I. 525; 3 Dill. 571.

The burden of proving the receipt of a letter rests upon the party who asserts it; 105 Mass. 391; 111 U. S. 185. If a letter properly directed is proved to have been either put in the post office or delivered to the postman, it is presumed to have reached its destination at the regular time, and to have been received by the person to whom it is addressed; 2 H. Bla. 509; 16 M. & W. 124; 1 H. L. Cas. 381; 45 L. J. Ex. 577; 6 Wheat. 102; see 4 R. I. 525, where it is held that any further evidence of the receipt of a letter than that it was properly directed and mailed would be wholly unnecessary, always difficult and often impossible. But this presumption is not one of law, but solely one of fact; 148 Pa. 405; 45 Me. 50; founded upon the probability that the officers of the government will do their duty, and the usual course of business; 105 Mass. 391; 111 U. S. 185. It may be rebutted by evidence showing that it was not received; 69 N. Y. 571; 93 Ala. 215; 12 Col. 539; 148 Pa. 405. But the fact of non-return of a letter bearing a request for return in case of failure to deliver so strengthens the presumption of receipt from mailing that it becomes well-nigh conclusive; 154 Pa. 323. On proof of the posting of a letter, properly addressed, the fact that it was not returned to the dead letter office is evidence of its receipt; 16 M. & W. 124. The facts that all letters put in a certain place were in the proper course of business put in the mail, and that a particular letter was put in such place, are evidence that it was despatched; 4 Campb. 193. See L. R. 3 Ch. Div. 574; 61 N. Y. 362; 58 N. H. 97.

In the absence of evidence that a letter was stamped before mailing, no presumption arises as to its receipt; 81 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 938; but when one alleges that he duly mailed a letter, the court will presume that the requirements of the law as to stamping, etc., were complied with; 80 Fed. Rep. 337. The question of the receipt of the letter is for the jury; 115 Pa. 539; 148 id. 405; 130 Mass. 186; 138 N. Y. 473. See Taylor, Ev., Chamberlayne ed. 183. See PRESUMPTION.

Contract by letter. The rule that a contract is complete at the instant when the minds of the parties meet is subject to modification where the negotiation is carried on by letter, for it is in that case impossible that both parties should have knowledge of the moment it becomes complete. The offer and acceptance cannot occur at the same moment of time; nor can the meeting of the minds of the parties on the subject be known by each at the moment of concurrence. The acceptance must succeed the offer after the lapse of some interval of time, and if the process is to be carried further in order to complete the bargain, a notice of the acceptance must be received; the only effect is to reverse the position of the parties, changing the knowledge of the completion from one party to the other; Benj. Sales § 69. When an offer is made by letter, it is presumed to continue during such period as is determined by, or is reasonable with regard to, the terms of the offer, or until notice of its recall has reached him to whom the offer is made; 1 B. & Ald. 681; 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 80; even if, through fault of the sender, the letter containing the offer is delayed; 6 Wend. 103; 12 Conn. 433; provided the offer is standing at the time of the acceptance; 6 Wend. 104; and where a proposal is made by letter, the mailing of a letter containing an acceptance of the proposal completes the contract; 6 Wend. 104; 1 B. & Ald. 681; 1 H. L. Cas. 331; 5 Pa. 339; 9 How. 390; 149 U. S. 411; 63 Ia. 484; 55 Ga. 488; 32 Md. 196; 67 Tex. 163; 42 Wis. 152; 15 R. I. 330; 16 Fed. Rep. 646; L. R. 7 Ch. 587; 20 Q. B. Div. 640; although the acceptance may be delayed or may not be received through fault of the mail; 9 How. 390; 36 N. Y. 307; 48 N. H. 14; 3 Metc. (Ky.) 80; 4 Ga. 1; 31 Md. 90; 161 Mass. 496; and this seems to be the general rule both in this country and in England, although it has been held that the contract is not complete until the letter of acceptance has been received by the party who makes the offer; 1 Pick. 281; L. R. 6 Ex. 108, overruled in 4 Ex. D. 216; but if undue delay or failure of delivery of the letter of acceptance is caused by the acceptor, there is no contract; 10 Pick. 326; 55 Ga. 433. Placing the acceptance in a letter box at the defendant's place of business completes the contract; 61 N. Y. 362; but entrusting it to a messenger for delivery is not sufficient, where there is no evidence that it was received; 4 Misc. Rep. 614.

The acceptance must be unconditional and in accordance with the terms of the offer and within the time prescribed by the offer; 21 Minn. 155; 53 Me. 20; 3 Johns. 534; 4 Wheat. 225; 43 N. Y. 240; 37 Ia. 186; 59 Wis. 315; 159 Pa. 612; even where the offer called for reply by return mail, compliance was held essential; 90 Ill. 525; 67 Ia. 678; and where in answer to a letter of proposal, the accepting party merely writes that he is willing to make arrangements on the terms proposed, it was held to be not an unconditional acceptance; 47 Hun 494; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 40; 23 Fed. Rep. 596.

Where there is no limitation as to time in the offer, the acceptance must be within a reasonable time; 63 Ia. 484; 50 Am. Rep.

752; the following day will suffice; 1 H. L. Cas. 381; but four months will not; 43 N. Y. 240. See 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 91.

In the leading case of Cooke v. Oxley the rule was laid down that one who gives time to another to accept or reject an offer is not bound to wait until the specified time expires, if no consideration has been given for the offer; 3 Term 783; see Pothier, Contrat de Vérité, No. 83; 3 Cush. 153; 5 Stew. & P. 264; 48 N. H. 16; but in this case the offer was not by letter, and the question as to the revocation of such an offer (when the offer was made by mail) was for a long time unsettled. In 1 Pick. 278 it was held that a revocation of an offer not then accepted takes effect from the time it is posted, although not received by the other party until after he had mailed his acceptance, and that no contract existed because, at the moment the acceptance was sent, the mind of the party offering had changed; in L. R. 6 Ex. 108; the same doctrine is laid down, but this case was doubted in 7 Ch. App. 592; and the English and American rule is now well settled that the offer cannot be withdrawn, unless the withdrawal reaches the party to whom it is addressed before the letter of acceptance has been mailed; 9 How. 390; 49 L. J. C. P. 318; 5 Q. B. D. 351. The withdrawal of the offer after the acceptance has been posted is inoperative; as a state of mind not notified cannot be regarded in dealings between man and man, and an uncommunicated revocation is, for all practical purposes, no revocation at all; 5 C. P. D. 344; 5 Q. B. D. 346; 2 App. Cas. 666; 46 N. Y. 467. The posting a letter of withdrawal is not a communication to the person to whom it is sent; 5 C. P. D. 344. See Wald, Poll. Contr. 26; Benj. Sales § 65; 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 80. A revocation of an offer is not complete till it is brought to the mind of the offeree; merely mailing a letter of revocation is not a revocation; [1892] 2 Ch. 27, C. A. Nor is the mere posting of a letter allotting shares in a company to an applicant such a communication as to bind the applicant; L. R. 11 Eq. 86; 20 L. T. R. N. S. 729.

It is said to be an open question in England as to the effect of a revocation of an accepting letter communicated to the other party before the accepting letter is received by him; Chit. Contr., 13th ed. 15, where it is submitted that in such case there should be no contract; see also, 4 Ex. D. 235; 9 Shaw & Dun. 109. Other writers are of opinion that the mailing of an accepting letter fixes the contract, and that a revocation by telegram or a messenger, outstripping the accepting letter, would have no effect; Poll. Contr. 35; see also, Ans. Contr. 27; Story, Contr. § 198; and it was so held in 2 Dutch. N. J. 268.

Contracts by telegraph, under most of the authorities, obey the same rule as contracts by mail; Hare, Contr.; 3 Dill. 571.

Payments may be made by letter at the risk of the creditor, when the debtor is authorized, expressly or impliedly, from the usual course of business, and not otherwise; Peake 67; 1 Ex. 477; Ry. & M. 149; 3 Mass. 249.

See, generally, as to contracts by letter, 32 Am. Rep. 40, n.; Wald, Poll. Contr. 26; 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 80, n.; Benj. Sales §§ 44, 69; 9 Jurid. Rev. 291; 3 Add. Contr. App. 4-13; Smith, Contr. 164; 9 L. Quart. Rev. 185, 265, n.; Langd. Contr. 15; Story, Contr. § 198. See SALE; DECOY LETTER; MAIL; OFFER.

LETTER OF ADVICE. A letter containing information of any circumstances unknown to the person to whom it is written; generally informing him of some act done by the writer of the letter.

It is usual and perfectly proper for the drawer of a bill of exchange to write a letter of advice to the drawee, as well to prevent fraud or alteration of the bill, as to let the drawee know what provision has been made for the payment of the bill. Chitty, Bills 185.

LETTER OF ADVOCATION. In Scotch Law. The decree or warrant of the supreme court or court of sessions, discharging the inferior tribunal from all further proceedings in the matter and advocating the action to itself. This proceeding is similar to a certiorari issuing out of a superior court for the removal of a cause from an inferior.

LETTER OF ATTORNEY. In Practice. A written instrument, by which one or more persons, called the constituents, authorize one or more other persons, called the attorneys, to do some lawful act by the latter for or instead, and in the place, of the former; 1 Moody, 52, 70. It may be parol or under seal. See POWER OF ATTORNEY.

LETTER BOOK. A book containing the copies of letters written by a merchant or trader to his correspondents.

A press copy in a letter book stands in the same relation to the original as a copy taken from the letter book; both are secondary evidence, and are receivable on the loss of, or after notice to produce, the original; but the decisions are not entirely uniform on this point; 3 Camp. 305; 37 Conn. 555; 102 Mass. 362; see 1 Whart. Ev. § 72, 93, 133; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 116; 44 N. Y. 124; 35 Md. 123; 73 Ill. 161. See COPY; EVIDENCE; PRESS COPY.

LETTER CARRIER. A person employed to carry letters from the post-office to the persons to whom they are addressed. See various provisions in U. S. Rev. Stat.

Eight hours constitute a day's labor for letter carriers; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 587. For time employed in excess of eight hours a day, he is entitled to extra pay; 148 U. S. 124; and time worked in excess of eight hours in one day cannot be set off against a deficiency on another when he worked less than eight hours; 148 U. S. 134. See EIGHT-HOUR LAWS.

LETTER CLAUS. See LETTERS CLOSE.

LETTER OF CREDENCE. In International Law. A written instrument addressed by the sovereign or chief magistrate of a state to the sovereign or state to whom a public minister is sent, certifying his appointment as such, and the general object of his mission, and requesting that full faith and credit may be given to what he shall do and say on the part of his court.

When it is given to an ambassador, envoy, or minister accredited to a sovereign, it is addressed to the sovereign or state to whom the minister is delegated; in the case of a chargé d'affaires, it is addressed by the secretary or minister of state charged with the department of foreign affairs to the minister of foreign affairs of the other government; Whart. Int. L. §§ 217-321; Fiequetfort, de l'Ambassadeur, l. 1, § 15.

LETTER OF CREDIT. An open or sealed letter, from a merchant or bank or banker, in one place, directed to another, in another place or country, requiring him, if a person therein named, or the bearer of the letter, shall have occasion to buy commodities, or to want money to any particular or unlimited amount, either to procure the same, or to pass his promise, bill, or other engagement for it, the writer of the letter undertaking to provide him the money for the goods, or to repay him by exchange, or to give him such satisfaction as he shall require, either for himself or the bearer of the letter. Pars. N. & B. 108; Byles, Bills, Wood's ed. 173; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 336.

These letters are either general or special: the former is directed to the writer's correspondents generally, wherever the bearer of the letter may happen to go; the latter is directed to some particular person. When the letter is presented to the person to whom it is addressed, he either agrees to comply with the request, in which case he immediately becomes bound to fulfil all the engagements therein mentioned; or he refuses, in which case the bearer should return it to the giver.

without any other proceeding, unless, indeed, the one to whom the letter is directed is a debtor of the one who gave the letter, in which case he should procure the letter to be protested; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 337; 1 Beaw. Lex Mer. 607; Hall, Adm. Pr. 14; 4 Ohio 197.

A letter requesting one person to make advances to a third person on the credit of the writer is a letter of credit; 4 Duer 480; 18 N. Y. 599; 5 Hill 634; 7 L. R. A. 209.

In England it seems questionable whether an action can be maintained by one who advances money on a general letter of credit; 3 Story 314; 11 M. & W. 383; the reason given being that there is no privity of contract between the mandant and the mandatory. But in this country the contrary doctrine is well settled; 3 N. Y. 214; 5 Hill, N. Y. 643; 58 Pa. 102; 54 Miss. 1; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 347, n. In England, a letter of credit is not negotiable; 1 Macq. 513; Grant, Bank. ch. 15; except when it relates to bills of exchange; L. R. 2 Ch. App. 397; 3 id. 154. The same rule has been generally followed here, but it has been held that a general letter of credit, if it authorize more than a single transaction with the party to whom it is granted, may be honored by several persons successively, keeping within the specified aggregate; 3 N. Y. 203; 23 Vt. 160. A telegram authorizing the use of a person's name for a certain sum of money is not in the nature of a general or continuing letter of credit, and does not extend the right to use the name beyond the amount specified; 139 Ill. 633.

The debt which arises on such letter, in its simplest form, when complied with, is between the mandatory and the mandant; though it may be so conceived as to raise a debt also against the person who is supplied by the mandatory. First, when the letter is purchased with money by the person wishing for the foreign credit, or is granted in consequence of a check on his cash account, or procured on the credit of securities lodged with the person who granted it, or in payment of money due by him to the payee, the letter is, in its effects, similar to a bill of exchange drawn on the foreign merchant or banker. The payment of the money by the person on whom the letter is granted raises a debt, or goes into account between him and the writer of the letter, but raises no debt to the person who pays on the letter, against him to whom the money is paid. Second, when not so purchased, but truly an accommodation, and meant to raise a debt on the person accommodated, the engagement generally is, to see paid any advances made to him, or to guaranty any draft accepted or bill discounted; and the compliance with the mandate, in such case, raises a debt both against the writer of the letter and against the person accredited; 1 Bell, Com. 371, 5th ed. The bearer of the letter of credit is not considered bound to receive the money; he may use the letter as he pleases, and he contracts an obligation only by receiving the money; Pothier, Contr. de Change, 237.

LETTER OF EXCHANGE. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

LETTER OF LICENSE. An instrument or writing made by creditors to their insolvent debtor by which they bind themselves to allow him a longer time than he had a right to, for the payment of his debts, and that they will not arrest or molest him in his person or property till after the expiration of such additional time. Since the general abolition of imprisonment for debt, and under the modern system of laws for settling insolvents' estates, it is seldom, if ever, used.

LETTER OF MARQUE AND REPRISAL. A commission granted by the government to a private individual, to take the property of a foreign state, or of the citizens or subjects of such state, as a reparation for an injury committed by such state, its citizens or subjects. The prizes so captured are divided between the owners of the privateer, the captain, and the crew. A vessel loaded with merchandise, on a voyage to a friendly port, but armed for its own defence in case of attack by an enemy, is also called a letter of marque. 1 Boulay-Paty, tit. 3, § 2, p. 300.

Letter of marque is now used to signify the commission issued to a privateer in time of war.

By the constitution, art. 1, § 8, cl. 11, congress has power to grant letters of marque and reprisal. And by another section of the same instrument this power is prohibited to the several states. The granting of letters of marque is not always a preliminary to war or necessarily designed to provoke it. It is a hostile measure for unredressed grievances, real or supposed; Story, Const. § 1356. This is a means short of actual war, well recognized in international law, for terminating differences between nations; Wheat. Int. Law § 290. Special reprisals are when letters of marque are granted in time of peace, to particular individuals who have suffered an injury from the government or subjects of another nation; they are to be granted only in case of clear and open denial of justice; id. § 291. As the constitution empowers congress to grant letters of marque and reprisal, it has been doubted whether it could abrogate this provision by joining in a treaty by which privateering is abolished; 24 Am. L. Rev. 902; 28 id. 615; 19 L. Mag. & Rev. (4th ser.) 35. See REPRISAL; PRIVATEER; DECLARATION OF PARIS.

LETTER MISSIVE. In English Law. A letter from the king or queen to a dean or chapter, containing the name of the person whom he would have them elect as bishop. 1 Steph. Com. 666. See CONGE D'ELIRE. A request addressed to a peer, peeress, or lord of parliament, against whom a bill has been filed, desiring the defendant to appear and answer to the bill. It is issued by the lord chancellor, on petition, after the filing of the bill; and a neglect to attend to this places the defendant, in relation to such suit, on the same ground as other defendants who are not peers, and a subpoena may then issue; 2 Madd. Ch. Fr. 196; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 366-369.

LETTER PRESS COPIES. See PRESS COPIES.

LETTER OF RECALL. A written document addressed by the executive of one government to the executive of another, informing the latter that a minister sent by the former to him has been recalled.

LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION. In Commercial Law. An instrument given by one person to another, addressed to a third, in which the bearer is represented as worthy of credit. 1 Bell, Com., 5th ed. 371; 3 Term 51; 7 Cra. 69; Fell, Guar. c. 8; 6 Johns. 181; 13 id. 224; 1 Day Conn. 22. See 13 How. 193; RECOMMENDATION. A letter commending the former services of the holder and speaking of him in such terms as would tend to bring such services to the favorable notice of those to whom he might apply for employment. 174 Ill. 402. See CLEARANCE CARD.

LETTER OF RECREDENTIALS. A document delivered to a minister by the secretary of state of the government to which he was accredited. It is addressed to the executive of the minister's country. It is in reply to the letter of recall.

LETTERS OF ABSOLUTION. Letters whereby, in former times, an abbot released a monk ab omni subjectione et obedientia, etc., and enabled him to enter some other religious order. Jacob.

LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION. An instrument in writing, granted by the judge or officer having jurisdiction and power of granting such letters, thereby authorizing the person or persons to whom they are granted to administer upon the personal estate of an intestate. According to the usual form there is given to the administrator (naming him) "full power to administer the goods, chattels, rights, and credits, which were of the said deceased," in the county or district in which the said judge or officer has jurisdiction; "as also to ask, collect, levy, recover, and receive the credits whatsoever of the said deceased, which at the time of his death were owing, or did in any way belong, to him, and to pay the debts in which the said deceased stood obliged, so far forth as the said goods and chattels, rights and credits, will extend, according to the rate and order of law." Original and general administration granted by a probate court corresponds to letters testamentary issued to an executor. As to the various limited and special forms of administration, see that title.

Generally in England the crown claimed the right of administering the personal property of intestates, and the ecclesiastical persons who were entrusted with the duty, appropriated large portions of them upon the pretext of pious uses, until they were required by stat. 31 Edw. III. c. 11, § 1, to grant administration to "the next and most lawful friends of the person intestate," who were held accountable in the common law court as executors were. The administration of personal estates then became assimilated to the exclusion of wills, and the function of the ecclesiastical courts was merely the grant of letters and the supervision of their execution. The jurisdiction in England was taken away from the ecclesiastical court by stat. 20 & 21 Vic. c. 77, and in the United States, what is known as probate jurisdiction of letters of administration is exercised generally by courts known as probate courts.

The method of procuring letters of administration is similar to that by which letters testamentary are issued to executors. Application is made by the person claiming the right to administer (see ADMINISTRATION) to the probate officer, and in most of the states this application is made by a petition and is followed by a citation to be served upon parties interested or published according to law; any person interested in the estate may appear and show cause against the appointment of the applicant, who is required to show the facts essential to the grant of letters. In England, parties contesting the right must proceed pari passu, and propound their several interests. Before letters are granted a satisfactory bond is usually required from the person selected. The grant of letters is entered as a judicial record, and the letters themselves should be duly authenticated under the seal of the court; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 118. For the form of letters, see Smith, Prob. Pract. App.; 22 Ga. 112. The grant of letters has been held to be prima facie evidence of all the essential jurisdictional facts; 56 Ala. 31; but it is generally considered that the probate court, in granting letters of administration does not adjudicate that the person is dead, but that letters shall be granted to the applicant; 60 N. Y. 121; 10 Pick. 515; and the letters are not legal evidence of the death; 91 U. S. 238. Letters of administration upon the estate of a person who is in fact alive have no validity or effect as against him; 154 U. S. 34. A statute authorizing the grant of letters of administration upon the estate of a person who has not been heard from for seven years is held to deprive a living person of property without due process of law, and therefore unconstitutional; 38 L. R. A. (R. I.) 204.

A grant of letters which includes two estates under one administration would be irregular and objectionable, but it has been held not to be void; 15 Tex. 338; the letters should be signed by the judge or other probate officer; 26 La. Ann. 329; but see 85 N. C. 258; and they are not void if the seal of the court is affixed in the wrong place; 64 Cal. 9. The effect of letters of administration, and the powers and duties of those to whom they are issued are similar to those arising under letters testamentary, which title see. See also ADMINISTRATION.

LETTERS OF BAILERY. In Scotch Law. Commissions by which a heritable proprietor appointed a baron-bailie, to hold courts, appoint officers under him, etc.

LETTERS OF CAPTION. See CAPTION.

LETTERS CLOSE. Those letters commonly sealed with the royal signet, or privy seal, so called in contradistinction to letters patent which were left open and sealed with the broad seal. They are sometimes called Letters Claus. Whart. Lex. See CLOSE ROLL.

LETTERS OF COLLECTION. Letters issued for the temporary purpose of enabling some one to collect and hold the assets pending a controversy as to the right to have letters of administration or letters testamentary.

In the Roman Law. If the deceased died wholly intestate, in defect of certain ways of administration of the estate, the administration might be committed to such discreet person as was approved of, or letters ad colligendum granted, which neither made the person to whom they were granted executor nor administrator, his only business being to keep the goods in his safe custody, and to do other acts for the benefit of such as were entitled to the property of the deceased. 2 Bl. Com. 505.

LETTERS AD COLLIGENDUM BONA DEFUNCTI. In Practice. In default of the representatives and creditors to administer to the estate of an intestate, the officer entitled to grant letters of administration may grant to such person as he approves, letters to collect the goods of the deceased, which neither make him executor nor administrator; his only business being to collect the goods and keep them in his safe custody. 2 Bla. Com. 505. See LETTERS OF COLLECTION.

LETTERS OF EJECTION. In Scotch Law. Letters under the royal signet authorizing a sheriff to eject a tenant who had been decreed to remove, and who had disobeyed the charge to remove, proceeding on letters of horning on the decree. Cent. Dict.

LETTERS OF FIRE AND SWORD. See FIRE AND SWORD.

LETTERS OF HORNING. See HORNING.

LETTERS OF INTERCOMMUNING. In Scotch Law. Letters from the privy council prohibiting all persons from holding any kind of intercourse or communication with those therein denounced.

LETTERS PATENT. The name of an instrument granted by the government to convey a right to the patentee: as, a patent for a tract of land; or to secure to him an exclusive right to a new invention or discovery. Letters patent are matter of record. They are so called because they are not sealed up, but are granted open. See PATENT.

LETTERS OF REQUEST. In English Ecclesiastical Law. An instrument by which a judge of an inferior court waives or remits his own jurisdiction in favor of a court of appeal immediately superior to it.

Letters of request, in general, lie only where an appeal would lie, and lie only to the next immediate court of appeal, waiving merely the primary jurisdiction to the proper appellate court, except letters of request from the most inferior ecclesiastical court, which may be direct to the court of arches, although one or two courts of appeal may by this be ousted of their jurisdiction as courts of appeal; 2 Add. Eccl. 406. The effect of letters of request is to give jurisdiction to the appellate court in the first instance. See a form of letters of request in 2 Chitty, Pr. 498, note h; 8 Steph. Com. 806. The same title was also given to letters formerly granted by the Lord Privy Seal preparatory to granting letters of marque.

LETTERS ROGATORY. An instrument sent in the name and by the authority of a judge or court to another, requesting the latter to cause to be examined, upon interrogatories filed in a cause depending before the former, a witness who is within the jurisdiction of the judge or court to whom such letters are addressed.

They are sometimes denominated commissions sub mutua vicissitudine obtenta, ac in juris subsidium, from a clause which they generally contain. Where the government of a foreign country, in which witnesses purposed to be examined reside, refuses to allow commissioners to administer oaths to such witnesses, or to allow the commission to be executed unless it is done by some magistrate or judicial officer there, according to the laws of that country, letters rogatory must issue.

These letters are directed to any judge or tribunal having jurisdiction of civil causes in the foreign country, recite the pendency of the suit in court, and state that there are material witnesses residing there, whose names are given, without whose testimony justice cannot be done between the parties, and then request the said judge or tribunal to cause the witnesses to come before them and answer to the interrogatories annexed to the letters rogatory, to cause their depositions to be committed to writing and returned with the letters rogatory; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 320. In letters rogatory there is always an offer, on the part of the court whence they issued, to render a mutual service to the court to which they may be directed, whenever required. The practice of such letters is derived from the civil law, by which these letters are sometimes called letters requisitory. A special application must be made to court to obtain an order for letters rogatory, and it will be granted in the first instance without issuing a commission upon satisfactory proof that the authorities abroad will not allow the testimony to be taken in any other manner; 1 Hoffman, Ch. Pr. 492; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 3d Am. ed. 953.

Though formerly used in England in the courts of common law; 1 Rolle, Abr. 530, pl. 13; they have been superseded by commissions of dedimus protestatem, which are considered to be but a feeble substitute. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 223, n.; Hall, Adm. Pr. 37. The courts of admiralty use these letters; and they are recognized by the law of nations. See Foelix, Droit Intern. liv. 2, t. 4, p. 300; Denisart; Dunlap, Adm. Pr. 221; Bened. Adm. § 533; 1 Hoffman, Ch. 482.

In Nelson v. United States, 1 Pet. C. C. 236, will be found a copy of letters rogatory, issued to the courts of Havana, according to the form and practice of the civil law, on an occasion when the authorities there had prevented the execution of a commission, regarding any attempts to take testimony under it as an interference with the rights of the judicial tribunals of that place. See also, 8 Paige 446; 2 Ves. Sr. 336; 6 Wend. 475.

The United States revised statutes provide for the taking of testimony of witnesses residing within the United States to be used in any suit for the recovery of money or property depending in any court, in any foreign country, with which the United States are at peace, and in which the government of such foreign country shall be a party or shall have an interest. Where a commission of letters rogatory to take such testimony upon interrogatories has been issued from the court in which such suit is pending, it may be produced before the district judge of the district in which the witness resides or is found, and on proof to the judge that the testimony of a witness is material, he shall issue summons to the witness requiring him to appear before the officer or commissioner named in the commission or letters rogatory. The summons must specify the time and place, which shall be within one hundred miles of the place where the witness resides or is served. In case of neglect of a witness to attend and testify he is liable to the same penalties incurred for the like offence in the trial of a suit in the district court of the United States, and he is entitled to the same fees and mileage as are allowed to witnesses in that court. No witness shall be required to criminate himself on such examination; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4073-4. When letters rogatory are addressed from a foreign court to any circuit court of the United States the commissioner appointed by the latter court shall have power to compel witnesses to appear and testify; id. § 873, as amended by U. S. Stat. 1 Supp. 266.

When a commission or letter rogatory is issued to take testimony of a witness in a foreign country, in a suit in which the United States are a party, or have any interest, after being executed by the commissioner it is to be returned to the minister or consul of the United States nearest the place where it is executed, and by him transmitted to the clerk of the court from which it was issued; and when so taken and returned the testimony shall be read as evidence, without objection, the method of returning the same; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 873.

Among the class of cases held not to be within the statutes are criminal proceedings; 1 Ben. 225; and proceedings relating to an investigation as to the smuggling of some cases of cotton; 36 Fed. Rep. 806. See, generally, 1 Fost. Fed. Prac., 2d ed. § 290, in the notes to which will be found a great deal of interesting matter relating to the diplomatic correspondence on this subject. See, also, 1 Gall. 166; 1 Hall, Adm. Pr. 37, 38, 55-60; Clerke, Praxis, tit. 27; 3 Whart. Int. L. § 413; 1 Oughton, Ordo Judiciorum 150-152; 1 Rolle, Abr. 530, pl. 15.

LETTERS OF SAFE CONDUCT. See SAFE CONDUCT.

LETTERS TESTAMENTARY. An instrument in writing granted by the judge or officer having jurisdiction of the probate of wills, after the probate of a will, to an executor, authorizing him to act as such.

It is issued by the probate officer under his hand and official seal, making known that at a certain date the last will and testament of A. B. (naming the testator) was duly proved before him; that the probate and grant of administration was within his jurisdiction, and certifying accordingly, "that the administration of all and singular the goods, chattels, and credits of the said deceased, and any way concerning his will, was granted" to C. D., "the executor named in the said will," "he having been already sworn well and faithfully to administer the same, and to make a true and perfect inventory, etc., and to exhibit the same, etc., and also to render a just and true account thereof."

In England, the original will is deposited in the registry of the ordinary or metropolitan, and a copy thereof made out under his seal; which copy and the letters testamentary are usually styled the probate. This practice has been followed in some of the United States; but where the will needs to be proved in more than one state, the impounding of it leads to much inconvenience. In other states, the original will is returned to the executor, with a certificate that it has been duly proved and recorded, and the letters testamentary are a separate instrument. The letters are usually general; but may be limited as to the locality within which the executor is to act, as to the subject-matter over which he is to have control, or otherwise, as the exigencies of the case or the express directions of the testator may require.

Letters testamentary are granted in case the decedent dies testate; letters of administration, in case he dies intestate, or fails to provide an executor; see ADMINISTRATION, Executor; and in regard to all matters coming properly under the heads of letters of administration or letters testamentary, there is little or no difference in the law relating to the two instruments.

Letters testamentary and of administration are, according to their terms and extent, conclusive as to personal property while they remain unrevoked. They cannot be questioned in a court of law or of equity, and cannot be impeached, even by evidence of fraud or forgery. Proof that the testator was insane, or that the will was forged, is inadmissible; 12 Ves. 298; 21 Wall. 503; 27 Me. 17; 49 N. H. 295; 75 Pa. 503; 16 Mass. 433; 19 Johns. 886; 10 Ala. 977; 18 Cal. 499; 60 N. Y. 123; 14 Ga. 185; 33 Neb. 509; 113 N. Y. 511; 24 Fla. 237. But if the nature of the plea raise the issue, it may be shown that the court granting the supposed letters had no jurisdiction, and that its action is therefore a nullity; 3 Term 130; see 77 Hun 230; or that the seal attached to the supposed probate has been forged, or that the letters have been revoked, or that the testator is alive; 15 S. & R. 42; 9 Dana 41; 8 Cra. 9; 3 Allen 87; 25 Ala. 408; 70 Tex. 338. Where an executor qualified and acted for many years under his appointment, he will not be allowed to dispute the recitation in his appointment that citation to the heirs was issued and served; 95 Cal. 84.

At common law the executor or administrator has no power over real estate; nor is the probate even admissible as evidence that the instrument is a will, or is an execution of a power to charge land; Wms. Ex. 363. By statute, in some states, the probate is made prima facie or conclusive evidence as to reality; 17 Mass. 68; 28 Conn. 1; 10 Wheat. 470; 3 Pa. 498; 8 B. Monr. 340; 5 La. 388. In some states the probate is made after the lapse of a certain time conclusive as to reality; 9 Pet. 180; 75 Pa. 512; 8 Ohio 346; 26 Ala. 524; 6 Gratt. 564; 8 Wright 189. Land in England under the Land Title and Transfer Act of 1897 goes to the executor or administrator. See LAND TITLE AND TRANSFER.

Though the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction of the grant of letters, yet where a legacy has been obtained by fraud, or the probate has been procured by fraud on the next of kin, a court of equity would hold the legatee or wrong-doer as bound by a trust for the party injured; Wms. Ex. 352. While a court of equity cannot remove an executor, it may restrain him from acting, and even take the estate out of his hands and place it in the custody of a receiver; 44 N. J. Eq. 385.

Letters may be revoked by the court which made the grant, or an appeal to a higher tribunal, reversing the decision by which they were granted. Special or limited administration will be revoked on the occasion ceasing which called for the grant. An executor or administrator will be removed when the letters were obtained improperly; Wms. Ex. 371.

Of their effect in a state other than that in which legal proceedings were instituted.

In view of the rule of the civil law, that personalia sequuntur personam, certain effect has been given by the comity of nations to a foreign probate granted at the place of the domicile of the deceased, in respect to the personal assets in other states. At common law, the lex loci rei sitæ governs as to real estate, and the foreign probate has no validity; but as to personality the law of the domicile governs both as to testacy and intestacy. It is customary, therefore, on a due exemplification of the probate granted at the place of domicile, to admit the will to probate, and issue letters testamentary, without requiring original or further proof.

A foreign probate at the place of domicile has in itself no force or effect beyond the jurisdiction in which it was granted, but on its production fresh probate will be granted thereon in all other jurisdictions where assets are found. This is the general rule, but is liable to be varied by statute, and is so varied in some of the states of the United States.

Letters testamentary or of administration confer no power beyond the limits of the state in which they are granted, and do not authorize the person to whom they are issued to maintain any suit in the state or federal courts in any other state; 139 U. S. 156; 108 id. 256; the executor or administrator has therefore, as such, no right of control over property in another state or country; 32 Ga. 260; 27 Ind. 432; 4 McLean 577; 41 Barb. 431; 5 Ired. Eq. 365; he cannot interfere with assets, collect or discharge debts, control lands, sue or be sued; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 173, and cases cited. The principle is, that a grant of power to administer the estate of a decedent operates only as of right within the jurisdiction which grants the letters, and in order that a foreign representative may exercise any such function he must be clothed with authority from the jurisdiction into which he comes, and conform to the requirements imposed by local law; id.; 42 Pa. 467; 64 N. C. 464; 5 McLean 4; 38 Ala. 678; 25 S. C. 1; 143 U. S. 215; 41 Fed. Rep. 681; 65 Mich. 568. In most, probably all, of the American states there is statutory provision, either for the grant of ancillary letters or for authorizing and regulating suits by foreign executors and administrators. In many of them these officers properly qualified abroad are permitted to sue for and recover local assets without other qualification, within the new jurisdiction, than putting on record their authority as conferred by the home jurisdiction, and such authority must be strictly followed. In many of the states there is authority to sue and defend without ancillary administration; 147 U. S. 537; 13 N. J. Eq. 97; 91 Ky. 88; 70 Cal. 403; 32 S. C. 598; and this right to sue has been extended to a foreign corporation duly authorized to act in its own jurisdiction; 5 Houst. 418; in some states there is express authority to defend suits; 3 Bush 505; but it has been held that statutory authority to sue does not imply capacity to be sued; 77 Ga. 149; nor to sue for intestate lands where they were made by statute assets in the hands of a domestic administrator; 54 Ark. 324; but to sue for the grant of local administration; 40 id. 193; where no suit is necessary a foreign executor or administrator has been permitted to remove personal property and carry it away for the purpose of administration; 82 N. Y. 21; 43 Minn. 242; 63 Ga. 200; 46 Conn. 370; and in the absence of local administration payment to a foreign representative is recognized; 108 U. S. 256; 109 id. 656; 20 N. Y. 103.

The latter may assign choses in action belonging to the estate, and the assignee may sue thereon in his own name in another state, unless prevented by its laws respecting assignments from so doing; 108 U. S. 256; 64 Ia. 425; 89 Tex. 244; 32 N. Y. 21; he may also sue in another state on a judgment there recovered; 16 Mass. 71; 1 Pet. 686; 4 Mason 16; 41 Md. 539; or he may sue in his individual capacity in another state, on a judgment recovered by him in his official capacity in his own state; 107 Mo. 500; 33 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 555; upon a contract made with himself as such a foreign executor or administrator may sue; 8 Greenl. 346; 30 Ark. 230; Sto. Conf. L. § 513-516. The term foreign as applied to executors and administrators refers to the jurisdiction from which their authority is derived and not to residence; 86 Va. 1045; 125 N. Y. 400. The estate of a deceased person is substantially one estate, in which those entitled to the residue are interested as a whole, even though situated in various jurisdictions, and though each distinct part of it must be settled in the jurisdiction by which letters were granted whether for the purpose of ancillary or principal administration; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 174; ordinarily it is the practice to recognize the person appointed executor or administrator at the domicile of the deceased as the person to whom ancillary letters will be granted; 4 Redf. 151; Whart. Conf. L. § 608; but there is no privity between persons appointed in different jurisdictions whether they be different or the same, and the executor or administrator in one state is not concluded in a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff in another state against a person having administration on the estate of the deceased; 139 U. S. 156; 143 Ill. 367; 36 Pac. Rep. (Mon.) 38; 89 S. C. 247. But a different rule has been applied where different executors are appointed by the will in different states, and they are held to be in privity with each other, and a judgment against those in one state is evidence against those in another; 13 How. 458, 469.

When any surplus remains in the hands of a foreign or ancillary appointee after the discharge of all debts in that jurisdiction, it is usually, as a matter of comity, ordered to be paid over to the domiciliary appointee; 56 Ala. 69; 50 L. J. Ch. 740; and in his hands becomes applicable to debts, legacies, and expenses; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 174, note 2. It is the policy of the law with respect to these matters to encourage the spirit of comity in subordination to the rights of local creditors who are considered to be entitled to the benefit of assets within their own jurisdiction, rather than to be driven to the assertion of their claims in a foreign state or country; id.; but see LEX FORI.

As a general rule it is the duty of the principal personal representative to collect and make available to the estate all such assets as are available to him consistently with foreign law; 4 M. & W. 171; 1 Cr. & J. 157; even to the extent of seeing that foreign letters are taken out for the collection of foreign assets; or of collecting and realizing upon property and debts so far as it may be done by him, without resort to a foreign jurisdiction; 4 Mason 83; 88 N. Y. 397; 12 Metcalf 421; 108 Mass. 345; but the domestic representative is not to be held in this respect to too onerous a responsibility with respect to foreign property which he cannot realize by virtue of his appointment. See Sto. Conf. L. § 514 a; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 175.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether a voluntary surrender of assets to the domiciliary representative protects the debtor against claims made by virtue of an administration within his own jurisdiction. The United States supreme court, supported by the current of American authority, maintains that, as between the states such payment or delivery of assets is sufficient to discharge the local debtor in the absence of local administration; 18 How. 104; 9 Wall. 741; 108 U. S. 256; 65 Ala. 89; 20 N. Y. 103.

The English doctrine is otherwise; Whart. Conf. L. § 626; Schoul. Ex. & Ad. § 176; Sto. Conf. L. § 515 a. See Dicey, Conf. L. ch. X. (c), ch. XVII. (B) with Moore's American notes.

See, generally, Williams; Crosswell, Executors; Wharton; Story, Conf. L.; LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION; EXECUTOR; ADMINISTRATOR; CONFLICT OF LAWS; LEX LOCI; ADMINISTRATION.

LETTING OUT. In American Law. The act of awarding a contract.

This term is much used in the United States, and most frequently in relation to contracts to construct railroads, canals, or other commercial works. When such an undertaking has reached the point of actual construction, a notice is generally given that proposals will be received until a certain period, and thereupon a letting out, or award of portions of the work to be performed according to the proposals, is made. See 35 Ala. n. s. 55.

LEVANDÆ NAVIS CAUSA (Lat.). In Civil Law. For the sake of lightening the ship. See Leg. Rhod. tit. de Jactu. Goods thrown overboard with this purpose of lightening the ship are subjects of a general average.

LEVANT AND COUCHANT (Lat.) Levantes et cubantes. A term applied to cattle that have been so long on the ground of another that they have lain down, and are risen up to feed, until which time they cannot be distrained by the owner of the lands, if the land were not sufficiently fenced to keep out cattle. 3 Bla. Com. 8, 9; Mozl. & W.

LEVARI FACIAS (Lat.) that you cause to be levied. In Practice. A writ of execution directing the sheriff to cause to be made of the lands and chattels of the judgment debtor the sum recovered by the judgment.

Under this writ the sheriff was to sell the goods and collect the rents, issues, and profits of the land in question. It has been generally superseded by the remedy by elegit, which was given by statute Westm. 2d (18 Edw. I.), c. 18. In case, however, the judgment debtor is a clerk, upon the sheriff's return that he has no lay fee, a writ in the nature of a levari facias goes to the bishop of the diocese, who thereupon sends a sequestration of the profits of the clerk's benefice, directed to the churchwardens, to collect and pay them to the plaintiff till the full sum be raised. The same course is pursued upon a f. fa.; 3 Burn. Eccl. Law, 329. See Comyns, Dig. Execution (c. 4); Finch, Law, 471; 3 Bla. Com. 471; Tr. & H. Fr. 967.

In American Law. A writ used to sell lands mortgaged after a judgment has been obtained by the mortgagee, or his assignee, against the mortgagor, under a peculiar proceeding authorized by statute.

LEVATO VELO (Lat.) An expression used in the Roman law, Code, 11. 4. 5, and applied to the trial of wreck and salvage. Commentators disagree about the origin of the expression; but all agree that its general meaning is that these causes shall be heard summarily. The most probable solution is that it refers to the place where causes were heard. A sail was spread before the door and officers employed to keep strangers from the tribunal. When these causes were heard, this sail was raised, and suitors came directly to the court, and their causes were heard immediately. As applied to maritime courts, its meaning is that causes should be heard without delay. These causes required despatch, and a delay amounts practically to a denial of justice. Emerigon, Des Assurances c. 26, sect. 8.

LEVEES. Embankments to prevent overflow in rivers. See RIVERS.

A state, in the exercise of police powers, has the exclusive right to determine the propriety, location, and mode of building levees within her borders. After she has so decided, and contracted for the enterprise, a person, on whose land the levee is to be built, cannot require that it be constructed differently; and, in case of non-compliance with his demand, he cannot hold the state liable for compensation for the property taken or for any injury sustained. Anderson; 34 La. An. 494.

LEVITICAL DEGREES. Those degrees of kindred set forth in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus, within which persons are prohibited to marry. 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 737.

LEVITY. By the Act of 1815 and the general law on divorce, it is necessary to establish that the complaint "is not made out of levity or by collusion (q. v.) between said husband and wife, and for the mere purpose of being freed and separated from each other, but in sincerity and truth for the causes mentioned in the said petition or libel."

Exactly what the word "levity" means in the statute, has never been decided. . . . It may well be that the term "levity" in the Act of 1815 is intended to describe the offense which is generally called connivance. 30 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 359. See COLLUSION.

LEVY. To raise. Webster, Dict. To levy a nuisance, i. e. to raise or do a nuisance, 9 Co. 55; to levy a fine, i. e. to raise or acknowledge a fine, 2 Bla. Com. 357; 1 Steph. Com. 286; to levy a tax, i. e. to raise or collect a tax; to levy war, i. e. to raise or begin war, to take arms for attack, 4 Bla. Com. 81; to levy an execution, i. e. to raise or levy so much money on execution. Reg. Orig. 298.

In Practice. A seizure; the raising of the money for which an execution has been issued.

In order to make a valid levy on personal property, the sheriff must have it within his power and control, or at least within his view; and if, having it so, he makes a levy upon it, it will be good if followed up afterwards within a reasonable time by his taking possession in such manner as to apprise everybody of the fact of its having been taken into execution. See 84 Wis. 80; 99 N. C. 21; 83 Va. 459. To constitute a levy, a seizure is necessary, if from the nature of the property that is possible, but if not, then some act as nearly equivalent as practicable must be substituted for it; 97 N. C. 286. It is not necessary that an inventory should be made, nor that the sheriff should immediately remove the goods or put a person in possession; 3 Rawle 405; 1 Wash. C. C. 29; 46 Pa. 294. See 51 N. J. L. 148. A levy of an attachment effected in the night time by opening a window, or forcing an outer door of the house containing the goods, is valid; 85 Tenn. 368. A levy on a leasehold need not be in view of the premises if sufficiently descriptive; 77 Pa. 103. The usual mode of making levy upon real estate is to describe the land which has been seized under the execution, by metes and bounds, as in a deed of conveyance; 1 T. & H. Pr. § 1216. See 23 Neb.

738. The lien of an attachment on real estate levied upon, dates from the time the officer indorses the levy on the writ; 69 Tex. 198.

It is the duty of the sheriff, in Illinois, to notify the defendant in execution, before making the levy, and to apply to him for the payment of the execution; 129 Ill. 190. Property cannot be placed in custodia legis by an unauthorized levy; 86 Fed. Rep. 770. Retaining possession under a levy is not necessary to preserve the lien of the levy against a subsequent deed of assignment by the debtor; 108 N. C. 79; where the debt and costs are paid before seizure there is no levy; 9 L. J. Q. B. 232; 3 P. & D. 511; or where the fi. fa. was, after seizure but before sale, set aside for irregularity; 31 L. J. C. P. 361; or where the sale was prevented by a compromise between the parties; 5 Term 470. See POUNDAGE; EXECUTION.

It is a general rule that when a sufficient levy has been made the officer cannot make a second; 12 Johns. 208; 8 Cow. 192.

If an officer violates his duty, by making an excessive levy on property pointed out, he is liable for such special damages as the defendant may incur thereby; 77 Ga. 83; and when damages result from the wrongful seizure under judicial process of property exempt, not only the officer making the seizure but those for whom it was made and who ratified the act, as well as those who direct it, are liable in damages; 70 Tex. 661. See ATTACHMENT.

LEVY COURT. That body charged with the administration of the ministerial and financial duties of Washington County. It was charged with the duty of laying out and repairing roads, building bridges, and keeping them in good order, providing poorhouses, and the general care of the poor; and with laying and collecting the taxes which were necessary to enable it to discharge these and other duties, and to pay the other expenses of the county. It had the capacity to make contracts in reference to any of these matters, and to raise money to meet these contracts. It had perpetual succession. Its functions were those which, in the several States, are performed by "county commissioners," "overseers of the poor," "county supervisors," and similar bodies with other designations.

If not a corporation in the full sense of the term, it was a quasi corporation, and could sue and be sued, in regard to any matter in which, by law, it had rights to be enforced, or was under obligations which it refused to fulfill. 2 Wall (U. S.) 507, 508.

LEVYING WAR. In Criminal Law. The assembling of a body of men for the purpose of effecting by force a treasonable object; and all who perform any part, however minute or however remote from the scene of action, and who are leagued in the general conspiracy, are considered as engaged in levying war, within the meaning of the constitution; 4 Cra. 473, 474; Const. art. 3, s. 3. See TREASON; Fries Trial, Pamphl. This is a technical term, borrowed from the English law, and its meaning is the same as it is when used in stat. 25 Ed. III.; 4 Cra. 471; U. S. v. Fries, Pamphl. 167; Hall, Am. L. J. 351; Burr's Trial; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 62; 9 C. & P. 129. Where war has been levied, all who aid in its prosecution by performing any part in furtherance of the common object, however minute, or however remote from the scene of action, are guilty of treason; 2 Abbott 304. See INSURRECTION.

LEWDNESS. That form of immorality which has relation to sexual impurity. 61 Fed. Rep. 41. See LASCIVIOUSNESS.

Licentiousness; an offence, when of an open and notorious character; as by frequenting houses of ill-fame, or by some grossly scandalous and public indecency. R. & L. Dict.

LEX (Lat.). A rule of law which magistrates and people had agreed upon by means of a solemn declaration of consensus.

Sohn, Inst. R. L. 28.

In the later empire, which dates from the fourth century, there were two groups of the sources of the law, jus (q. v.), i. e. the old traditional law, and leges which had sprung from imperial legislation. Jus was based upon the law of the Twelve Tables, plebiscite, senatus-consulta, the praetorian edict, and the ordinances of the earlier emperors, which, partly owing to their language and partly on account of the bald sententiousness, and the pregnant phraseology in which they were couched, came to be mainly used, both by the praetor and by the parties, through the classic literature where their results were set forth and worked out. This resulted in identifying jus with jurist-made law, and on the edict of the Law of Citations (q. v.) by Valentinian III., the distinction between jus and lex was practically lost. See Inst. 1. 2. 3; Sohn, Inst. R. L. 82; JUS SCRIPTA.

In England there was no careful discrimination between jus, and lex, and consuetudo, although they were not, in all contexts, used with exactly similar meaning. Leges was sometimes applied by both Glanville and Bracton to the unwritten laws of England, and although Bracton contrasts consuetudo with lex, there was no general definite theory as to the relation between enacted and unenacted law—the relation between law and custom, and the relation between law as it was and law as it ought to be. The king's justices claimed a certain power of improving the law, but they might not change the law, and the king might issue new writs without the consent of a national assembly, but not where such writs were contrary to the law. Jus commune was used by the canonists to distinguish the general and ordinary law of the universal church from any rules peculiar to a particular national or provincial church, and from the papal privilegia, and the phrase was also used in the dialogue on the Exchequer, but it was not until the time of Edward I. that it was superseded by lex communis, or that the common law could be contrasted with the statute law, the royal prerogative or local custom. 1 Poll. & Maitl. 154. See JUS SCRIPTUM.

LEX AEBUTIA. The law which, with the leges Juliae, in part abolished the legis actiones. It was confined to legal proceedings before the praetor urbanus, i. e. to those cases where a judicium was appointed to try a cause between Roman citizens within the first milestone from Rome. It provided that a judicium could be instituted in a city court without legis actio, merely by means of the formula or praetorian decree of appointment, and placed the legis actio and the formula, so far as the civil law was concerned, on a footing of equality. In cases falling under the jurisdiction of the centumviral court, cases of voluntary jurisdiction, and damnum infectum, the legis actio remained in use; as, according to the praetorian law in such cases, no judex was appointed, and consequently no formula was granted, and it was only in cases where there was no formula and no decree of appointment that the legis actio survived. Sohn, Rom. L. 178. See JUDEX; FORMULE.

LEX AELIA SENTIA. The law restraining the manumission of slaves. Morey, R. L. 99. See MANUMISSION.

The Aelian Sentian law, respecting wills. R. & L. Dict.

LEX AGRARIA. See AGRARIAN LAW.

LEX AMISSA. The law concerning outlaws.

LEX ANASTASIANA. The law admitting as agnati the children of emancipated brothers and sisters. Inst. 3. 5.

The Anastasian Rescript, A. D. 503. A form of emancipation which did not require the presence of the parties to go through the fictitious sale, as formerly. Anastasius made provision whereby a paterfamilias away from home might emancipate his children. He did not abolish the old forms, but introduced this novelty as an additional means of releasing children from the potestas. A petition must be sent to the Emperor, and his favorable answer obtained. The answer must be registered, produced in a court having jurisdiction over emancipation, and deposited along with the petition to the Emperor; and if the persons emancipated were not infants, their consent must be given. The act was perfected by the formal consent of the Emperor. Hunter, Rom. L. 213, 214; C. 8, 49, 5.

LEX APOLEIA. A law establishing a kind of partnership between the different sponsors or fide promissors, and allowing any one of them who had paid the whole debt to recover from the others what he had paid in excess of his own share by an action pro socio. Inst. 3. 30.

LEX AQUILIA. The law, superseding the earlier portions of the Twelve Tables, providing a remedy for wilful and negligent damage to corporeal property.

Although an action founded upon the text of this law could only be brought when the damage was caused by actual contact of the offending party with the body of the injured thing, the praetor subsequently extended it in the shape of an actio utilis to cases where the damage was merely the indirect result of the act of the defendant, and in certain cases, he even granted an actio in factum under the pattern of the lex aquilia in cases where there was not, strictly speaking, any damage to the thing, but where the owner was deprived of it in such a manner as to make it tantamount to a destruction of the thing.

By this law, if the slave or animal were wrongfully killed, the owner could recover from the slayer, not the actual value of the property at the time of the death, but the greatest value that it had possessed during the previous year, and when the damage consisted of any other injury to corporeal things, he was obliged to pay the highest value of such property within the month immediately preceding. If the wrongdoer denied his liability and judgment was against him, he was obliged to pay double damages. This law also provided for an action against stipulators who abused their formal rights, but this portion of it fell into disuse because the recognition by the civil law of the obligation by mandatum enabled the injured party to sue the fraudulent stipulator by the actio mandati directa for full damages. See Sohm, Rom. L. 323; Morey, Rom. L. 281.

LEX ATILIA. The law which conferred upon the magistrate the right of appointing guardians. It applied only to the city of Rome; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 400.

LEX ATINIA. A plebiscitum named after its proposer, Atinius Labeo, 557. It provided that things stolen or seized by violence could not be acquired by use, although they have been possessed bona fide during the length of time prescribed by usucapion (q. v.). Inst. 2. 6. 3.

LEX BREHONIA. The Brehon law, which see.

LEX BRETOISE. The law of the Ancient Britons or Marches of Wales, Cowel.

LEX CALPURNIA. The law which extended the scope of the action allowed by the lex Silia, q. v., to all obligations for any certain definite thing.

Condictio. A law by which the condictio (a form of action in Roman Law) was extended to the recovery of any specific thing. Hunter Rom. L. p. 464. See CONDICTIO; LEX SILIA.

Repetundae. Another law, by the same title, instituted the first of those courts called Standing Commissions, for the trial of persons charged with malversation in the provinces, B. C. 149. Id. p. 56, 57.

LEX CANULEIA. The law which conferred upon the plebeians the connubium, or the right of intermarriage with Roman citizens. Morey, Rom. L. 48.

By this concession of the connubium, it was open to plebeians to share in the peculiar religious observances of the patrician caste, and in the auspicia by which was ascertained the will of the gods (not to mention the will of the patrician magistrates) in respect to the Roman state. The levelling effects of this legal mixture of patrician and plebeian blood, socially and politically are not to be easily over-estimated. But the political results, the removal of intolerable political disabilities, formed the aim and object of the plebeian contention at that time. Hunter, Rom. L. 25.

LEX CINCIA. The law which prohibited certain kinds of gifts.

An old Roman Statute, B. C. 204, that continued to exist up to the time of Constantine, but fell into desuetude before Justinian, prohibiting gifts beyond a certain amount, except as between certain relatives. Gifts to the extent to which they exceeded the limit, but no further, were void. It seems, however, that if the donor did not revoke the gift during his life or by will, the gift was confirmed. Hunter, Rom. L. 319; Frag. Vat. 266, 294.

LEX CLAUDIA. The law abolishing agnatic guardianship over women of free birth.

LEX COMMISSORIA. The law which provided that the debtor and creditor might agree that if the debtor did not pay at the day, the pledge should become the absolute property of the creditor. This law was abolished by a law of the Emperor Constantine as unjust and oppressive, and having a growing asperity in practice. 2 Kent 568.

LEX COMMUNIS (L. Lat.). The common law.

LEX ET CONSUETUDO REGNI NOSTRI. The law and the custom of our realm; one of the names of the common law. R. & L. Dict. See LEGES ET CONSUETUDINES REGNI.

LEX CORNELIA. The Cornelian law which, among the Romans, provided remedies for injuries to person or property. R. & L. Dict.

LEX CORNELIA DE EDICTIS. The law forbidding a praetor to depart during his term of office from the edict he had promulgated at its commencement. Sohm, Rom. L. 51. See PRÆTOR.

LEX CORNELIA DE FALSIS. The law which provided that the same penalty should attach to the forgery of a testament of a person dying in captivity as to that of a testament made by a person dying in his own country. Inst. 2. 12. 5.

The Cornelian Law on forgery and on wills. It provided that if a captive died in captivity his death should be held to date, not from the actual moment of his decease, but from the time he was captured; so that, although he lived a prisoner, he died free. (D. 49, 15, 18.) This convenient fiction prevented the ill consequences that would have resulted from striking out in a family a link in the chain of hereditary succession. Hunter, Rom. L. 216.

The law also imposes a penalty on the man that writes seals, publicly reads, or foists in a will or other document that is forged; or that makes, cuts, or moulds a spurious seal wilfully and maliciously. The penalty is, for slaves, the last punishment of the law, as upheld in the statute on poisoners and assassins; for freemen, deportation. (J. 4, 18, 7.) Id., 1062.

Corrupting a judge, or causing him to be corrupted, was punishable under this same statute. (D. 48, 10, 21.) Id., 1066.

The law also provided that to obtain money by threatening an accusation of crime was visited with punishment. (D. 47, 13, 2.) Id., 1070.

LEX CORNELIA DE INJURIIS. The law providing a civil action for the recovery of a penalty in certain cases of bodily injury. Sohm, R. L. 329.

The lex Cornelia (B. C. 81) speaks of injuriae, and brought in a special actio injuriarum. This action lay when a man alleged that he had been beaten or scourged, or that his house had been entered by force. And by "house" in this case was understood his own house in which he dwelled, or a hired house, or one in which he lived rent-free or as a guest. (J. 4, 4, 8.) In one sense this latter offence can hardly be considered as directed against the person of the occupier but it was against his dignity; for the majesty of a Roman citizen was supposed to extend beyond his strict personality to his immediate belongings, and even to his clothes. (D. 47, 10, 9, pr.) Hunter, Rom. L. 149.

In cases where the lex Cornelia applied, involving an injury to reputation, the defendant was allowed to take an oath and clear the plaintiff's character, thereby escaping punishment. (D. 47, 10, 5, 8.) Id. 155.

LEX CORNELIA DE SICARIIS.

The law respecting assassins and poisoners, and containing provisions against other deeds of violence. It made the killing of the slave of another person punishable by death or exile, and the provisions of this law were extended by the Emperor Antoninus Pius to the case of a master killing his own slave. Inst. 1. 8.

Poisoners were likewise condemned, who, by the hateful arts of poisons and magic spells they whispered, had killed men, or who have publicly sold evil drugs. (J. 4, 18, 5.) Hunter, Rom. L. 1061, 1062.

To procure the conviction of a person of an offence punishable with death by false testimony, was forbidden by the lex Cornelia de Sicariis. The punishment was, death for common people; deportation, for persons of rank. (D. 48, 8, 16.) Id. 1066. Those who offered sacrifices to injure their neighbors, even if no evil result followed were punished under this statute. Id. 1068 et seq.

LEX CORNELIA DE SPONSU. A law prohibiting one from binding himself for the same debtor to the same creditor in the same year for more than a specified amount. Inst. 2. 20.

And although a sponsor or fidepromissor should bind himself for a greater sum than the maximum twenty-thousand aesterii, say one hundred thousand, he is condemned to pay only twenty. By money lent was meant not only that directly given on loan, but all that at the time the obligation was contracted was certain to become due; that is, for which the debtor had come to be bound unconditionally. Further, the name money in that statute embraced property of every kind. Hunter, Rom. L. 572.

LEX CORNELIA DE TESTAMENTARIA. See LEX CORNELIA DE FALSIS.

LEX DOMICILII. See DOMICIL; LEX LOCI.

LEX FABIA (FAVIA) DE PLAGIARIIS.

The Fabian law on kidnappers. To imprison a man, or forcibly keep him as a slave, knowing him to be free, was an offence dealt with by a statute lex Fabia or Favia, in existence before Cicero. That statute imposed only a pecuniary penalty, and it fell into disuse when kidnapping freemen was made a crime. Hunter, Rom. L. 147; (D. 48, 15, 7; C. 9, 20, 7.)

LEX FALCIDIA. See FALCIDIAN LAW.

LEX FORI (Lat. the law of the forum). The law of the country to the tribunal of which appeal is made. 5 Cl. & F. 1.

The local or territorial law of the country to which a court, wherein an action is brought, or other legal proceeding is taken, belongs. Dicey, Conf. Laws 66.

A cause of action arising in one state, under the common law as there understood, may be enforced in another state where it would not constitute a cause of action, if the variance in these laws does not amount to a fundamental difference of policy; 180 Mass. 571.

The lex fori is to decide who are proper parties to a suit; 11 Ind. 485; 33 Miss. 423; Merlin, Rép. Etrang. § II.; Westl. Priv. Int. Law 409.

The lex fori governs as to the nature, extent, and character of the remedy; 17 Conn. 500; 37 N. H. 86; 2 Pat. & H. 144; as, in case of instruments considered sealed where made, but not in the country where sued upon; 5 Johns. 289; 1 B. & P. 380; 3 Gill & J. 234; 3 Conn. 623; 27 Ia. 251; 91 U. S. 406; 9 Mo. 56, 157.

Arrest and imprisonment may be allowed by the lex fori, though they are not by the lex loci contractus; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 14 Johns. 346; 3 Mass. 88; 10 Wheat. 1.

For the law of interest as affected by the lex fori, see CONFLICT OF LAWS. For the law in relation to damages, see DAMAGES.

The forms of judgment and execution are to be determined by the lex fori; 8 Mass. 83; 4 Conn. 47; 14 Pet. 67.

The lex fori decides as to deprivation of remedy in that jurisdiction.

Where a debt is discharged by the law of the place of payment, such discharge will, it is said, amount to a discharge everywhere; 12 Wheat. 360; 1 W. Bla. 258; 13 Mass. 1; 16 Mart. La. 297; 7 Cush. 15; 1 Woodb. & M. 115; 23 Wend. 87; 5 Binn. 332; 16 Me. 208; 2 Blackf. 366; see 6 Dak. 91; LEX LOCI; unless such discharge is held by courts of another jurisdiction to contravene natural justice; 13 Mass. 6; 1 South. 192. It must be a discharge from the debt, and not an exemption from the effect of particular means of enforcing the remedy; 14 Johns. 346; 8 B. & C. 479; 7 Me. 387; 11 Mart. La. 790; 15 Mass. 419; 5 Mass. 387.

The insolvent laws of the various states which purport to discharge the debt are, at most, allowed that effect only as against their own citizens; as between their own citizens and strangers, where the claims of the latter have not been proved, they only work a destruction in the remedy; 5 Mass. 375; 4 Conn. 47; 14 Pet. 67; 12 Wheat. 218, 858, 869; 8 Pick. 194; 3 Ia. 299; 71 Wis. 350; 128 Ill. 222; 123 Pa. 452; at least, if there be no provision in the contract requiring performance in the state where the discharge is obtained; 9 Conn. 314; 13 Mass. 18, 20; 7 Johns. Ch. 297; 1 Breese 16; 4 Gill & J. 509. In the United States and some state courts, the discharge of a citizen of the state, granting a discharge from an obligation, is not a bar against a citizen of another state, although the contract creating the obligation was to be performed in the state granting the discharge; 1 Wall. 228; 3 Keyes 80; 5 Md. 1; 25 Conn. 603; 48 Me. 9; 2 Blackf. 394; but see 2 Gray 49. If claims are proved, the submission to the jurisdiction may work a discharge; 3 Johns. Ch. 485; 3 Pet. 411; 5 How. 295, 299; 7 Cush. 45; 2 Blackf. 394. See INSOLVENCY.

Statutes of limitation affect the remedy only; and hence the lex fori will be the governing law; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 8 id. 121, 140; 11 Pick. 80; 7 Ind. 91; 2 Paine 437; 36 Me. 382; 83 Ill. 365; 68 N. Y. 39; 51 Fed. Rep. 188; 77 Ga. 202; 65 Hun 17; 111 U. S. 81; L. R. 4 Q. B. 653; 72 Tex. 306. But these statutes restrict the remedy for citizens and strangers alike; 10 B. & C. 908; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 3 Johns. Ch. 190; 6 Wend. 473; 9 Mart. La. 526. For the effect of a discharge by statutes of limitation, where they are so drawn as to effect a discharge, in a foreign state, see STORY, Conf. Laws § 582; 11 Wheat. 361; 3 Bingham N. C. 202; 6 Rob. La. 15; 3 Hen. & M. 57. The restriction applies to a suit on a foreign judgment; 5 Cl. & F. 1; 18 Pet. 812; 4 Cow. 528; 1 Gall. 371; 9 How. 407. If a statute in force in the place where the cause of action arose extinguishes the obligation, and does not merely bar the remedy, no action can be maintained in another jurisdiction after it has taken effect; 148 Pa. 146; 6 Dak. 91. In some states, by statute, where suit is brought on a contract made in another state, the statute of limitations in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose is made to apply.

The right of set-off is to be determined by the lex fori; 2 N. H. 296; 6 B. Monr. 301; 18 Oreg. 57; 83 Ill. 365; 3 Johns. 263. See 13 N. H. 126. Liens, implied hypothecations, and priorities of claim, generally, are matters of remedy; 12 La. Ann. 289; but only, it would seem, where the property affected is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the forum; Whart. Conf. L. § 317; 5 Cra. 289. See L. R. 3 Ch. App. 484. A prescriptive title to personal property, acquired in a former domicile, will be respected by the lex fori; 17 Ves. 88; 3 Hen. & M. 57; 5 Cra. 358; 11 Wheat. 361; 1 Coldw. 43; 5 B. Monr. 521; 16 Hun 80.

Questions of the admissibility and effect of evidence are to be determined by the lex fori; 12 La. Ann. 410; 12 Barb. 631; 7 Ohio St. 134; 106 U. S. 124; 115 Mass. 304; also questions of costs; 36 Neb. 507. Exemption laws are ordinarily governed by the lex fori; 31 Kan. 180; 70 Miss. 344. See 97 Ala. 275; EVIDENCE.

The administration of a deceased person's movables is governed wholly by the law of the country where the administrator acts and from which he derives his authority to collect them (lex fori); and without regard to the domicile of the deceased; but the distribution of the distributable residue is governed by the lex domicilii; Dicey, Conf. Laws 674, 677; 28 Ch. D. 175; 72 Ala. 311; 70 Ga. 528; 152 Mass. 74; 31 W. Va. 790; 143 Ill. 25. Usually the distributable residue is remitted to the administration of the domicile for distribution; 88 Pa. 131; but it is in the discretion of the court of the ancillary administration to distribute such residue; 152 Mass. 74; 25 S. C. 1; 161 Pa. 218. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

An action in furtum for an act done in a foreign country will not lie in England unless the act was a tort both in such foreign country and in England; Dicey, Conf. Laws 690. So in the United States; 86 Tex. 68; 126 N. Y. 10; 50 Ark. 155; 72 Md. 144. But it is ordinarily assumed that the laws of the two countries are the same; 160 Mass. 571.

Whether an act constitutes an actionable wrong in England which is tortious by the law of England, and not strictly justifiable under the law of the country where it was done, though not actionable there, is doubtful; Dicey, Conf. Laws 661; 10 Q. B. D. (C. A.) 521; 1 H. & C. 219. An action lies in one state on a wrong done in another state, which is actionable there, although it would not be actionable in the state where suit is brought unless it be contrary to its own public policy; 146 U. S. 643; 81 Fed. Rep. 394.

The damages recoverable from an employer for the death of his employee, caused by the negligence of the former, are controlled by the law of the place where the contract of employment was made and the accident occurred, though the death took place and the action was brought in another state; 154 U. S. 190. The statutes of one state giving an action for wrongful death may be enforced in the federal courts of another state, if not inconsistent with the statutes and policy thereof; 145 U. S. 598. An action of tort will lie in England to be tried under the rules of the maritime law, in case of a collision on the high seas, between two foreign ships; 10 Q. B. D. (C. A.) 521. See, also, the Merchants Shipping Act, 1894. In the United States, in case of a collision on the high seas between ships of different nationalities, the general maritime law governs, as administered in the courts of the country in which the action is brought, except that if the maritime law, as administered by both nations to which the respective ships belong, be the same in both in respect to any matter of liability or obligation, such law, if shown to the court, should be followed, although different from the maritime law of the country of the forum; 114 U. S. 355. See also 14 Wall. 170; 105 U. S. 24.

The law of the forum as to the validity of a bequest will be applied to a gift by will to a foreign corporation, especially when this carries out and does not frustrate the testator's intention, although the law of the state which created the corporation may be different; 35 L. R. A. (Md.) 693.

As to the proof of foreign law, see FOREIGN LAW.

LEX FUFIA CANINIA. A Roman Law passed in A. D. 8 which placed severe restrictions on the enfranchisement of slaves. The freedmen were felt to be too numerous. For example, the statute set a fixed limit to the manumission of slaves by will as follows: The owner of more than 2, and not more than 10, was allowed to free any number not exceeding one-half; the owner of more than 10, and not more than 30, was allowed to free any number not exceeding one-third, etc. But, in each number, where only one-third, one-fourth, or one-fifth could be freed, one might always manumit as many as were allowed to the lower number that went before. To manumission not by will this statute did not apply. Hunter, Rom. L. 182; G. I., 42-43. The statute ordered that slaves were to be freed by name, for freedom could not be given to an indeterminate person. Id., 922; G. 2, 238.

LEX FURIA DESPONSU. The law limiting the liability of sponsors and fidepromissors to two years, and providing that as between several co-sponsors or co-fidepromissors, the debt should be ipso jure, divided according to the number of the sureties without taking the solvency of individual sureties into account. It applied only to Italy. Sohm, Rom. L. 299, n.; Inst. 3, 20.

LEX FURIA TESTAMENTARIA. A law enacting that a testator might not bequeath as a legacy more than one thousand asses.

The Furian Law on Wills. This was designed to prevent a man spending his whole patrimony in legacies. The statute failed to effect its purpose, however, for although one was forbidden by it to take more than a certain amount of a man's patrimony as a legacy, the patrimony could be divided among several persons, a limited amount bequeathed to each. Hunter, Rom. L. 750, 751; G. 2, 225.

LEX GABINIA, JUBELLARIA. (B. C. 139). A Roman law introducing the ballot in the election of magistrates. Hunter, Rom. L. p. 63.

LEX GERNICIA. A law declaring interest illegal. Inst. 3, 13.

LEX HORATIO ET VALERIA. In B. C. 449, immediately upon the re-establishment of the tribuneship, the privileges of the plebeians were confirmed by the leges Valeriae et Horatiae, passed by the comitia centuriata on the proposal of the consuls Valerius and Horatius. (See LEX HORTENSIA.) By one of these laws it was enacted that henceforth the resolutions of the comitia should be binding on the whole people. By a second Valerian-Horatian law the right of appeal was renewed, under the severest sanctions; whoever should procure the election of a magistrate from whose sentence there should be no appeal was threatened with outlawry and death. The plebeians were thus confirmed in their right of appeal from the decision of a patrician magistrate to the assembly of the tribes. A third provision revived and confirmed by law the sacred and inviolable character of the tribunes and the sediles. Hunter, Rom. L. 25, 26.

LEX HORTENSIA. The law giving the plebeians a full share in the jus publicum and the jus sacrum. Sand. Just. Intro. § 9.

The Hortensian Law of B. C. 287, which enacted that the resolutions of the assembly of the tribes should be directly, without modification or control or delay, binding on the whole Roman people. This law was a complete triumph of the plebeians in their struggle for political equality with the patricians. Hunter, Rom. L. 25, 26.

LEX JULIA. See LEGES JULIAE.

LEX JUNIA NORBANA. The law conferring legal freedom on all such freedmen as were tuitioe pratoris. See LATINI JUNIANI. Lex Junia Villejana conferred the same right on posthumous children born in the lifetime of the testator, but after the execution of the will, as were enjoyed by those born after the death of the testator. Sohm, Rom. L. 463.

By this law, all slaves, whose personal freedom was guaranteed by the Praetor, were raised to the condition of Latin colonists. Hunter, Rom. L. 27, 172. There were two kinds of manumission, formal and informal. At first the forms of manumission were strict and ceremonial, and they conferred the title of citizen; at a later stage, the inconveniences arising from a strict adherence to these forms became a serious evil, and through the edict of the Praetor and the lex Junia Norbana slaves released by their masters informally were protected in their liberty and raised to the condition of Latin colonists. Id., 173.

LEX KANTIAE. The body of customs prevailing in Kent during the time of Edward I. A written statement of these customs was sanctioned by the king's justices in eyre. They were mainly concerned with the maintenance of a form of land tenure known as gavelkind (q. v.). 1 Poll. & Maitl. 166.

LEX LAETORIA. See LEX PLATORIA.

LEX LOCI (Lat.). The law of the place. This may be either lex loci contractus (the law of the place of making a contract); lex loci rei sitae or lex situs (the law of the place where a thing is situated); lex loci actus, or lex actus (the law of the place where a legal transaction takes place); lex loci celebrationis (the law of the place where a contract is made); lex loci solutionis (the law of the place where a contract is to be performed); lex loci delicti commissi (the law of the place where a tort is committed).

In general, however, lex loci is only used for lex loci contractus. As will appear infra, lex loci contractus is used in a double sense in many of the cases. It is used sometimes to denote the law of the place where the contract was made, and at other times to denote the law by which the contract is to be governed, which may or may not be the same as that of the place where it was made. The earlier cases do not regard the distinction, and are to be read with this fact in mind. See infra, where the distinction is made clear by Dicey, Conf. of Laws.

CONTRACTS. In the older cases it is held that it is a general principle applying to contracts made, rights acquired, or acts done relative to personal property, that the law of the place of making the contract, or doing the act, is to govern it and determine its validity or invalidity, as well as the rights of parties under it, in all matters touching the modes of execution and authentication of the form or instruments of contract; and also in relation to the use and meaning of the language in which it is expressed, the construction and interpretation of it, the legal duties and obligations imposed by it and the legal rights and immunities acquired under it; 8 Cl. & F. 121; 1 Pet. 317; 2 N. H. 42; 6 Vt. 102; 7 Cush. 30; 3 Conn. 253, 472; 14 Id. 583; 22 Barb. 118; 17 Pa. 91; 2 H. & J. 198; 3 Dev. 161; 6 Mart. La. 85; 4 Ohio St. 241; 14 B. Monr. 556; 19 Mo. 84; 4 Fla. 404; 28 Miss. 42; 12 La. Ann. 607; 3 Stor. 465; Ware 402; 91 U. S. 406; 24 N. J. L. 819; 86 Conn. 39; 2 Woods, C. C. 244; 65 Barb. 265.

This principle, though general, does not, however, apply where the parties at the time of entering into the contract had the law of another country in view, or where the lex loci is in itself unjust, contra bonos mores (against good morals), or contrary to the public law of the state, as regarding the interest of religion or morality, or the general well-being of society; 9 N. H. 271; 6 Pet. 173; 1 How. 169; 17 Johns. 511; 13 Mass. 23; 5 Cl. & F. 11; 8 Id. 121; 6 Whart. 331; 1 B. Monr. 32; 5 Ired. 590; Story, Conf. Laws § 280; see 38 W. Va. 390; 58 Fed. Rep. 796; or the rights of citizens of the forum; 12 Barb. 631; 13 Mass. 6. And where the place of performance is different from the locus contractus, it is presumed the parties had the law of the former in mind; 55 Fed. Rep. 223; App. Cas. D. C. 277.

Where an oral promise was made in South Carolina to accept a draft payable in New York, it was held that matters bearing on the execution, interpretation, and validity of the contract are determined by the law of the place where it is made; those connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance, and that the contract in question was governed by the law of South Carolina; 26 U. S. App. 133.

Where residents of two different states enter into a contract which would be invalid in one state, but valid in the other, and by its terms make it a contract of the latter state, and to be there performed, it will be presumed that they intended it to be governed by the laws of such state; 83 Fed. Rep. 408.

The validity or invalidity of a contract as affected by the lex loci may depend upon the capacity of the parties or the legality of the act to be done.

The capacity of the parties as affected by questions of minority or majority, incapacities incident to coverture, guardianship, emancipation, and other personal qualities or disabilities, is, it has been said, to be decided by the law of the place of making the contract; Story, Conf. Laws § 108; 1 Grant 51. See infra.

The question of disability to make a contract on account of infancy is to be decided by the lex loci; 8 Esp. 163, 597; 17 Mart. La. 597; 8 Johns. 189; 1 Grant 51; 2 Kent 233. So, also, as to contracts made by married women; 8 Johns. 189; 13 La. 177; 5 East 81.

Personal disqualifications not arising from the law of nature, but from positive law, and especially such as are penal, are strictly territorial, and are not to be enforced in any country other than that where they originate; Story, Conf. Laws §§ 91, 104, 620; 2 Kent 459. See Whart. Conf. L. § 101; 67 Barb. 9.

Natural disabilities, such as insanity, imbecility, etc., are everywhere recognized, so that the question whether they are controlled by the lex loci or lex domicilii seems to be theoretic rather than practical. On principle there seems to be no good reason why they should come under a different rule from the positive disabilities.

It is said that the weight of American authority is in favor of holding that a contract which by the law of the place is recognized as lawfully made by a capable person, is valid everywhere, although the person would not, under the law of his domicile, be deemed capable of making it; 125 Mass. 374; see 84 N. Y. 393; 69 Me. 106. But Dicey (Conf. Laws) is of opinion that the capacity to contract is governed by the lex domicilii; and in 113 U. S. 452, it is said that "as a general rule the law of the domicile governs the status of a person." See, also, 87 Tenn. 445, 644.

The legality or illegality of the contract will be determined by the lex loci, unless it affects injuriously the public morals or rights, contravenes the policy, or violates a public law of the country where a remedy is sought; 2 Kent 458.

A contract illegal by the law of the place of its making and performance will generally be held so everywhere; 1 Gall. 875; 2 Mass. 88; 2 N. H. 42; 2 Mas. 459; 18 Pet. 65, 78; 2 Johns. Cas. 355; 1 N. & M'C. 173;

2 H. & J. 198, 221, 225; 17 Ill. 828; 16 Tex. 844; 2 Burr. 1077; 2 Kent 458; Story, Conf. Laws § 243. See 39 Fed. Rep. 800; 42 Ch. D. (C. A.) 321; but see 112 N. C. 59; but Dicey, Conf. Laws 580, is of opinion that this rule, though sound in principle, does not rest, in England, upon an unassailable foundation of authority.

An exception is said to exist in case of contracts made in violation of the revenue laws; Cas. t. Hardw. 85; 2 C. Rob. 6; 2 Cr. M. & R. 311; 2 Kent 458.

A contract legal by the lex loci will be so everywhere; 18 La. Ann. 117; 146 Ill. 523; unless—

It is injurious to public rights or morals; 2 C. & P. 347; 1 B. & P. 840; 6 Mass. 379; 2 H. & J. 198; or contravenes the policy; 23 Ark. 533; 60 Ala. 380; 2 Sim. Ch. 194; 16 Johns. 488; 5 Harring. 31; 1 Green, Ch. 326; 17 Ga. 253. See 82 Ga. 142; 112 N. C. 59; or violates a positive law of the lex fori; or, in England, violates any English rule of procedure; Dicey, Conf. Laws 542. The application of the lex loci is a matter of comity; and that law must, in all cases, yield to the positive law of the place of seeking the remedy; 18 Pick. 193; 1 Green, Ch. 328; 12 Barb. 631; 17 Miss. 247. See 10 N. Y. 53.

It is held generally that the claims of citizens are to be preferred to those of foreigners. Assignments, under the insolvent laws of a foreign state, are often held inoperative as against claims of a citizen of the state, in regard to personal property in the jurisdiction of the lex fori; 1 Green, Ch. 326; 5 Harring. 31; 32 Miss. 246; 13 La. Ann. 280; 21 Barb. 198; but see 12 Md. 54. But there appears to be a distinction. This rule is well settled in all cases where the assignment of the property of an insolvent is made, in invitum, by a court in a foreign jurisdiction, to a receiver, assignee, etc.; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7338; 14 Allen 355; 135 Ind. 477; 81 Cal. 551. But where a voluntary assignment is made, if good where made and made in conformity with the law where the property is situated, it is valid in the latter state, ex proprio vigore; 117 Pa. 30; 10 Mo. App. 7; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7347; Story, Conf. L. § 111.

A contract made with a view to violate the law at the place of performance is invalid; 14 R. I. 388; 63 Ind. 587. An immoral contract, e. g. to bribe or corruptly influence the officers of a foreign government, will not be enforced wherever made; 103 U. S. 261; or one that violates good morals; 43 Miss. 444; 87 N. J. L. 23; but Sunday laws are not considered as rules of positive morality; 87 Miss. 408; nor, ordinarily, are usury laws; 103 Mass. 323; 77 N. Y. 578. See Moore's note to Dicey, Conf. Laws 582. It was said, in a case of usury, that if a contract is valid by the law of the state where it is made, and is not immoral, the courts of another state will enforce it, although its own laws prohibit such a contract; 31 Fed. Rep. 516.

In an action in Pennsylvania on a promissory note governed as to the contract by the law of New Jersey, the question of whether parol evidence will be admitted to vary the contract must depend upon the law of New Jersey, and not upon the lex fori. It was said that the right to introduce proof dehors the instrument for the purpose of showing what, in fact, the contract was, is an essential part of the contract itself, and not a mere incident to the remedy; 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 115, citing 110 Pa. 478; 148 Pa. 146; and 154 Mass. 213.

A statute requiring a foreign corporation, as a condition of doing business within the state, to stipulate not to remove suits into the federal court, is void because it makes the right to a permit dependent on the surrender by the foreign corporation of a privilege secured to it by the constitution and laws of the United States; 121 U. S. 186; 20 Wall. 445. See JURISDICTION.

The interpretation of contracts is to be governed by the law of the country where the contract was made; 2 B. & Ad. 746; 10 B. & C. 203; 2 Hagg. Cons. 60, 61; 6 Pet. 861; 80 Ala. N. S. 258; 4 McLean 540; 2 Bla. Com. 141; Story, Conf. Laws § 270.

The lex loci governs as to the formalities and authentication requisite to the valid execution of contracts; Story, Conf. Laws §§ 123, 260; 11 La. 14; 2 Hill N. Y. 227; 37 N. H. 86; 30 Vt. 42. But in proving the existence of, and seeking remedies for, the breach, as well as in all questions relating to the competency of witnesses, course of procedure, etc., the lex fori must govern; 11 Ind. 385; 9 Gill 1; 17 Pa. 91; 18 Ala. n. s. 248; 4 McLean 540; 5 How. 83; 6 Humphr. 75; 17 Conn. 500; 9 Mo. 56, 157; 4 Gilm. 521; 26 Barb. 177; Story, Conf. Laws §§ 597, 634. See LEX FORI.

The lex loci governs as to the obligation and construction of contracts: 11 Pick. 32; 8 Vt. 325; 12 N. H. 520; 12 Wheat. 213; 2 Keen 293; 1 B. & P. 139; 12 Wend. 439; 13 Mart. La. 202; 14 B. Monr. 556; 15 Miss. 798; unless, from their tenor, it must be presumed they were entered into with a view to the laws of some other state; 13 Mass. 1; 11 Colo. 118. This presumption arises where the place of performance is different from the place of making; 31 E. L. & Eq. 433; 17 Johns. 511; 13 Pet. 65; 9 La. Ann. 185; 13 Mass. 23; 91 U. S. 406; 2 Woods 244.

It has been held that a lien or privilege affecting personal estate, created by the lex loci, will generally be enforced wherever the property may be found; 8 Mart. 95; 5 La. 295; Story, Conf. Laws § 402; but not necessarily in preference to claims arising under the lex fori, when the property is within the jurisdiction of the court of the forum; 5 Cra. 299, 298; 12 Wheat. 861; Whart. Conf. L. § 324. It is said that the former rule that the assignment of a movable is invalid unless it be made in accordance with the lex domicilii, is now rejected by the English courts, which now hold that a transfer of goods in accordance with the lex situs gives a good title in England; Dicey, Conf. Laws 532. But it is held in this country that a transfer of movables made in the place of the owner's domicile and in accordance with its laws will be enforced by the courts of the place where the movables are situated, although the method of transfer be different from that prescribed by the latter country; but not when the statutes of the place where they are situate or the policy of its laws prescribe a different rule; Moore's note to Dicey, Conf. Laws 538; 7 Wall. 139; 147 U. S. 476. See supra.

A discharge from the performance of a contract under the lex loci is a discharge everywhere; 5 Mass. 509; 7 Cush. 151; 4 Wheat. 122, 209; 12 id. 213; 2 Mas. 161; 2 Blackf. 394; 24 Wend. 43; 2 Kent 394. A distinction is to be taken between discharging a contract and taking away the remedy for a breach; 8 Mas. 88; 4 Conn. 47; 12 Wheat. 347; 8 Pick. 194; 9 Conn. 314; 2 Blackf. 394; 9 N. H. 478.

As to the effect of a discharge from an obligation by a state insolvent law upon a debt due a citizen of another state, see LEX FORI.

Statutes of limitations ordinarily apply to the remedy, but do not discharge the debt; 9 How. 407; 20 Pick. 810; 2 Paine 437; 2 Mas. 751; 6 N. H. 557; 6 Vt. 127; 8 Port. (Ala.) 84. See LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF; LEX FORI.

A question of some difficulty often arises as to what the locus contractus is, in the case of contracts made partly in one country or state and partly in another, or made in one state or country to be performed in another, or where the contract in question is accessory to a principal contract.

Where a contract is made partly in one country and partly in another, it is a contract of the place where the assent of the parties first concurs and becomes complete; 2 Parsons, Contr. 94; 27 N. H. 217, 244; 11 Ired. 303; 8 Strobb. 27; 1 Gray 336.

As between the place of making and the place of performance, where a place of performance is specified, the law of the place of performance governs as to the obligation, interpretation, etc.; 5 East 124; 1 Gall. 371; 12 Vt. 648; 12 Pet. 456; 1 How. 182; 8 Paige, Ch. 261; 5 McLean 448; 27 Vt. 8; 14 Ark. 189; 7 B. Monr. 575; 9 Mo. 56, 157; 4 Gilm. 521; 21 Ga. 135; 30 Miss. 59; 7 Ohio 134; 4 Mich. 450; 62 N. Y. 151; 24 Ia. 412; 150 Pa. 460. Contracts made in one place to be performed in another are, as a general rule, to be governed by the law of the place of performance; 142 U. S. 101; 38 W. Va. 390. Where there is nothing to show that the parties had in view, in respect to the execution of a contract, any other law than that of the place of performance, that law must determine the rights of the parties; 142 U. S. 115. See 81 Ga. 522.

Where the contract is to be performed generally, the law of the place of making governs; 2 B. & Ald. 301; 5 Cl. & F. 12; 1 Metc. Mass. 82; 6 Cra. 221; 6 Ired. 107; 17 Miss. 220.

If the contract is to be performed partly in one state and partly in another, it will be affected by the law of both states; 91 U. S. 406; 14 B. Monr. 556; 22 Barb. 118. But see 2 Woods 244; 24 Ia. 412. A contract of affreightment made in one country between citizens or residents thereof, and the performance of which begins there, must be governed by the law of that country, unless the parties, when entering into the contract, clearly manifested a mutual intention that it should be governed by the laws of some other country; 129 U. S. 397.

In cases of indorsement of negotiable paper, every indorsement is a new contract, and the place of each indorsement is in its locus contractus; 2 Kent 460; 17 Johns. 511; 9 B. & C. 208; 13 Mass. 1; 25 Ala. n. s. 139; 19 N. Y. 436; 17 Tex. 102.

The place of payment is the locus contractus, however, as between indorsee and drawer. See 19 N. Y. 436; 53 Fed. Rep. 474; 9 C. C. App. 261.

The place of acceptance of a draft is regarded as the locus contractus; 3 Gill 430; 1 Q. B. 43; 4 Pet. 111; 8 Metc. 107; 4 Dev. 124; 6 McLean 622; 9 Cush. 46; 13 N. Y. 290; 18 Conn. 138; 17 Miss. 220; 142 U. S. 116.

A bill of exchange drawn in Indiana, accepted in Michigan, to be discounted in Indiana and paid in Michigan, is an Indiana contract; 52 Fed. Rep. 291.

A note made in one state and payable in another, is not subject to the usury laws of the latter state, if it was valid in that respect in the state where it was made; 60 id. 730. A note executed in one state and payable in another is governed, as to defenses against an indorsee, by the law of the latter state, though sued on in the state where made; id. 730. See PROMISSORY NOTES; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; as to what is presumed to be lex loci, see FOREIGN LAWS; LEX FORI.

Dicey, in his recent and very able work on the Conflict of Laws, defines lex loci contractus merely as the law of the place where the contract is entered into, and uses it only in that sense. To designate the law by which the contract is governed, he uses the phrase, "the proper law of the contract," which may be, and usually is, the lex loci contractus, or may be, by the express will of the parties, or by inference, the law of some other place. He maintains that the capacity to contract is governed by the law of the domicile (except, probably, in the case of ordinary mercantile contracts which are governed by the law of the place where the contract is made; and except, of course, contracts relating to land). The formal validity of the contract is governed by the law of the place where it is made, except contracts relating to land and contracts made in one country in accordance with the local form in respect of a movable situated in another country, which, he thinks, may possibly be invalid if they do not comply with the special formalities (if any) required by the law of the country where the movable is situated at the time of the making of the contract, and except, possibly, a contract made in one country, but intended to operate wholly in, and to be subject to the law of, another country, even though not made according to the local form, if made in accordance with the form required, or allowed by the law of the country where the contract is to operate. This last exception is not, however, in his opinion, supported by adequate authority.

The essential validity of a contract is governed by what he terms the "proper law of the contract," which he defines as the law, or laws, by which the parties to a contract intended, or may fairly be presumed to have intended, the contract to be governed. This may be the law of the place where the contract was made, or it may be the place of performance. But there are, he says, wide exceptions to this rule. The contract must not be opposed to English interests, or the policy of English law, or to the moral rules upheld by English law. The contract must not be unlawful by the law of the country where it is made; and its performance must not be unlawful by the law of the country where it is to be performed; and it must not form part of a transaction which is unlawful by the law of the country where the transaction is to take place, though this probably does not apply to contracts in violation of the revenue laws of a foreign country.

The interpretation of a contract, and the rights and obligations under it of the parties thereto, are to be determined by the "proper law of the contract." This law may be designated by the express words of the contract, indicating the intention of the parties, which, in general, governs; or their intention may be inferred from the terms and nature of the contract, and from the general circumstances of the case. In the absence of counteracting considerations, the proper law of the contract is, prima facie, presumed to be the law of the country where the contract is made; especially when the contract is to be performed in the country where it is made, or may be performed anywhere, but it may apply to a contract partly, or even wholly, to be performed in another country. Where the contract is to be performed wholly or partly in another country, the proper law of the contract, especially as to the mode of performance, may be presumed to be the law of the country where the performance is to take place. These presumptions are said to be grounded on the probable intention of the parties.

The validity of the discharge of a contract (otherwise than by bankruptcy) depends upon the proper law of the contract, that is, the law to which the parties, when contracting, intended to submit themselves. But this writer says there is a lack of decided authority on this point.

The same writer, after saying that the reports and text books of authority reiterate the rule that a contract is governed by the law of the place where it is made, points out that when English courts first began to deal with the conflict of laws, they referred everything, except matters of procedure, to the lex loci contractus, by which they meant the law of the place where the contract was actually entered into. When they subsequently found it necessary to give effect to other laws than those of the place where the contract was made, and especially to the laws of the place of performance, the change of doctrine was combined with a verbal adherence to an old formula not really consistent with the new theory. They retained the expression lex loci contractus, but reinterpreted it to mean the law of the country with a view to the law whereof the contract was made. This might be the law of the country where the contract was made, or it might be the law of some other country, and was frequently the law of the country where the contract was to be performed. The same result was sometimes attained by another method of reasoning. It was laid down that a person must be assumed to have contracted at the place where his contract was to be performed. By either method of interpretation an actual reference to the law contemplated by the parties was masked under a nominal reference to the law of the place of the contract. This adherence to the term lex loci contractus has produced two effects. It has until recent years concealed from English lawyers the principle that the interpretation, as contrasted with the formal validity, of a contract is governed by the law (of whatever country) contemplated by the parties, and that this law is constantly the law of the place of performance, and it has led English judges to give a preference to the lex loci contractus, upon which the English courts fall back in doubtful cases. But English judges, as well as foreign courts and writers, both adopt the principle that the interpretation of a contract and the obligation arising under it are, in so far as they depend on the will of the parties, to be determined in accordance with the law contemplated by the parties; Dicey, Conf. Laws 794.

The phrase lex loci contractus is used in a double sense, to mean, sometimes the law of a place where a contract is entered into; sometimes that of the place of its performance. And when it is employed to designate the law of the seat of the obligation, it is, on that account, confusing. The law we are in search of, which is to decide upon the nature, interpretation, and validity of the engagement in question, is that which the parties have either expressly or presumptively incorporated into their contract, as constituting their obligation; 106 U. S. 134. "In every forum a contract is governed by the law with a view to which it was made;" 10 Wheat. 1.

It is said by an able writer that the cases often fail to distinguish between formal validity and essential validity, or between the making and the performance of the contract; and not infrequently it is held, in respect of matters of essential validity, that the validity of a contract is to be determined by the law of the place where the contract is made; J. B. Moore's note to Dicey, Conf. Laws 580, citing as instances 154 Mass. 213; 55 Minn. 509.

The form of the contract is regulated by the law of the place of its celebration; 106 U. S. 134. The presumption is that a contract is to be performed at the place where it is made and to be governed by its laws, if there is nothing in its terms, or in the explanatory circumstances of its execution, inconsistent with that intention; id. 137. See, also, 39 S. C. 484.

In a contract the foreign law may, by the act and will of the parties, become part of their agreement; 106 U. S. 129. It is the will of the contracting parties and not the law which fixes the place of performance—whether by express words or by tacit implication—as the place to the jurisdiction of which the contracting parties elected to submit themselves; 4 Phil. Int. L. 469; approved in 106 U. S. 137. But it has been held that a stipulation in a bill of lading which would substitute the English law for our own as to the question of limited liability is invalid; 57 Fed. Rep. 403; and that stipulations which are held void, because against the public policy of the United States, are not made valid by the stipulation of the parties; 56 id. 602, 124; 168 U. S. 119, and cases cited; and that a clause in a shipping contract providing that all questions arising under the contract shall be settled according to English law, is a nullity, as an attempt to impress upon the contract a construction which our law rejects as contrary to public policy; 50 id. 561. See FLAG, LAW OF.

A policy of life insurance which was delivered, and the first premium thereon paid in the state in which the assured resided, is governed by the laws of that state; 58 id. 541; though the policy contained a clause that it was to be a contract under the laws of the domicile of the insurer, such clause being invalid when it sought to avoid the force of statutes of the state in which the insurance was taken; 54 id. 580; and though signed by the insurer at the company's office in its home state; 60 id. 511; and a policy issued by a New York company upon an application signed in Missouri, where the first premium was paid, is subject to the Missouri statutes which cannot be waived by any stipulation of the contract; 140 U. S. 226. A domiciled Englishman effected three policies of insurance on his life in a New York company in favor of his wife and children. It was held that the intention of the parties must determine the law applicable, and that it was clearly intended here that the interests of the beneficiaries should be decided by the law of the domicile of the party insuring; 78 L. T. R. 60.

The validity of a contract cannot be secured by apparently subjecting it to a law by which it is not properly governed; 69 Miss. 770; 96 Mich. 243.

A contract executed in England, whereby an English corporation agrees to transport a citizen of the United States to this country, is to be construed according to English law; 60 Fed. Rep. 624.

A federal court assuming jurisdiction of a controversy between the master and the seaman of a foreign vessel, under a foreign flag, growing out of a contract made in their own country, will administer relief, by comity, in accordance with the law of the flag of the vessel; 35 id. 663. The question concerning the ultimate responsibility of the owner for the master's acts and engagements, arising out of sea damages, as one of the incidents of the voyage in the prosecution of foreign commerce, is to be determined by the law of the ship's home; id. 767. See FLAG, LAW OF.

It is said by a learned writer that the failure to comply with local requirements as to form, not affecting the obligation of the agreement, will not invalidate the contract; Whart. Conf. L. § 685.

A contract valid by the laws of the place where it was made, although not in writing, will not be enforced in the courts of a country where the Statute of Frauds prevails. But where the law of the forum and that of the place of the execution of the contract coincide, it will be enforced, although required to be in writing by the law of the place of performance, because the form of the contract is regulated by the law of the place of its celebration, and the evidence of it by that of the forum; 106 U. S. 185.

The general rule is that a defence or discharge, good by the law of the place where the contract is made or is to be performed, is to be held of equal validity in every place where the question may come to be litigated; 106 U. S. 132, citing Story, Conf. L. § 331.

TORTS. Damages for the commission of a tortious act are to be measured by the law of the place where the act is done; 1 P. Wms. 895; 1 Pet. C. C. 225; Story, Conf. Laws, § 307.

An action for a tort committed in a foreign country will lie only when it is based upon an act which will be considered as tortious both in the place where committed and in the locus fori; in such case the law of the place where the tort was committed governs; L. R. 1 P. D. 107; id. 6 Q. B. 1; id. 2 P. C. 198. See 1 H. & C. 219; Whart. Conf. L. § 478; 54 Barb. 31. See LEX FORI.

MARRIAGE. As to the conflict of laws in relation to marriage, see MARRIAGE.

As to divorce, see DIVORCE; DOMICIL. The law of all acts relating to real property is governed by the lex rei sitæ. Taking a mortgage as security does not, however, divest the lex loci of its force. See LEX REI SITÆ.

Touching the subjects considered in this title, see an elaborate collection of cases on conflict of laws, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 708-975.

LEX LOCI ACTUS. See LEX LOCI.

LEX LOCI CELEBRATIONIS. See LEX LOCI.

LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS. See LEX LOCI.

LEX LOCI DELICTI COMMISSI. See LEX LOCI.

LEX LOCI SOLUTIONIS. See LEX LOCI.

LEX LONGOBARDORUM (Lat.). The name of an ancient code in force among the Lombards. It contains many evident traces of feudal policy. It survived the destruction of the ancient government of Lombardy by Charlemagne, and is said to be still partially in force in some districts of Italy.

LEX MANIFESTA (L. Lat.). Manifest or open law; the trial by duel or ordeal.

LEX MERCATORIA (Lat.). That system of laws which is adopted by all commercial nations, and which, therefore, constitutes a part of the law of the land. See LAW MERCHANT.

LEX NATURALE. Natural law. See JUS NATURALE.

LEX NON SCRIPTA. The unwritten or common law, which included general and particular customs, and particular local laws. 1 Steph. Com. 40-68. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTA.

LEX PAPIA POPPE. The law which exempted from tutelage women who had three children. It is usually considered with the Lex Julia de maritandis ordinibus as one law. See LEGES JULIÆ.

LEX PATRIÆ. The law of one's country. English.

LEX PETRONIA. The law forbidding masters to expose their slaves to contests with wild beasts. Inst. 1. 8.

This also enacted that this species of cruelty should be adopted only as a public punishment for the misconduct of the slave. Hunter, Rom. L. 158; D. 48, 8, 11, 2.

LEX PLATORIA. The law for the protection of young persons who had attained the age of puberty. Inst. 1. 23.

This law seems to have fixed majority at twenty-five. The law permitted minors to apply to the Praetor, who, on proof of their incapacity to manage their affairs, would give them a curator. This enactment also provided for the appointment of tutores to spendthrifts and the insane. Hunter, Rom. L., 608, 734.

LEX PLAUTIA. The law which conferred the full rights of citizenship on Italy below the Po. Sand. Just. Introd. § 11.

LEX POETELIA. The law abolishing the right of a creditor to sell or kill his debtor. Sohm, Rom. L. 210.

From this date (B. C. 325 or 313) one may reckon the rule of law that liberty is inalienable. Whether this law, which put an end to the voluntary alienation of personal freedom, also extinguished its involuntary alienation through the execution of judgment debts, is uncertain. The imprisonment of the debtor in a public prison took the place of his reduction to slavery. Hunter, Rom. L. 33, 1035; C. 7, 71, 1.

LEX POMPEIA DE PARRICIDIIS.

A Roman statute on the murder of blood relations (B. C. 55). This law provided that if a man murdered an ascendant or a son, or in any way attempted anything included under the designation parricidium, whether he dared it secretly or openly, should be punished with the penalty of parricidium; further, that if any one wilfully brought about such a crime, or was an accomplice, then, even though he were an outsider, the result should be the same. Hunter, Rom. L., 1062; J. 4, 18, 6.

The offender was by this law to be sewn up in a sack with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and thrown into the sea or a river, so that even in his lifetime he might begin to be deprived of the use of the elements; that the air might be denied him whilst he lived and the earth when he died. Inst. 4. 18, 6.

LEX PUBLILIA. The law providing that the plebiscita should bind the whole people. Inst. 1. 2. The lex Publilia de sponsu allowed spouses, unless reimbursed within six months, to recover from their principal what they had paid by a special actio. See LEGES PUBLILIAE.

LEX REGIA. The law of the emperor. That which he ordains by rescript, or decides in adjudging a cause, or lays down by edict, is law. Inst. 1. 2. 6.

LEX REI SITÆ (Lat.). The law of the country where a thing is situate. Dicey, Conf. Laws 66.

It is the universal rule of the common law that any title or interest in land, or in other real estate, can only be acquired or lost agreeably to the law of the place where the same is situated; 6 Pick. 286; 1 Paige, Ch. 220; 2 Ohio 124; 5 B. & C. 488; 6 Madd. Ch. 16; 10 Wheat. 192, 465; 1 Gill 280; 6 Binn. 559; Story, Conf. Laws §§ 365, 428; 152 U. S. 65; 184 id. 316; 127 id. 719; and the law is the same in this respect in regard to all methods whatever of transfer, and every restraint upon alienation; 12 E. L. & Eq. 206. The lex rei sitæ governs as to the capacity of the parties to any alienation, whether testamentary or inter vivos, or to make a contract with regard to a movable, or to acquire or succeed to a movable as affected by questions of minority or majority; 17 Mart. 569; of rights arising from the relation of husband and wife; Story, Conf. Laws § 454; 9 Bligh 127; 8 Paige, Ch. 261; 2 Md. 297; 1 Miss. 281; 4 Ia. 381; 3 Strobb. 562; 9 Rich. Eq. 475; 107 Mo. 422; L. R. 8 Ch. 342; see 87 Tenn. 145; parent and child, or guardian and ward; 2 Ves. & B. 127; 1 Johns. Ch. 153; 4 Gill & J. 382; 9 Rich. Eq. 311; 14 B. Monr. 544; 11 Ala. N. S. 343; 18 Miss. 529; but see 7 Paige, Ch. 286; and of the rights and powers of executors and administrators, whether the property be real or personal; 2 Hamm. 124; 8 Cl. & F. 112; 4 M. & W. 71, 192; 3 Cra. 319; 5 Pet. 518; 12 Wheat. 169; 2 N. H. 291; 4 Rand. 158; 2 Gill & J. 498; 5 Me. 261; 5 Pick. 85; 20 Johns. 229; 3 Day 74; 7 Ind. 211; 10 Rich. 393 (see EXECUTORS); of heirs; 5 B. & C. 451; 9 Cra. 151; 9 Wheat. 566; and of devise or deviser; Story, Conf. Laws § 474; 14 Ves. 337; 9 Cra. 151; 10 Wheat. 192; 37 N. H. 114.

So as to the forms and solemnities of alienation, and the restrictions, if any, imposed upon such alienation, the lex rei sitæ must be complied with, whether it be a transfer by devise; 2 P. Wms. 291; 10 Wheat. 192; 4 Johns. Ch. 280; 2 Ohio 124; 37 N. H. 114; 5 R. 1. 112; 2 Jones N. C. 968; 97 Mo. 223; 50 Fed. Rep. 310; 109 U. S. 608; 20 Fla. 849 (but in Maine, under statutes, an attestation made in conformity with the law of the place where the will was executed, was held valid; 85 Me. 374); or by conveyance inter vivos; 2 Dowl. & C. 349; 1 Pick. 81; 1 Paige, Ch. 220; 11 Wheat. 465; 11 Tex. 755; 18 Pa. 170; 12 E. L. & Eq. 206. So as to the amount of property or extent of interest which can be acquired, held, or transferred; 8 Russ. Ch. 328; 2 Dow. & C. 393; and the question of what is real property; 1 W. Bla. 234; 6 Paige, Ch. 690; 8 Deac. & C. 704. The law of a country where a thing is situate determines whether the thing itself, or any right, obligation, or document connected with the thing is to be considered an immovable (land), or a movable; Dicey, Conf. Laws 513.

And, generally, the lex rei sitæ governs as to the validity of any such transfer; 4 Sandf. 352; 23 Miss. 42; 11 Mo. 314; 2 Bradf. Surr. 380; 133 Ill. 559. As to the disposition of the proceeds, see 12 E. L. & Eq. 206.

The validity, construction, and effect of wills of movables depend upon the lex rei sitæ; 1 N. Dak. 216; 60 Fed. Rep. 310; 112 N. C. 798; but the law of the state where the will was made may be considered by the court of the situs in determining the meaning of certain words in it; 73 Ga. 506. The validity of a charitable devise; 107 U. S. 174; and a direction for accumulation; 95 N. Y. 508; depend upon the lex rei sitæ, and so does the execution of a power of appointment of lands under a will; 133 Mass. 181; and the devolution of land, whether in case of intestacy or under a will; Dicey, Conf. Laws 519.

The acquisition of a title to land by lapse of time (prescription) must be determined by the same law, except so far as the limitation to an action to recover land depends on the lex fori; id. 523; and see Whart. Conf. Laws § 378.

As to whether mere contracts with regard to immovables or land are determined by the lex rei sitæ, as to their material validity, or by the "proper law of the contract," is doubtful; Dicey, Conf. Laws 789; but the capacity of the parties thereto and the formalities necessary to the validity of such a contract are, almost certainly, governed by the law of the situs; id. As to the "proper law of the contract," see LEX LOCI.

A contract for the conveyance of land, valid by the lex fori, will be enforced in equity by a decree in personam for a conveyance valid under the lex rei sitæ; 1 Ves. 144; 2 Paige, Ch. 606; Wythe 135; 6 Cra. 148.

An executory foreign contract for the conveyance of lands not repugnant to the lex rei sitæ will be enforced in the courts of the latter country by personal process; 8 Paige, Ch. 201; 25 E. L. & Eq. 288; 4 Bosw. 266.

As to the transfer of movables, while, if made at the place of the owner's domicile and in accordance with its laws, they are valid in the courts of the place where the property is situated, yet it is otherwise when the statutes, or the general policy of the law, of the latter place prescribes a different rule; 7 Wall. 139; 147 U. S. 476; 135 Mass. 112; 140 N. Y. 230. Where a special form of transfer of a movable is prescribed by the law of the situs a transfer not made in accordance therewith is invalid; 96 N. Y. 248; see Dicey, Conf. L. 551.

Courts of the situs may refuse to enforce foreign assignments for creditors as against domestic creditors; 123 Ill. 551; 96 N. Y. 248; but see supra, for contrary decisions.

All simple contract debts are assets at the domicile of the testator; 109 U. S. 654; but a bond is said to be assets for the purpose of administration at the place where it is found; 73 N. Y. 292. A ship at sea is presumed to be situated in the state where it is registered; 16 Wall. 610. As to the English rules relating to the situs of movables, see Dicey, Conf. Laws 518.

LEX DE RESPONDIS PRUDENTUM. The law of citations (q. v.).

LEX RHODIA DE JACTU. The Rhodian Law on jettison. The Roman Law adopted, so far as not inconsistent with itself, the maritime law of Rhodes. The maritime law of Rhodes applied wherever it was not opposed to special legislation. (D. 14, 2, 9.) Hunter, Rom. L. 514. The law provided that if, in order to save a ship, a portion of its cargo was thrown overboard, the owners of the vessel and cargo had to share with the owners of the goods thrown overboard the loss they sustained. (D. 14, 2, 1.) Id. Further, contribution was required from those whose property had been saved by the jettison, upon the equitable ground that the loss was incurred to save their goods. (D. 14, 2, 5.) No contribution could have been required on account of free persons saved, because their lives constituted a value that could not be expressed in money. But they had to contribute on account of their garments and jewelry saved from shipwreck; not, however, for food and the like consumable articles. Also, the owner of the vessel must contribute because his vessel was saved. (D. 14, 2, 2, 2.) Id., 515.

LEX ROMANA. See CIVIL LAW; ROMAN LAW. LEX ROMANA VISIGOTHORUM.

LEX ROMANA VISIGOTHORUM or BREVIARIUM ALARICI. The Roman law promulgated among the Visigoths in Gaul was drawn up, by order of Alaric II., and under the superintendence of Gojaric, count of the palace, probably by a commission largely if not wholly composed of Roman jurists; and it was decreed at Aire in Gascony, A. D. 506, with the assent of the ecclesiastics, nobles, and provincial electors representing the people. The extant copy is one addressed to a certain count, Timotheus, and officially subscribed by Anianus, the secretary, by order of the king. No law or juristic opinion outside this compilation was permitted to be quoted in a court of law. The work contains—(1) constitutions (leges) extracted from the Theodosian code, and a series of Novellae from Theodosius to Libius Severus; and (2) extracts, on the principle of the Law of Citations, from a few eminent jurists—namely, the Institutes of Gaius abridged (with omission of the fourth book and several other portions as obsolete), Paul's Sententiae (five books), the Gregorian code (thirteen articles), the Hermogenian code (two articles), and Papinian's Responsa (two lines from the first book). With the exception of Gaius, the texts are accompanied by a very useful running commentary in the Latin of the day. The compilation has been named Breviarium Alaricianum (or Alarici), or Aniani; also, in the middle ages, Lex Theodosiana, Corpus Theodosianum, Liber Legum, Lex Romana. It has preserved fragments of Roman law not otherwise known to us. It was more widely obeyed and more enduring than any of the similar bodies of law. Hunter, Rom. Law, 89.

LEX SALICA. The law of the Salian Franks. 12 Harv. L. R. 445 See SALIC LAW.

LEX SCRIBONIA. The law abolishing the usucapio servitutis. Sohm, Rom. L. 285.

But servitudes were capable of being acquired or lost by long quasi-possession. (D. 8, 5, 10, 1.) This law further abolished usucapion of incorporeal things, unless simply as appurtenances of land so acquired. (D. 41, 3, 10, 1.) Hunter, Rom. L. 64, 289, 419.

LEX SCRIPTA. Written or statute law. See JUS EX NON SCRIPTA.

So called because originally reduced into writing before it is enacted or receives any binding power. Burrill; Hale's Hist. Com. Law 2, 21. See STATUTE LAW.

LEX SEMPRONIA. The law forbidding senators from being judges and allowing the office to the knights. Sand. Just. Introd. § 12.

LEX SILIA. A law concerning personal actions. Sohm, Rom. L. 155.

LEX SITUS. See LEX REI SITÆ.

LEX TALIONIS (Lat.). The law of retaliation: an example of which is given in the law of Moses, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, etc.

Amicable retaliation includes those acts of retaliation which correspond to the acts of the other nation under similar circumstances.

Jurists and writers on international law are divided as to the right of one nation punishing with death, by way of retaliation, the citizens or subjects of another nation. In the United States no example of such barbarity has ever been witnessed; but prisoners have been kept in close confinement in retaliation for the same conduct towards American prisoners. See Rutherford, Inst. b. 2, c. 9; Martens, Law of Nat. b. 8, c. 1, s. 8, note; 1 Kent 98; Wheaton, Int. Law, pt. 4, c. 1, § 1.

Victimative retaliation includes those acts which amounts to war. See RETORIION.

LEX TERRÆ (Lat.). The law of the land. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

LEX THEODOSIANA. See LEX TOMANA VISIGOTHORUM.

LEX VALERIA. See LEX HORATIA ET VALERIA.

LEX VOCONIA. A plebiscitum forbidding a legate to receive more than each heir had. Inst. 2, 23.

Although this statute provided that the heirs would get something, a little defect sprang up; for by dividing his patrimony among many legatees, the testator could leave so little to the heir that it was not to the heir's advantage to undertake, for the sake of this gain, the burden of the whole inheritance. (G. 2, 226.) Hunter, Rom. L., 750.

LEY (Old French; a corruption of loi). Law. For example, Termes de la Ley, Terms of the Law. In another, and an old technical sense, ley signifies an oath, or the oath with purgators; as, it tend as ley au playntiffe. Britton, c. 27.

LEY GAGER. Wager of law. An offer to make an oath denying the cause of action of the plaintiff, confirmed by purgators (q. v.), which oath used to be allowed in certain cases. When it was accomplished, it was called the "doing of the law." "Jeuans de ley." Termes de la Ley; 3 B. & C. 538; 3 B. & P. 297; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 16.

LEYES DE ESTILLO. In Spanish Law. Laws of the age. A book of explanations of the Fuero Real, to the number of two hundred and fifty-two, formed under the authority of Alonzo X. and his son Sancho, and of Fernando el Emplazado, and published at the end of the thirteenth century or beginning of the fourteenth; some of them are inserted in the New Recopilacion. See 1 New Recop. 354.

LIABILITY. Responsibility; the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action; 86 La. 236; 57 Cal. 209; 36 N. J. L. 145. This liability may arise from contracts either express or implied, or in consequence of torts committed.

The state of being bound or obliged in law or justice. 36 N. J. L. 145; 36 La. 226.

Liability of Ours. The clause "liabilities of ours" includes all liabilities. 43 S. W. 684. See JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

LIBEL (Lat. liber). In Practice. The plaintiff's written statement of his cause of action and of the relief which he seeks, made and exhibited in a judicial process, with some solemnity of law.

A written statement by a plaintiff of his cause of action, and of the relief he seeks to obtain in a suit. Law, Eccl. Law 17; Ayliffe, Par. 346; Shelf. Marr. & D. 506; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 111. It performs substantially the same office in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts as the bill in chancery does in equity proceedings and the declaration in common-law practice: Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 572-587. In the United States the practice of the ecclesiastical courts has been continued in the use of the terms libel and libellant in divorce proceedings.

The libel should be a narrative, specific, clear, direct, certain, not general nor alternative; Law, Eccl. Law 147; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 113. It should contain, substantially, the following requisites: (1) the name, description, and addition of the party, who makes his demand by bringing his action; (2) the name, description, and addition of the party against whom it is brought; (3) the name of the judge, with a respectful designation of his office and court; (4) the thing or relief, general or special, which is demanded in the suit; (5) the grounds upon which the suit is founded.

The form of a libel is either simple or articulate. The simple form is when the cause of action is stated in a continuous narration, when the cause of action can be briefly set forth. The articulate form is when the cause of action is stated in distinct allegations or articles; 3 Law, Eccl. Law 148; Hall, Adm. Pr. 123; 7 Cra. 394. The material facts should be stated in distinct articles in the libel, with as much exactness and attention to times and circumstances as in a declaration at common law; 4 Mas. 541.

Although there is no fixed formula for libels, and the courts will receive such an instrument from the party in such form as his own skill or that of his counsel may enable him to give it, yet long usage has sanctioned forms, which it may be most prudent to adopt. The parts and arrangement of libels commonly employed are:

First, the address to the court.

Second, the names and descriptions of the parties. Persons competent to sue at common law may be parties libellants. The same regulations obtain in the admiralty courts and the common-law courts respecting those disqualified from suing in their own right or name. Married women prosecute by or with their husbands, or by prochein ami, when the husband has an adverse interest to hers; minors, by guardians, tutors, or prochein ami; lunatics and persons non compos mentis, by tutor, guardian ad litem, or committee; the rights of deceased persons are prosecuted by executors or administrators; and corporations are represented and proceeded against as at common law.

Third, the averments or allegations setting forth the cause of action. These should be conformable to the truth, and so framed as to correspond with the evidence. Every fact requisite to establish the libellant's right should be clearly stated, so that it may be directly met by the opposing party by admission, denial, or avoidance: this is the more necessary, because no proof can be given, or decree rendered, not covered by and conformable to the allegations; 1 Law, Eccl. Law 150; Hall, Pr. 126; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 113; 7 Cra. 394. But the requirements upon these points are not so strict as in cases of declarations at common law; 7 Cra. 389; 9 Wheat. 386, 401. In no case is it necessary to assert anything which amounts to matters of defence to the claimant; 2 Gall. 485.

Fourth, the conclusion, or prayer for relief and process: the prayer should be for the specific relief desired; for general relief, as is usual in bills in chancery; the conclusion should also pray for general or particular process; 3 Law, Eccl. Law 149; 3 Mas. 508.

Interrogatories are sometimes annexed to the libel; when this is the case, there is usually a special prayer, that the defendant may be required to answer the libel, and the interrogatories annexed and propounded. This, however, is a dangerous practice, because it renders the answers of the defendant evidence, which must be disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness corroborated by very strong circumstances.

The libel is the first proceeding in a suit in admiralty in the courts of the United States; 3 Mas. 504.

"The requirement that a libel in rem must state that the property is in the district does not prevent the court from acquiring jurisdiction in the case of a vessel which, being within the district at the time the libel is verified, departs before it is filed, but, returning after the filing, is then seized on alias monition." 78 Fed. Rep. 155. (61 Fed. Rep. 218, reaffirmed.)

No meane process can issue in the United States admiralty courts until a libel is filed; 1st Rule in admiralty of the U. S. supreme court. The twenty-second and twenty-third rules require certain statements to be contained in the libel; and to those, and the forms in 2 Conkling, Adm. Pract., the reader is referred. And see Parsons, Marit. Law; Dunl. Adm. Pr.; Hall, Adm. Pr.; Ben. Adm.

In Torts. That which is written or printed, and published, calculated to injure the reputation of another by bringing him into ridicule, hatred, or contempt. 15 M. & W. 344.

Everything, written or printed, which reflects on the character of another and is published without lawful justification or excuse, is a libel, whatever the intention may have been. 15 id. 493.

A malicious defamation, expressed either in printing or writing, and tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead or the reputation of one who is alive, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Bac. Abr. tit. Libel; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 78, § 1; 4 Mass. 163; 2 Pick. 115; 9 Johns. 214; 1 Den. 347; 9 B. & C.

172; 4 M. & R. 127; 85 Ala. 519; 18 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1134; 78 Ga. 280; 91 id. 494; 84 Wis. 129; 68 Hun 467; 2 Kent 18; Pol. Torts § 286.

A censorious or ridiculous writing, picture, or sign, made with a malicious or mischievous intent towards government, magistrates, or individuals. 8 Johns. Cas. 334; 9 Johns. 215; 5 Binn. 340; 68 Me. 295.

A written statement published without lawful justification or excuse, calculated to convey to those to whom it is published an imputation on the plaintiff, injurious to his trade, or holding him up to hatred, contempt, or ridicule. 7 App. Cas. 741.

There is a great and well-settled distinction between verbal slander and written, printed, or pictured libel; and this not only in reference to the consequences, as subjecting the party to an indictment, but also as to the character of the accusations or imputations essential to sustain a civil action to recover damages. To write and publish maliciously anything of another, which either makes him ridiculous or holds him out as an unworthy man, is held to be actionable, or punishable criminally, when the speaking of the same words would not be so; 1 Saund., 6th ed. 247 a; 4 Taunt. 355; 5 Binn. 219; Heard, Lib. & S. § 74; 6 Cush. 71; 19 Johns. 349; 6 Vt. 489.

The reasons for this distinction between libel and slander are thus stated: (1) a libel is permanent and may circulate through many hands; (2) it shows greater malignity on the part of its author than a slander; (3) it is more likely to lead to a breach of the peace; Brett, Eng. Com. 453.

The presumption that words are defamatory arises much more readily in cases of libel than in cases of slander; 152 Pa. 187.

The reduction of the slanderous matter to writing or printing is the most usual mode of conveying it. The writing may be on any substance and made with any instrument. The exhibition of a libellous picture is equally criminal; 2 Campb. 512; 5 Co. 125 b; 2 S. & R. 91; Odg. L. & Sl. 6, 20, 22. Fixing a gallows at a man's door, burning him in effigy, or exhibiting him in any ignominious manner, is a libel; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 73, s. 2; 11 East 226; 14 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 495. So a libel may be published by speaking or singing it in the presence of others; 7 Ad. & E. 233; or by a caricature, a chalk mark on a wall, or a statue; Brett, Eng. Com. 452.

The publication of a libel subjects the person who is legally responsible for it to both civil and criminal liability. The party may bring an action to recover damages and the offender is indictable at common law.

Publication. It must be shown by evidence that there was a writing and that it was published; 7 App. Cas. 741. To constitute a publication the writer must communicate the matter complained of to at least one third person; [1891] 1 Q. B. 527; and a communication to a wife containing reflections on her husband is a publication; 13 C. B. 836; but not where the communication is from her husband; 20 Q. B. Div. 635. The plaintiff must prove the publication; 4 B. & Ald. 143. To read a libellous letter to another is a publication; 16 Misc. Rep. 453; or to dictate it to a stenographer who gives it to another clerk to be copied; [1891] 1 Q. B. 524; but the sending of a writing in an unsealed envelope is not a publication where it is not shown to have been read by others; 95 Tenn. 678. The communication of libellous matter to another, requesting or intending that the latter should publish it, renders one liable as the publisher of a libel; 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 16; see 36 L. J. Ex. 105; and a client who communicates defamatory facts to his attorney is responsible; 16 So. Rep. (La.) 856.

Where the defendant kept a pamphlet shop and the libel was sold by the defendant's servant in her absence and without her knowledge of its contents, it was held that the defendant was guilty of publishing a libel; 1 Barnardiston, K. B. 306; 2 Sessions Cases 33; see also 5 Burrows 2686, where Mansfield, C. J., said in a like case that proof of such facts was prima facie evidence of publication of the matter, but liable to be contradicted; see also Lofts 776.

Where the action was against news vendors for publishing libel by selling a copy of a newspaper containing it, and the jury found that the defendant did not know that it contained any libel and were not negligent in failing to have such knowledge, it was held that they were not liable; 16 L. R. Q. B. Div. 354; 80 Wis. 455; so of a porter who delivers parcels containing libellous handbills in ignorance of the contents of the parcel and in performance of his ordinary occupation; 2 M. & R. 54.

It is well settled that the sale of a newspaper is, prima facie, the publication of a libel contained in it, but not if it is shown that the vendor did not know that the paper contained a libel, and that his ignorance was not due to any negligence on his part, that he had no ground for supposing that the paper was likely to contain libellous matter; 80 Wis. 455. An action against the seller of a newspaper containing a libel is not maintainable without proof that some one read the libel; 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. R. 12.

Every repetition of defamatory words is a new publication and constitutes a new cause of action. In publishing a libel one is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act; 57 Conn. 73; 7 App. Cas. 741. It is not the law of the place where libellous articles are printed but where they are published which makes the words actionable; 25 U. S. App. 99. If a sovereign of a foreign state be the subject of a libel on his character or be defamed, he is entitled to the same redress in the municipal courts of the country of the libeller as any subject of that country; but he cannot complain if the judgment, after a fair trial according to the laws of the country, be adverse to him; 2 Phill. Int. L. 135. See LEX LOCI. And an action can be sustained under a statute though the words were also actionable at common law; 25 U. S. App. 99.

Evidence of publication in order to sustain an indictment upon a libel must be to the same effect as in case of a civil action brought thereon. The publication of the libel in order to warrant either civil action or indictment must be malicious; evidence of the malice may be either express or implied. Express proof is not necessary: for where a man publishes a writing which on the face of it is libellous, the law presumes he does so from that malicious intention which constitutes the offence, and it is unnecessary, on the part of the prosecution, to prove any circumstance from which malice may be inferred; 4 B. & C. 247; 18 Md. 177; 3 How. 266; 12 Conn. 262; 16 Mich. 447. See 77 Ga. 172; 81 Wis. 353; 48 Ill. App. 294. Malice need not be shown, and absence of it will only go in mitigation of damages; 68 Hun 474.

What constitutes a libel. One is not liable for words not in their nature defamatory, though special damage result from their publication; 37 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 637; 17 R. I. 398; 117 Ind. 105. The words must be defamatory in their nature and must in fact disparage the character; 17 N. Y. 57; and if they do not, no action will lie, no matter what the author intended; 119 Ind. 244; see 40 Minn. 291. If the matter is understood as scandalous, and is calculated to excite ridicule and abhorrence against the party intended, it is libellous and indictable as such, however it may be expressed; 13 Metc. 68; 9 N. H. 84; 7 Conn. 266; 10 S. & R. 173; 32 Me. 530; 1 Den. 41; 6 Houst. 52; 76 Hun 814; but wherever the words used are on susceptible of two meanings, it is a question for the jury to decide what meaning was in fact conveyed to the readers; 7 App. Cas. 741; Newell, Slan. & L. 769.

When suit is brought on words not in themselves actionable, an allegation must be made that they contain a libellous meaning, and where the claim fails to show what that meaning was, there is a failure to show any cause of action; 7 App. Cas. 748.

Any publication which has a tendency to disturb the public peace or good order of society is indictable as a libel. "This crime is committed," says Professor Greenleaf, "by the publication of writings blaspheming the Supreme Being, or turning the doctrines of the Christian religion into contempt and ridicule; or tending by their immodesty to corrupt the mind and to destroy the sense of decency, morality, and good order; or wantonly to defame or indecorously to calumniate the economy, order, and constitution of things which make up the general system of law and government of the country; to degrade the administration of government or of justice; or to cause animosities between our own and any foreign government, by personal abuse of its sovereign, its ambassadors, or other public ministers; and by malicious defamations expressed in printing or writing, or by signs or pictures, tending either to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or the reputation of one who is living, and thereby to expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule. This descriptive catalogue embraces all the several species of this offence which are indictable at common law; all of which it is believed are indictable in the United States, either at common law or by virtue of particular statutes." 8 Greenl. Ev. § 164. See 4 Mass. 163; 9 Johns. 214; 4 M'Cord 317; 4 Mass. 115; 34 Me. 223; 3 How. 266; 5 Co. 125; 4 Term 126; 5 Binn. 281; 61 Wis. 120; 49 Kan. 42.

Libels have been classified according to their objects: (1) libels which impute to a person the commission of a crime; (2) libels which have a tendency to injure him in his office, profession, calling, or trade; (3) libels which hold him up to scorn and ridicule and to feelings of contempt or execration, impair him in the enjoyment of general society, and injure those imperfect rights of friendly intercourse and mutual benevolence which man has with respect to man. Newell, Slan. & L. 67.

In the following cases the publications have been held to be actionable: to write to a person soliciting relief from a charitable society, that she prefers unworthy claims, which it is hoped the members will reject forever, and that she has squandered away money, already obtained by her from the benevolent, in printing circulars abusive of the secretary of the society; 12 Q. B. 624; to publish of the plaintiff, that, although he was aware of the death of a person occasioned by his improperly driving a carriage, he had attended a public ball in the evening of the same day; 1 Chit. Bail. 480; to publish of a Protestant archbishop that he endeavors to convert Roman Catholic priests by promises of money and preferment; 5 Bingh. 17; to charge in a publication that persons have conspired to mismanage the affairs of a company, so as to destroy the value of its stock and injure the other shareholders; 73 Tex. 8; to publish a ludicrous story of an individual in a newspaper, if it tend to render him the subject of public ridicule, although he had previously told the same story of himself; 6 Bingh. 409; to publish of a candidate for congress that he is a "pettifogging shyster"; 40 Mich. 241; or to write and publish of any man that he is "thought no more of than a horse thief and a counterfeiter"; 10 Mo. 649; or that he is slippery; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 646; or that he is a dangerous, able, and seditious agitator; 64 Id. 931; or to publish of a member of congress, "He is a fawning sycophant, a misrepresentative in congress, and a grovelling office seeker"; 9 Johns. 214; or to charge one with joining the Mormons; 17 N. Y. S. 491; or in a newspaper article to call a person named Buokstaff, Buoksniff, because of its similitude to "Pecksniff"; 84 Wis. 139; or for a notary public falsely and maliciously to protest for non-payment the acceptance of a manufacturer and then send the draft with such protest to the source from whence it came; 88 Ga. 308; but see 83 Tex. 452; publications that a party was arrested and lodged in jail charged with theft; 84 Tex. 450; or words imputing want of chastity; 152 Pa. 187; 6 Ind. App. 510. See 3 Cra. 8; 42 Vt. 252; 17 Gratt. 250; 47 Cal. 207; 103 Mass. 394; 13 L. R. A. 97, note.

A declaration which alleges that the defendant charged the plaintiff, an attorney, with being guilty of "sharp practice," which is averred to mean disreputable practice, charges a libellous imputation; 4 M. & W. 448.

An advertisement describing a horse as stolen and naming the supposed thief is libellous; 32 Minn. 249; so a newspaper article setting forth that the plaintiff was living in extreme poverty and destitution was held a libel; 3 Hun 26; so words which tend to impeach the honesty and integrity of jurors in their office are libellous; 2 Col. Ter. 607; and the publication of false and malicious statements about a church member, accusing him of disturbing the peace of the church and censuring him therefor, is actionable in itself; 93 Ind. 19; and the publication of the suicide of a man falsely charging that it was induced by the actions of his wife; 59 Wis. 309.

A publication in a newspaper of symptoms of a patient who had taken a certain patent medicine, such article being used as an advertisement, is libellous where it tended to hold the person up to contempt and ridicule; 76 Ga. 280; a letter from the publisher of a newspaper, or an article published in a newspaper in the form of a letter from the publisher to the proprietor of a medicine, saying: "Your advertisement will not be received in the columns of the L. although you offer us big pay. We have repeatedly advised our readers that by the manufacture and sale of such medicines the public are swindled out of their money," was held libellous per se; 95 Wis. 164; a publication stating that a man has been arrested on account of his criminal evidence in a certain case is libellous; 23 W. N. C. Pa. 541; or that he would be an anarchist if he thought it would pay; 32 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 246; and a publication charging that a breach of promise suit was about to be brought against a person is libellous, the plaintiff having been at the time and a number of years before a married man with a family; 123 N. Y. 207.

An editor copying a libellous article from another paper, giving his authority but expressing his disbelief of some of the charges, although neither affirming nor denying the libellous charges, may be guilty of libel, whether malice be shown or not; 2 Hill 510. The headlines of a publication are important in determining the question of a libel, and they cannot be disregarded, for they often render a publication libellous on its face, which without them would not necessarily be so; 63 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 615.

Libel or slander against a patent right is actionable; 20 Fed. Rep. 501; 65 Ga. 452; 119 Mass. 484; and a public denial of a patent right, if malicious, is also actionable; Big. Lead. Cas. Torts 42; but not unless special damage is caused; 5 Q. B. 624; L. R. 9 Ex. 218. A public denial that the patentee or his assignor was a true inventor is actionable if it be malicious and cause special damage to the owner of the patent; 1 L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 514; 34 Fed. Rep. 46. But an assertion of title in such cases by way of warning or defence, if made in good faith, is not actionable; Webb's Poll. Torts 389.

A patentee may warn the public not to buy patented articles except from him; 83 Sup. Ct. N. Y. 523; 59 How. Pr. 356; and it is not a libel to issue a circular forbidding persons to buy articles claimed to be an infringement, if it is done in good faith; L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 1. There must be malice or that want of good faith which is, by legal intentment, equivalent thereto; 19 Ch. Div. 386; L. R. 4 Q. B. 730, in which it was termed "an action of a new kind." But see L. R. 9 Ex. 218, in which a declaration was held good where the disparagement was a statement that the goods were inferior, and alleging special damage. In that case Bramwell, B., said that the gist of the action which makes it maintainable is the publication of an untrue statement productive of special damage. The nature of the action was thus characterized in [1892] 2 Q. B. 527: "Such an action is not one of libel or slander, but an action on the case for damage wilfully and intentionally done without just occasion or excuse, analogous to an action for slander of title." The latter, it is said, having been formerly confined to real estate, has been extended to the protection of title to chattels and of exclusive interests analogous to property, though not property in the strict sense, like patent rights and copyright." Webb's Poll. Torts 389. The suggestion that these rights are not property in any sense is liable to provoke criticism in this country, and it may be suggested that it is their full recognition as property which affords the basis of their protection by right of action at law in such cases.

But not alone are patents within the protection of this principle. It is a general rule that for false and malicious statements respecting his personal property the owner may have an action if he show (1) that statements were made (2) which were untrue (3) to the special damage of the plaintiff: 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 130; 5 Q. B. 624; L. R. 9 Ex. 218; 122 Mass. 235; 144 id. 258; 146 id. 219; 4 Wend. 537; 63 Pa. 46; 4 U. C. Q. B. o. s. 24; Townsh. Sl. & Lib. § 204; Newell, Defamation 216.

The rule has been applied in case of disparaging statements as to a public dinner served at a hotel; 144 Mass. 258; the "Cardiff Giant"; 122 id. 235; a race-horse; 35 Minn. 471; milk sold by plaintiff; 91 N. Y. 83; copyrighted books; 5 Cush. 104.

Defences. When publication is proved, the defendant may show either that the words complained of are true or that they are not malicious. These two defences are known as justification and privilege.

In prosecutions the common-law rule was that the person charged may not justify by pleading the truth in evidence; 11 Mod. 99; because, if the publication is malicious, it is equally to the public interest to punish the publisher of it, whether it was true or not.

By Lord Campbell's Act 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, § 6, it is provided that in an indictment for libel, the truth may be inquired into, but shall not amount to a defence unless it is for the public benefit that the matters charged should be published. This statute does not apply to blasphemous, obscene, or seditious publications; 9 Ir. L. R. 329; 2 Cox, C. C. 45; 15 id. 180; 12 L. R. Ir. 29; and where the statute does not apply, truth is no defence; 10 Cox, C. C. 356; 5 Q. B. D. 1; 4 F. & F. 1089; 49 L. J. M. C. 1; 28 W. R. 133. In this country it has been held that on an indictment for libel the truth is a justification and may be given in evidence; 4 Wend. 114; 3 Johns. Cas. 336; 1 Va. Cas. 175; 30 Ohio St. 115; and that though ordinarily not a defence, it may be given to negative malice where justifiable purpose is shown; 3 Pick. 304; but the law in Massachusetts was subsequently changed by statute so that the truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, is a complete justification; 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 194. As to statutes in other states, see infra.

In a criminal prosecution, it is sufficient publication if the libel has been shown to the prosecutor and to no other person, as such a publication tends to a breach of the peace; Hob. 215; 1 Stark. 471; 7 Cox, C. C. 25.

By the Libel Law Amendment Act, 1888, § 6, the permission of a judge has to be obtained previously to the institution of criminal proceedings against a libellor, and such permission is only given when, from the circumstances of the case, a remedy by civil action will not be sufficient; [1892] 1 Q. B. 86; 61 L. J. M. C. 91; 40 W. R. 175; 17 Cox, C. C. 464. See 9 Eng. Rul. Cas. 185; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

Justification. In civil actions for libel the defendant may justify by pleading the truth in evidence; 1 R. I. 263; 6 La. Ann. 254; 5 Sandf. 54; 4 Sneed 520; 15 Wash.

542; but the truth must be as broad as the defamatory accusation in order to constitute a complete defence; 37 Minn. 285. It is not sufficient merely to allege that the charge is true; 29 Mo. 429; 5 Blatch. 332; 13 W. Va. 158; and the plea of justification is that the whole statement is substantially true; 7 Moo. 200; 3 B. & Ald. 673; gross exaggeration destroys the plea; 6 Bing. 266. The existence of a rumor to the same effect as a libel is not admissible as evidence on a plea of justification; 8 Q. B. D. 491.

It has been held that if the defendant fails to plead a complete justification, he will not be allowed to prove his defence; 1 Abb. N. C. 208; although the rule is generally established that a defendant may justify part of a libel containing several distinct charges; 7 East 493; 2 Bing. N. C. 604. Either party is entitled to a bill of particulars of any charge not set forth with sufficient detail in the pleadings to enable the party to meet it; 59 N. Y. 176; 15 Pick. 321; 126 Ill. 150; 91 Pa. 493; but see 1 Abb. N. C. 268, where it was held that the proper practice to obtain particulars of a justification is by motion to make the answer more definite.

A plea of justification is no evidence of malice; 7 Q. B. 68; 14 L. J. Q. B. 196; 18 Law Times 527. In an action for libel, under plea of not guilty, evidence is admissible in mitigation of damages that there was a general suspicion and belief of the truth of the charge, and under the plea of privileged publication such evidence is admissible as pertinent to the question of express malice; 23 Fla. 585.

Privilege. Publications considered privileged in actions for libel are divided into those which are absolutely privileged and those which are conditionally or qualifiedly privileged; 38 Fla. 240. All charges made before a proper church tribunal are privileged, whether made as the foundation for action or during the course of the proceedings; 51 Vt. 501; 88 Ga. 620 (but slanderous words spoken to a former pastor of a church are not privileged; 26 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 488). A plea that an accusation against a clergyman (otherwise lebbellous per se) is a good plea of qualified privilege when it asserts that it was preferred according to the usage and discipline of the church; 61 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 598; and the collecting of evidence against a school principal and sending a copy of charges against her to the board of education and to her, is privileged and not a publication; 31 N. Y. Supp. 561. Pleadings filed in a proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission are privileged; 72 Fed. Rep. 803. Communications between a stockholder and the managing agent of a corporation concerning an employee are privileged; 78 Fed. Rep. 460. A commercial agency which makes it its business to pry into the affairs of another to give information thereof to others must see to it that it communicates nothing that is false, and if it does, it will be liable in damages to the party injured; 77 Ga. 172; publications of such agencies issued to their subscribers generally are not privileged communications; 72 Tex. 115; a false publication that a business house is insolvent is libellous per se; 116 Mo. 226. The publication of a railroad company in a monthly circular to their servants of the name of a former employee and the reason of his dismissal was held to be privileged; 2 Q. B. (1891) 189. No allegation, however false and malicious, contained in answers to interrogatories in affidavits duly made, or any other proceedings in courts of justice, or petitions to the legislature, are indictable; 4 Co. 14 b; 2 Burr. 807; 1 Saund. 131, n. 1; 2 S. & R. 23; 81 Ga. 238; 76 Ia. 598; 72 Tex. 553; 46 Ill. App. 818; see 97 Mo. 122; 1 Q. B. 65; 61 L. J. Q. B. 21, 727; 83 Ky. 375; 104 N. C. 575; 43 La. Ann. 451; 64 Hun 118.

In all cases of libels published confidentially, and other privileged communications, express malice must be shown, or inferred from circumstances, and this is always a question for a jury; 8 B. & C.

579; 30 Me. 466; 3 Pick. 879; 1 Hawks 472; 87 Pa. 385. See 73 Mich. 445; 40 Minn. 475; 89 Va. 106.

Libels in special cases. The public acts of public men may be lawfully made the subject of comment and criticism, not only by the press but also by the public; but while criticism, if in good faith, is privileged, however severe, false allegations of fact are not privileged, and if the charges are false, good faith and probable cause are no defence, though they may mitigate the damages; 16 U. S. App. 613; 4 Mass. 169; 81 N. Y. 110; 40 Mich. 307.

The freedom of criticism upon public men is confined to fair comment on their official acts and does not permit an assault on their private character; 55 Fed. Rep. 456. The imputation of base, unworthy, or corrupt motives is not privileged; for the falseness of the charge is prima facie evidence of malice, and malice will render even the truth actionable; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 921; nor does the right of criticism embrace any right to make a false statement of his acts, involving his integrity or faithfulness in the discharge of his duties; 49 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 507. Memorials or petitions addressed to those in authority praying for the removal of inferior officers, or the redress of fancied grievances, are prima facie privileged, and express malice must be shown before that privilege can be taken away; 1 Lev. 140; 6 C. & P. 548; 5 El. & Bl. 344; 8 How. 266; 17 N. Y. 190; 15 R. I. 72; if presented to the wrong party under a bona fide mistake, it will still be privileged; 5 B. & Ald. 642; 13 U. C. Q. B. 534; contra, 10 Q. B. 899; but if malice be shown, the mere fact that it is vented through a petition will not privilege the publication; 21 Wend. 319; 2 S. & R. 23. Malice may be inferred when it is printed and circulated but never presented before the legislature; 9 N. H. 34; the publication of falsehood and calumny against public officers or candidates for public office is an offence most dangerous to the people and deserves punishment, because the people may be deceived and reject the best citizens to their great injury; 151 Mass. 50; 79 Mich. 286; 74 Tex. 89; 93 Ky. 347; 103 Cal. 114; 117 Pa. 620; 5 Johns. 1.

With regard to candidates for public office, a somewhat broader license is allowed, as it is claimed that the very fact of candidacy puts the character of the candidate in issue, so far as his qualifications and fitness for the office are concerned, and that the public have a right to be informed as to the character of those who seek their votes; 4 Mass. 163; 1 N. & McC. 347. In some cases it is held that where there is an honest belief in the truth of the charges made, and the publication is in good faith, one is not responsible, even for publishing an untruth; 46 Ia. 533; 60 id. 251; 64 Tex. 354; 111 Pa. 404; but the weight of authority tends to uphold the principle that false allegations are not privileged, and good faith and probable cause constitute no defence; 59 Fed. Rep. 530; 8 C. & P. 222; 21 Fla. 431; 136 Mass. 164; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 765; 66 Mich. 307; 17 Wend. 63; 16 Lea 176; 69 Pa. 109; 42 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 270. See JUDGE. Charging a candidate for office with having violated the laws and taken unlawful fees is libellous per se. Although the charge was made on a proper occasion and from a proper motive, the defendant is liable when he not only fails to show the truth of the statement, but also that it was based on probable cause. It is not enough to show that the defendant had information which led him to believe it to be true; the circumstances leading to that belief must be shown in order that it may appear whether or not his belief was well founded; 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 258.

In criticising a publication one may make use of ridicule however poignant, as every man who publishes a book commits himself to the judgment of the public; 1 Campb. 355; 66 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 225; but a critic may not attack the private character of the author; 7 Car. & P. 621; 8 id. 311; 2 Moo. & R. 8.

If the author's writings are ridiculous he may be ridiculed; if they show him to be vicious his reviewer may say so; 24 Wend. 484; but to accuse one of writing and disseminating works calculated to debauch and demoralize the public mind is libellous; 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. 9; and it is a question for the jury, whether a criticism of a dramatic work is such as might be pronounced by any fair man, however prejudiced and however obstinate his views; L. R. 20 Q. B. Div. 275; and so where the criticism concerns an artistic production it is held that any man may express his opinion, however mistaken that opinion may be, and however unfavorable to the merits of the artist or architect, if fairly reasonably and temperately expressed, even though through the medium of ridicule 1 Moo. & M. 741, 187.

International law forbids a libel on a state for the same reason that municipal law forbids a libel on an individual. This right of the state is not invaded by a free discussion of, and criticism upon, the external acts of the state. A state has no complaint if it has the same protection as the individual. And courts of justice are open in both cases for the vindication of the offended party; 2 Phill. Int. L. 48.

Extent of the liability of newspapers for libellous articles. The proprietor of a newspaper is responsible for a libel therein, although inserted without his knowledge by the editor; 104 Pa. 409; and where the proprietor is also the editor he is liable for a libel inserted by his assistant editor; 19 N. Y. 175; the mere fact that he was absent, although he had left instructions not to insert libellous matter, will not exonerate him; 1 Ind. 345; see 121 N. Y. 199. The general principle is well established that the publisher is civilly liable for all that appears in his paper, whether with or without his knowledge; 60 Ill. 51; 25 La. Ann. 170; 35 Mich. 371; 48 Mo. 152; even where it is the result of mistake; L. R. 10 C. P. 502; but not where the mistake was caused innocently by the compositor in setting up illegible copy; 46 Mich. 408. The secretary and treasurer of a public corporation who is also one of the stockholders is not personally liable for a publication in the absence of anything to show that he knew of or consented to it; 10 Daly 202; but if the stockholder is also the general manager of the paper he will be liable if the publication is unjustifiable; 8 Cent. Rep. (Pa.) 301. This liability is not affected by the fact that he does not know of the publication of the article, for it is his business to know, and mere want of knowledge is no defence; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 744; one of the partners is liable for what is done by the others in publishing libellous matter; 2 Dill. 244; and the malicious intent of one partner renders his co-partner liable; 135 Mass. 471. Where the libellous matter is inserted by a reporter without the knowledge or consent of the proprietor, the latter is liable only to the extent of compensatory damages and he will be visited with punitive damages only upon proof by which his approval of his employees' conduct can be legally inferred; 50 N. J. L. 481.

In Massachusetts when the truth of the publication is established there must be shown, in order to render the proprietor liable, that he, in a legal sense, actually participated in or authorized the publication with an actual malicious intent; 136 Mass. 441.

During the present decade there has been a tendency towards legislation mitigating the rigor of the common-law liability for libel on the part of publishers of newspapers, and the agitation on this subject has resulted in the passage of statutes in several states having this purpose in view. The demand for this legislation has been in no sense the result of popular recognition of a general grievance, but an effort on the part of the newspaper press to escape liability for the natural results of the modern tendency to the violation of the most ordinary rights of privacy.

Utah provides in behalf of newspapers of that state, that if it appears that the libel was published in good faith or by mistake, and a retraction was published in full as conspicuously and in the same place as the libel, within a specified time, the plaintiff can recover only actual damages; but this does not apply to a statement about a candidate for public office unless retraction is made by an editorial a certain time before election. Laws 1896, ch. 32. By a statute of Indiana the publisher is protected against punitive damages by a full retraction; it also requires that before bringing action a notice must be served upon the publisher specifying the matter complained of; Laws 1895, ch. 45. A Michigan statute makes the granting of punitive damages dependent on a request for retraction; Laws 1895, ch. 216. In New York the delivery of a libellous statement for publication is constituted a misdemeanor. Laws 1890, ch. 340. A statute in Missouri requires that in actions of libel justification and mitigation shall be stated separately by the defendant. Laws 1891, ch. 70. Georgia limits the common-law liability of newspaper publishers in actions of libel by enacting that "a fair and honest report of the proceedings of legislative or judicial bodies, or court proceedings, or a truthful report of information received from any arresting officer or police authorities, shall be deemed privileged communication, and in any action brought for newspaper libel the rule of the law as to privileged communications shall apply." Laws 1894, ch. 131.

By the Pennsylvania Libel Act of July 1, 1897, it is enacted: § 1. That in criminal prosecutions for libel "if the matter charged as libellous is in the opinion of the court proper for public information, the truth may be given in evidence." § 2. That no defendant can be convicted of the same libel upon the same individual in more than one county. § 3. A plea of justification shall be adequate when it alleges "that the publication is substantially true in every material respect and is proper for public information; and if such plea shall be established to the satisfaction of the court and jury there shall be no recovery. Damages in a civil action are limited to just restitution actually sustained." Laws 1897, ch. 204.

It is for the jury to say what the defendant charged against the plaintiff, and what the reading public might reasonably suppose he intended to charge; 59 Fed. Rep. 530. Where the purport of the publication is plain and not ambiguous, the question in a civil action whether it is libel or not is a question for the court; 60 Fed. Rep. 592.

On a plea of justification, evidence is admissible to prove that the character of the plaintiff is bad; 4 Watts 347; this testimony is admissible for the purpose of establishing a measure of justice between the parties, because the extent of the injury, if any, which the plaintiff sustains, depends in some degree at least upon the goodness or badness of his general character before the publication of the libel, and the amount of compensation ought to be commensurate with, and bear some proportion to, the extent of the injury; 178 Pa. 481; but evidence as to reputation upon the question of damages must be confined to the reputation for that particular trait of character which is involved in the libellous charge; 16 U. S. App. 613.

A publisher cannot be charged with the personal malice of his employee; 2 Moo. & R. 101; and he is not liable for exemplary damages for the actual malice of his subordinate unless he participated in or ratified and confirmed the act; 57 Wis. 570. Express malice in libel cases may be shown not only in the existence of animosity against the plaintiff, but also by a reckless and wanton carelessness,—a wanton neglect to ascertain the truth of the publication. In a newspaper the means of ascertaining are readily attainable, and in such cases punitive damages may be awarded; 26 U. S. 187. Evidence that plaintiff had recovered judgment against another newspaper for the publication of the same libel is immaterial and inadmissible; 78 Fed. Rep. 789, citing the following: Printing Association v. Smith, 14 U. S. App. 173; 8 C. C. C. A. 91; 55 Fed. Rep. 240.

An offer to publish an interview with or a letter from the plaintiff is not a retraction; 38 U. S. App. 394.

Injunction to restrain libels. The power to restrain by injunction, or even by interlocutory injunction, the publication of an alleged libel, on the ground of injury to character and reputation, was a jurisdiction considered unknown to the law of England. Recently, however, it has been held that jurisdiction was conferred by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to prevent by injunction the publication of "atrocious" libels. This alleged jurisdiction has shared with the use of the equitable remedy in connection with labor troubles the credit of giving rise to the phrase, lately so much in vogue,—“government by injunction.” Under the English decisions, it is said to be conceded that the power exists, and that prior to 1882, except in cases where there was injury to property alleged, no such power was ever claimed or exercised; 22 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th ser. 67; Folkhard, Lib. & Sl., ed. 1897, 579; 3 Va. Law Reg. 629; 13 Law Quart. Rev. 301. Speaking with precision, the only case in which an injunction had been granted to restrain the publication of a libel as such was that by Chief Justice Scroggs, in 1650, in a decision which was one of the grounds of his impeachment. See 8 How. St. Tr. 198. In 2 Campb. 511, a dictum of Lord Ellenborough states that an injunction would have been granted against the exhibition of a libellous picture, but it was expressly disapproved in 20 How. St. Tr. 709.

The nearest later approach to it was in the decisions of Malins v. C., in Springhead Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551, and Dixon v. Holden, 7 id. 488, so much discussed in connection with labor troubles (see STRIKE), and which were distinctly overruled by the court of appeal as in conflict with settled equity practice, in Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 142.

It was five years after this that Jessel, M. R., gave expression to his opinion that the Procedure Act gave jurisdiction to the common-law courts to enjoin the publication of libels, an opinion which in that case has been characterized as a dictum, but later the court of appeal held that the power did exist, and the same judge, then sitting, said that an interlocutory injunction might be granted against the publication of a libel however atrocious it might be, and for injuring only character and reputation. The reasoning by which this conclusion was supported was that the Procedure Act, 1854, and the Judicature Act, 1873, transferred all the jurisdiction of the separate courts to the high court and authorized an interlocutory injunction in any case in which it should appear to the court "just or convenient." This he considered gave "unlimited power to grant an injunction in any case where it would be right or just to do so, according to settled legal reasons, or on any legal, settled principle." 20 Ch. Div. 501. The court of appeal again declared in favor of the jurisdiction, but said that it was such "as to require exceptional caution in its use;" [1891] 2 Ch. 260. And this expression was emphasized not only by the refusal of the injunction but also by a quotation from Lord Esher, M. R., that "the jurisdiction is of a delicate nature and should only be exercised in the clearest cases, where, if the jury did not find the matter libellous, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable." 3 Times L. R. 846; see, also, 37 Ch. Div. 170.

These cases are examined and the doctrine, admitted to have been declared in them, severely criticised by Folkhard, who concludes: "That the jurisdiction introduces an undesirable and inconvenient degree of uncertainty into the practice and procedure of the courts; that the cautious language with which the courts have dealt with the subject is sufficient of itself to raise doubt; that the injunction is inappropriate and unconstitutional because it would deprive a defendant of a right secured by Fox's libel act to move in arrest of judgment when tried or convicted of libel. The opinion is further expressed that the manner in which the courts have dealt with the subject indicates a caution which is likely to result in making the new jurisdiction a dead letter; 93 Law Mag. & Rev., 4th ser. 68. This view is thought by him to be justified by the refusal of an injunction in a recent case where he thinks the exercise of the new jurisdiction would have seemed proper if it ever could be so, as after a verdict for heavy damages and judgment against him for libel, the defendant persisted in repetitions of it; [1891] 2 Ch. 294. But in that case the decision was that an interlocutory injunction will not be granted to restrain the publication of a libel unless the court is of the opinion that injury will be caused to the plaintiff's person or property by a continuance of the publication, and hence when the libel, though unjustifiable, is of such a character that no one would attach the slightest weight to it, the injunction would be refused. In another case an action of libel was brought in the Chancery Division and an interlocutory injunction asked which the court refused; [1891] W. N. 64. And it is said that, with the exception of a case of trade libel, the court will not grant an injunction to restrain a libel before the case has been submitted to a jury; 87 Law T. N. S. 263.

An interlocutory injunction was granted to restrain the continuance of the publication of a poster headed "A Black List," which gave the names of non-union men employed by A, it being considered that the motive was to inflict a continuous injury from day to day upon A and his men, and the order was affirmed by court of appeal; 72 L. T. 342; s.c. 11 Times L. R. 228, 180. In this case it was held that the trade union having done more than was necessary for their own protection, the injunction was properly granted.

In this country the subject has been dealt with as it originally stood in England before it was complicated by the question of statutory construction and the resulting decisions. The question in the United States is more or less affected by considerations growing out of the constitutional guaranty of liberty of the press. See infra. There is no authority to support the doctrine that a libel may be enjoined except in cases where some right of property is involved, and a large majority of the cases have arisen in connection with statements made or circulars issued concerning patent rights.

It has been held by authorities of great weight that equity will not enjoin the publication of a libel on a patent right; 29 Fed. Rep. 95; 28 Fed. Rep. 773. This latter case was an ancillary bill to enjoin the defendant in pending proceedings on certain patent rights from uttering libellous or slanderous statements concerning the business of the plaintiff, or the validity of their said letters patent or their title thereto. It was filed during the trial of the principal suit, which was brought to restrain the infringement of the patents. Bradley, J., in denying the injunction, said that the application was a novel one. The following cases were cited by him as ruling against it: 114 Mass. 69; 119 Mass. 484; 7 Daly 189; 3 Paige 24; 55 How. Pr. 132; 50 Ga. 70; 8 Mo. App. 178. He did not consider the contrary decision in 59 How. Pr. 356 as a sufficient authority to counteract these cases. He further said that the English authorities (L. R. 7 Eq. 488; 14 Ch. Div. 763, 984; 26 Ch. Div. 306) were based upon statutes and not upon general principles of equity jurisprudence. He cites the case in 10 Ch. App. 142, Cairns, C., as in line with the American cases referred to by him. As to the English cases, see supra.

This decision by Bradley, J., went so far as to hold expressly that even if malice were shown an injunction would not be granted against the wrong threatened.

This case was undoubtedly in accord with the view prevailing at the time it was decided, and there are later cases which hold that an injunction will not be granted to restrain a publication which is a libel on the plaintiff's business; 1 Ohio N. P. 266; or to restrain one who believes that he is the owner of a patent, and that no other person has title thereto, from stating his claim as a mere belief; 60 Ill. App. 872; or to restrain slander of title to property on the mere allegation of defendant's insolvency; 36 Fla. 99. So an interlocutory injunction restraining the publication of a libel until the trial of the action was refused where there were conflicting affidavits as to whether the plaintiff had or had not consented to the publication; [1894] 1 Q. B. 871, where it is considered under what circumstances an interlocutory injunction will be granted in cases of libel.

It was held that an injunction will not be granted against the circulation of a slander or libel, even where it appeared that it might tend to injure the business or employment of the person affected; 47 N. J. Eq. 519; 110 Mo. 492; nor even interlocutory until trial; id. The power to grant injunctions has also been denied in cases of libel or trade-mark; 55 How. Pr. 132; 56 N. Y. 115; 19 Ch. Div. 386.

But the doctrine upon which these decisions rest, that in no case would an injunction issue to restrain such publication, has not been uniformly followed, and an instructive note in which many cases are collected concludes that "the weight of authority as shown by the later cases is to the effect that such an injunction may be granted if the threats to prosecute for infringement are not made in good faith, and only in such cases;" 16 L. R. A. 243; 59 How. Pr. 356; 57 N. Y. 119; 83 Barb. 210; 45 N. J. L. 167. Where false circulars were issued for the purpose of intimidation, threatening suits for infringement, and a collusive decree was obtained purporting to be an adjudication on the merits, an injunction was granted against the use or publication of such decree; 92 Mich. 558; but equity will not restrain the plaintiff in a patent case from publishing a notice that the defendant therein had been enjoined; 33 Fed. Rep. 345.

And where the defendant issued circulars threatening to bring suits for infringement against persons dealing in plaintiff's patented article, and the charges of infringement were not made in good faith, but with malicious intent to injure plaintiff's business, the court distinguished the case from that in 28 Fed. Rep. 773, supra, because the defendant appeared to have threatened suits which he did not intend to bring, and an injunction was granted; 34 Fed. Rep. 46, per Blodgett, J.

In a still later case Mr. Justice Brown thus states the limits within which equity will permit the use of an injunction:

"It is sufficient to say that, even if it be conceded that a court of equity has power upon petition of a defendant to enjoin the plaintiff from publishing libellous statements concerning his business, there would seem to be no good reason why a patentee may not notify persons using his device of his claim, and call attention to the fact that, by selling or using it, they are making themselves liable to a prosecution. There is undoubtedly authority for holding that, if the language of such letters or circulars be false, malicious, offensive, or opprobrious, or used for the wilful purpose of inflicting an injury, the party is entitled to his remedy by injunction; and this is the extent to which the authorities go. Upon the other hand, it would seem to be an act of prudence, if not of kindness, upon the part of the patentee, to notify the public of his invention, and to warn persons dealing in the article of the consequence of purchasing from others, and in such cases an injunction has been uniformly denied." 44 Fed. Rep. 19; see, also, 81 Fed. Rep. 904.

As to whether an injunction against a publication is an interference with the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of speech and of the press, the decisions although apparently conflicting, support the doctrine that where property rights are involved, this provision is no bar to equitable interference, where the question of libel has been determined in an action at law; 7 Daly 189; 13 Weekly L. Bul. (Ohio) 385; 7 Paige 24; 110 Mo. 892; 18 Mo. App. 178. In the last case an injunction was refused, although the statements were injurious to a property right, and it was held "that courts of justice can do nothing by way of judicial sentence which the general assembly has no power to sanction," and as the general assembly can pass no law abridging the liberty of speech or of the press, that the right to speak, write, or print cannot be suspended by the court. In 185 Ind. 471, it was expressly decided that the constitutional guaranty of freedom of the press and of speech is not a protection against equitable interference with the publication of false and injurious statements, accompanied by threats.

Where a publication is in violation of a contract it will be enjoined, and the liberty of the press will not protect the wrongdoer; 31 Mich. 490; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 212. See 32 L. R. A. 829, n. See LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

The question what are the respective powers and duties of court and jury in trials of indictments for libel has given rise to one of the most interesting of legal controversies. For the history of the controversy upon the right of the jury to determine both law and fact in criminal cases, and the American and English authorities, see JURY.

Lord Mansfield, in 5 Burr. 2861, and in 20 How. St. Tr. 892, and Mr. Justice Buller, in the Dean of St. Asaph's case, 21 How. St. Tr. 847, charged the jury that the only questions for them were whether the defendants had printed and published the paper in question, and whether the innuendoes therein were truly intended as avowed in the indictment, and that it was for the court alone to say whether the paper was a libel or not. This was stoutly denied to be the true state of the law, and accordingly an act known as "Fox's Libel Act" was passed in 1792, declaring that the jury may give a general verdict of guilty or not guilty in all such cases upon the whole matter put at issue, and shall not be required to find defendant guilty on mere proof of publication, and of the sense ascribed to the same in the indictment.

This statute is now generally conceded to be declaratory of the common law. The judge should instruct the jury as to what a libel is, and then leave it to them to say whether the facts necessary to constitute the offence have been proved to their satisfaction; 63 Pa. 263; 18 id. 499; 1 Minn. 156; 28 Vt. 14; 2 Campb. 478; 15 Meto. 120; 29 Me. 323; 21 How. LIBELOUS. Any defamatory words calculated to degrade or injure the reputation of a person in society when written and published maliciously are "libelous." 116 Ky. 282, 76 S. W. 20.

LIBER (Lat.). In Civil Law. A book, whatever the material of which it is made; a principal subdivision of a literary work; thus, the Pandects, or Digest of the Civil Law, is divided into fifty books. L. 52, D. de legat.

In Civil and Old English Law. Free; e. g. a free (liber) bull. Jacobs. Exempt from service or jurisdiction of another. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.: e. g. a free (liber) man. L. 3, D. de statu hominum.

LIBER ASSISARUM (Lat.). The book of assigns or pleas of the crown; being the fifth part of the Year-Books.

LIBER AUTHENTICORUM. The authentic collection of the novels of Justinian, so called to distinguish them from the Epitome Juliani. Sohm. Rom. L. 14.

A Latin collection of unknown origin, containing 134 novels with Latin translation of such as were promulgated in Greek, and widely circulated in Italy under the title of Authenticæ, Liber or Corpus Authenticarum or simply Authenticum. Hunter, Rom. L. 92. This collection was so called either in contrast to the abridgment of Julian, or in accordance with the tradition that those were the very novels promulgated by Justinian in Italy. The last reason was the origin of another title of the collection, Verio Vulgata. Id.

LIBER FEUDORUM (Lat.). A code of the feudal law, which was compiled by direction of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, and published in Milan, in 1170. It was called the Liber Feudorum, and was divided into five books, of which the first, second, and some fragments of the others still exist, and are printed at the end of all the modern editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis. Giannone, b. 13, c. 3; Cruise, Dig. prel. diss. c. 1, § 31.

LIBER HOMO (Lat.). A free man; a freeman lawfully competent to act as juror. Ld. Raym. 417; Kebl. 563.

In London, a man can be a liber homo either—1, by service, as having served his apprenticeship; or, 2, by birthright, being a son of a liber homo; or, 3, by redemption, i. e. allowance of mayor and aldermen. 8 Rep., Case of City of London. There was no intermediate state between vilein and liber homo. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 11, § 22. But a liber homo could be vassal of another.

LIBERAL (Lat. liberalis, of or belonging to a freeman—from liber, free). Free in giving; generous; not mean or narrow-minded; not literal or strict.

Where a jury was instructed that in the award of compensation "it should be liberal," an exception to the remark was overruled; no request had been made for a different instruction, and the expression objected to was preceded by a caution to the jury against crediting any extravagant statement of the injuries. And as if to qualify this caution, it was added that it should be liberal; 9 Otto 859.

By liberal interpretation is meant not that the words should be forced out of their natural meaning, but simply that they should receive a fair and reasonable interpretation with respect to the objects and purposes of the instrument; 2 How. 183.

An offer of a liberal reward for information leading to the apprehension of a fugitive and a specified sum for his apprehension entitles the party giving information leading to the arrest to the liberal reward, but not to the sum named where the arrest was not in fact made by him or by his agent; 92 U. S. 78.

LIBERATE (Lat.). In English Practice. A writ which issues on lands, tenements, and chattels, being returned under an extent on a statute staple, commanding the sheriff to deliver them to the plaintiff, by the extent and appraisement mentioned in the writ of extent and in the sheriff's return thereto. LIBERTI, LIBERTINI. In Roman Law. The condition of those who, having been slaves, had been made free. 1 Brown, Civ. Law 99.

There is some distinction between these words. By libertus was understood the freedman when considered in relation to his patron, who had bestowed liberty upon him; and he was called libertinus when considered in relation to the state he occupied in society subsequent to his manumission. Lec. El. Dr. Rom. § 93. See Morey, Rom. L. 236.

LIBERTIES. In colonial times this term was used as meaning laws or legal rights resting upon them. The early colonial ordinances in Massachusetts were termed laws and liberties, and the code of 1641 the "Body of Liberties"; 7 Cush. 70.

The term is also used in the expression, rights, liberties, and franchises, as a word of the same general class and meaning with those words and privileges. This use of the term is said to have been strictly conformable to its sense as used in Magna Charta and in English declarations of rights, statutes, grants, etc.; 7 Cush. 70.

It was intended to secure to corporations as well as to individuals the rights enumerated in the bill of rights; 1 Murphy 58.

LIBERTY (Lat. liber, free; libertas, freedom, liberty). Freedom from restraint. The faculty of willing, and the power of doing what has been willed, without influence from without.

A privilege held by grant or prescription, by which some men enjoy greater privileges than ordinary subjects.

The place within which certain privileges or immunities are enjoyed, or jurisdiction is exercised, as the liberties of a city. See FREEDOM OF THE CITY.

Liberty, "on its positive side, denotes the fullness of individual existence; on its negative side it denotes the necessary restraint on all, which is needed to promote the greatest possible amount of liberty for each." Amos, Science of Law p. 90.

Civil liberty is the greatest amount of absolute liberty which can in the nature of things be equally possessed by every citizen in a state.

The right to do everything permitted by the laws. Ord. Const. Leg. 87.

The term is frequently used to denote the amount of absolute liberty which is actually enjoyed by the various citizens under the government and laws of the state as administered. 1 Bla. Com. 125.

The fullest political liberty furnishes the best possible guarantee for civil liberty.

Lieber defines civil liberty as guaranteed protection against interference with the interests and rights held dear and important by large classes of civilized men, or by all the members of a state, together with an effectual share in the making and administration of the laws, as the best apparatus to secure that protection, including Blackstone's divisions of civil and political under this head.

Under the Roman law, civil liberty was the affirmation of a general restraint, while in our law it is the negation of a general restraint; Ord. Const. Leg.

Natural liberty is the right which nature gives to all mankind of disposing of their persons and property after the manner they judge most consistent with their happiness, on condition of their acting within the limits of the law of nature and so as not to interfere with an equal exercise of the same rights by other men. Burlam. c. 8, § 15; 1 Bla. Com. 125. It is called by Lieber social liberty, and is defined as the protection or unrestrained action in as high a degree as the same claim of protection of each individual admits of.

Personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, of removing one's person to whatever place one's inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint unless by due course of law. 1 Bla. Com. 134; Hare, Const. L. 777.

Political liberty is an effectual share in the making and administration of the laws. Lieber, Civ. Lib.

Liberty, in its widest sense, means the faculty of willing, and the power of doing what has been willed without influence from without. It means self-determination, unrestrainedness of action. Thus defined, one being only can be absolutely free,—namely, God. So soon as we apply the word liberty to spheres of human action, the term receives a relative meaning, because the power of man is limited; he is subject to constant influences from without. If the idea of unrestrainedness of action is applied to the social state of man, it receives a limitation still greater, since the equal claims of unrestrained action of all necessarily involve the idea of protection against interference by others. We thus come to the definition, that liberty of social man consists in the protection of unrestrained action in as high a degree as the same claim of protection of each individual admits of, or in the most efficient protection of his rights, claims, interests, as man or citizen, or of his humanity, manifested as a social being. (See ROBERT.) The word liberty, applied to men in their political state, may be viewed with reference to the state as a whole, and in this case means the independence of the state, or of other states (see ARROWOOD); or it may have reference to the relation of the citizen to the government, in which case it is called political or civil liberty; or it may have reference to the status of a man as a political being, contradistinguished from him who is not considered master over his labor, or laborer—the slave. This is called personal liberty, which, as a matter of course, includes freedom from prison.

For purposes of convenience and justice alike, in all well governed communities, the natural right of citizens are held in abeyance and subject to additional limitations as having lost some portion of their absolute character. This is but an affirmation of the doctrine that every individual in order to live peacefully in society must submit to some abridgment of his natural right; for any acknowledgment of government, says Brownson, implies that the citizen consents to submit his will to that of a governing will located in the administration of the state: Am. Republic; Ord. Const. Leg.

Constitutional guarantees are the last and best fruits of civil liberty. The bulwarks of civil liberty consist of public acts passed for the purpose of defining and regulating the exercise of the sovereign powers of the state. It is only in this way that the personal rights of the citizen can be secured against invasion by the state. These acts are the guarantees of the good faith of the citizens towards each other and towards the common sovereignty under which they are united. They consist of grants of power together with limitations upon its exercise. The latter, being written, form the common law of the land, and part consist of positive laws known as constitutional provisions which may be enforced in competent tribunals. Ord. Const. Leg. 168.

Liberties are nothing until they have become rights—positively recognized and consecrated. Rights, even when recognized, are nothing so long as they are not entrenched within guarantees. And guarantees are nothing so long as they are not maintained by forces independent of them in the limit of the right. Civil liberties are rights—surrounded rights by guarantees—entrust the keeping these guarantees to forces capable of maintaining them. Such are the successive steps in the progress of free government. 1 Gulutz, Rep. Gov. Lect. 6.

As soon as any part of a person's conduct affects prejudicially the interests of others, society has jurisdiction over it. Mill, Liberty, c. 4.

Lieber, in his work on Civil Liberty, calls that system which was evolved in England, and forms the basis of liberty in the countries settled by English people, Anglican liberty. The principal guarantees, according to him, are:—

1. National independence. There must be no foreign interference. The country must have the right and power of establishing the government it thinks best.

2. Individual liberty, and, as belonging to it, personal liberty, or the great habeas corpus principle, and the prohibition of general warrants of arrest. The right of bail belongs also to this head.

3. A well-secured penal trial, of which the most important is trial for high treason.

4. The freedom of communion, locomotion, and emigration.

5. Liberty of conscience. The United States constitution and the constitutions of all the states have provisions prohibiting any interference in matters of religion.

6. Protection of individual property, which requires unrest in producing, exchanging, and the prohibition of unfair monopolies, commercial freedom, and the guarantee that no property shall be taken except in the course of law, the principle that taxation shall only be with the consent of the taxed, and that no tax shall be levied for short periods only, and the exclusion of confiscation.

7. Supremacy of the law. The law must not, however, violate any superior law or civil principle, nor must it be in violation of the law. The executive must not possess the power of declaring martial law, which is merely a suspension of all law. In extreme cases, parliament in England and congress in the United States can pass an act suspending the privilege of habeas corpus.

8. Every officer must be responsible to the person affected for the legality of his act; and no act must be done for which some one is not responsible.

9. It has been deemed necessary in the Bill of Rights and the American constitution specially to refer to the quartering of soldiers as a dangerous weapon in the hands of the executive.

10. The military force must be strictly submitted to the law, and the citizen should have the right to bear arms.

11. The right of petitioning, and the right of meeting and considering public matters, and of organizing into associations for any lawful purposes, are important guarantees of civil liberty.

The following guarantees relate more especially to the government of a free country and the character of its polity:—

12. Publicity of public business in all its branches, whether legislative, judicial, written, or oral.

13. The supremacy of the law, or the protection against the absolutism of one, or several, or of the majority, requires other guarantees. It is necessary that the public funds be under close and efficient popular control; they should therefore be chiefly in the hands of the popular branch of the legislature, never of the executive. Appropriations should also be for distinct purposes and short terms.

14. It is further necessary that the power of making war reside with the people, and not with the executive. A declaration of war in the United States is an act of congress.

15. The supremacy of the law requires, also, not only the protection of the minority, but the protection of the majority against the rule of a factious minority or cabal.

16. The majority, and through it the people, are protected by the principle that the administration is founded on party principles.

17. A very important guarantee of liberty is the division of government into three distinct functions, —legislative, administrative, and judicial. The union of these is absolutism or despotism on the one hand, and slavery on the other.

18. As a general principle, the principle prevails in Anglican liberty, that the executive may do what is positively allowed by fundamental or other law, and not all that which is not prohibited.

19. The supremacy of the law requires that, where enacted constitutions form the fundamental law, there be some authority which can pronounce whether the legislature itself has or has not transgressed it. This power must be vested in courts of law.

20. There is no guarantee of liberty more important and more peculiarly Anglican than the representative government. See Lieber, Civ. Lib. p. 168.

In connection with this, a very important question is, whether there should be direct elections by the people, or whether there should be double elections. The Anglican principle favors simple elections; and double elections have often been resorted to as the very means of avoiding the object of a representative government.

The management of the elections should also be in the hands of the voters, and government especially should be allowed to interfere.

Representative bodies must be free. They must be freely chosen, and, when chosen, act under no threat or violence of the executive or any portion of the people. They must be protected as representative bodies; and a wise parliamentary law should secure the rights of each member and the elaboration of the law.

A peculiar protection is afforded to members of the legislature in England and the United States by their freedom from arrest, except for certain specified crimes.

Every member must possess the right to propose any measure or resolution.

Not only must the legislature be the judge of the right each member has to his seat, but the whole internal management of the legislature itself. It is indispensable that it possess the power and privileges to protect its own dignity.

The principle of two houses, or the bicameral system, is an equally efficient guarantee of liberty, by excluding impetuous legislation and embodying in the law the collective mind of the legislature.

21. The independence of the law, of which the independence of the judiciary forms a part, is one of the main stays of civil liberty. It requires "a living common law, a clear division of the judiciary from other powers, the public prosecutor, the independence of the judge, the trial by jury, and an independent position of the advocate." See Lieber, Civil Liberty and Self-Government 208-209.

22. Another constituent of our liberty is local and institutional self-government. It arises out of a willingness of the people to attend to their own affairs, and an unwillingness to permit of the interference of the executive, and administration with them beyond what it necessarily must do, or which cannot or ought not to be done by self-action. A pervading self-government, with the Anglican sense, is organic; it consists in organs of combined self-action, in institutions, and in a systematic connection of these institutions. It is, therefore, equally opposed to a disintegration of society and to despotism.

American liberty belongs to the great division of Anglican liberty, and is founded upon the checks, guarantees, and self-government of the Anglican race. The following features are, however, peculiar to American self-government:—a federalism, a strict separation of the state from the church, greater equality and acknowledgment of abstract rights in the citizen, and a more popular or democratic cast of the whole polity. With reference to the last two may be added these further characteristics:—

We have everywhere established voting by ballot. The executive has never possessed the power of dissolving or proroguing the legislature. The list of states has not been closed. We admit foreigners to the rights of citizenship, and we do not believe in inalienable allegiance.

There is no attainder of blood. We allow no ex post facto laws. American liberty possesses, also, as a characteristic, the enacted constitution,—distinguishing it from the English polity with its accumulative constitution. Our legislatures are, therefore, not omnipotent, as the British parliament theoretically is; but the laws enacted by them may be declared by the courts to conflict with the constitution.

The liberty sought for by the French, as a peculiar system, was founded chiefly, in theory, on the idea of equality and the abstract rights of man. Rousseau's Social Contract. See FAREWELL; PERSONAL LIBERTY, and titles here following.

Liberty implies the absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community. 219 U. S. 567. See LIBERTY OF CONTRACT. AT LIBERTY; CIVIL LIBERTY.

LIBERTY OF CONTRACT. Liberty of contract consists in having the ability at will, to make or abstain from making, a binding obligation enforced by the sanctions at the law. Judson, Liberty of Contract, Rep. Am. Bar Assn. (1891) 288. Whilst closely allied with property and essential to its use and enjoyment, liberty of contract is really broader in its scope. Ownership of property is a right residing in a person, and property is any right of a person over a thing (in rem) indefinite in point of user. It is through the abridgment of the right of free contract by denying or restraining the use of property that so-called property rights are invaded in the exercise of the police power; id. 288.

The right to make contracts is embraced in the conception of liberty as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. 165 U. S. 578; 198 U. S. 45; 208 U. S. 161. In referring to the Fourteenth Amendment it was said (165 U. S. 589): "The liberty mentioned in that amendment means not only the right of the citizen to be free from the mere physical restraint of his person, as by incarceration, but the term is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties; to be free to use them in all lawful ways; to live and work where he will; to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling; to pursue any livelihood or avocation, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purposes above mentioned."

The privilege of contract is both a liberty and a property right of which one cannot be deprived without due process of law; 154 Ill. 98. And the right of individuals to contract cannot be limited by arbitrary legislation which rests on no reason on which it can be defended, since this would subvert the right to enjoy liberty; 58 Ark. 407; but whenever a statute can be seen to be in the substantial interest of public health, safety, and morals, it may legitimately be upheld even though it incidentally interfere with liberty of contract; 46 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 756.

But it has also been recognized that freedom of contract is a qualified and not an absolute right. There is no absolute freedom to do as one wills or to contract as one chooses. The guaranty of liberty does not withdraw from legislative supervision that wide department of activity which consists of the making of contracts, or deny to government the power to provide restrictive safeguards. Liberty implies the absence of arbitrary restraint, not immunity from reasonable regulations and prohibitions imposed in the interests of the community. 219 U. S. 568, 567; 137 U. S. 89; 197 U. S. 111. Further, it has been said "It is within the undoubted power of government to restrain some individuals from all contracts, as well as all individuals from some contracts. . . . The possession of this power by government in no manner conflicts with the proposition that, generally speaking, every citizen has a right freely to contract for the price of his labor, services, or property." 157 U. S. 165, 166. In 219 U. S. 202, the court said on this subject that "there is no such thing as absolute freedom of contract. Contracts which contravene public policy cannot be lawfully made at all, and the power to make contracts may in all cases be regulated as to form, evidence, and validity as to third persons. The power of government extends to the denial of liberty of contract to the extent of forbidding or regulating every contract which is reasonably calculated to injuriously affect the public interests." See further 175 U. S. 228.

Among the statutes which, although interfering with the right to contract, have been held constitutional either under the police power of a state or under the power vested in the legislature for the public welfare, are: fixing the maximum of charges for the storage of grain; 94 U. S. 118; 117 N. Y. 1; giving a city power to regulate the price of bread; 3 Ala. 140; prohibiting the manufacture and sale of any article in imitation of the substance of butter; 105 N. Y. 128; 127 U. S. 678; or of oleomargarine colored to imitate butter; 50 N. J. L. 584; or of oleomargarine unless stamped; 68 Md. 592; or of any article designed to take the place of butter or cheese; 12 Mo. App. 214; prohibiting the sale of cotton in the seed between the hours of sunset and sunrise; 68 Ala. 58; 76 id. 60; 104 N. C. 714; forbidding the sale of baking powder containing alum without a label so stating; 44 Minn. 271; making it unlawful for the vendor of personal property, sold on condition that the title should remain in him until payment in full had been made, to take possession of such property without tendering or refunding to the purchaser the sums already paid by him, after deducting a reasonable compensation for the use; 46 Ohio St. 450; forbidding the sale of stamped and registered bottles without the consent of the person whose stamp it thereon; 189 N. Y. 153; forbidding any one not authorized by law to issue a note, check, or ticket to circulate as money; 63 Mo. 570; reducing the rate of interest on judgments; 145 U. S. 163 (Harlan, Field, and Brewer, JJ., dissenting); giving priority to a mechanic's lien over a mortgage of an earlier date; 62 Mo. 483; limiting the amount of property which incorporated colleges might take by devise, grant, etc.; 156 U. S. 152, affirming 111 N. Y. 66; forbidding the importation of foreign labor; 28 Fed. Rep. 795; 36 id. 303; or the employment of Chinese labor; 85 Cal. 274; providing that a failure to perform any condition of an insurance policy shall not be a valid defence of an action unless such condition is printed in type as large as or larger than that known as long primer, or is written with pen and ink in or on the policy; 63 Fed. Rep. 680; restricting insurance business to corporations; 164 Pa. 306; prohibiting foreign insurance companies from carrying on business within its limits; 155 U. S. 648; but see 165 U. S. 578, where a provision in a statute forbidding the insurance of property within the state in a foreign insurance company which has not complied with the laws of such state was held a violation of the right of the individual to contract; the contract having been made in another state; prohibiting citizens from selling intoxicating liquors; 42 S. C. 222; or forbidding the selling or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians; 105 Cal. 344; or a prohibition act; 123 U. S. 623. Making it a misdemeanor for an attorney to receive more than a specified amount for prosecuting a claim for a pension is valid, as a pension is a bounty over which congress has control; 157 id. 60.

Much of the legislation which has been questioned as interfering with the liberty of contract secured to the citizens of the United States under the fourteenth amendment to the constitution, is in relation to the acts passed which aimed to benefit the laborer in his relations to his employer. Although lacking the powers vested in the courts in this country to declare an act unconstitutional, yet the principle on which much of this class of legislation on the liberty of contract rests in the United States is clearly stated by an English court: "When two classes of persons are dealing together and one class is, generally speaking, weaker than the other, and liable to oppression either from natural or incidental causes, the law should as far as possible redress the inequality by protecting the weak against the strong." 3 B. & S. 66. Obviously, the intention of the legislature in passing this class of acts was to protect the employees against fraud and oppression on the part of employers, but the objection to statutes prescribing a limitation upon hours of labor and regulating the mode of payment for it are (1) that they interfere with the right secured to every citizen of acquiring and possessing property or with the right to pursue happiness; (2) they are in conflict with that clause of the bill of rights which declares that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; 27 Am. L. Rev. 867.

In many cases the restriction by statute of contracts between employers and employees is held unconstitutional; 58 Ark. 407; 41 Neb. 187; 154 Ill. 198; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 638; 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 338; 115 Mo. 807; 163 Pa. 153; 118 id. 481; and the liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as the laborer may deem most beneficial and to others to employ such labor is held to be necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty of the right to property; 147 Ill. 66, where the act prescribed that wages be paid weekly. But in Massachusetts a statute requiring manufacturers to pay the wages of their employees weekly is held within the power of the legislature, as the constitution of that state extends legislative power to "all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances," and does not, in terms, make any provisions as to liberty of contract; 163 Mass. 589; and in Rhode Island a weekly payment law; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 246; and in Indiana a bi-weekly payment law, were held constitutional; 28 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 353.

In New York a law forbidding city contractors to accept more than eight hours for a day's work except in cases of necessity is held not to abridge the privileges or rights of any citizens; 80 N. Y. Sup. 478 (White, J., dissenting); so with a law limiting hours of service on railroads; 136 N. Y. 554; and one forbidding the employment of women and children for more than ten hours a day; 120 Mass. 383; and an act providing that ten hours in twelve consecutive hours shall be a day's labor for railroad laborers and that an employee shall receive proportionate compensation for extra time was held constitutional where the rate of wages was not prescribed by the act and contracts other than by the day were not prohibited by it; 20 N. Y. Supp. 461. But an act prescribing a limit of ten hours for a day's work has been held unconstitutional; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 658; 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 328; as is an ordinance prescribing eight hours; 85 Cal. 274; 41 Neb. 187; 154 Ill. 198 (where the act limited the restriction of hours to women); and an act forbidding the execution of a contract between a corporation and an employee whereby the latter agrees in consideration of certain benefits from the company, that if he elect to accept benefits when injured he will not look to the company for damages; 1 Ohio N. P. 218.

A statute providing that corporations engaged in manufacturing or in operating a railroad should pay the wages of their employees in legal tender money of the United States, was held valid on the ground that such legislation was necessarily incident to the power of the legislature to amend or alter the corporate charter; 55 Md. 74; and a similar statute regarding payment of wages otherwise than by paper redeemable in lawful money, and prescribing a method of weighing coal at the mouth of the mine, was upheld on the ground that the business of the defendants was one over which the state had supervision, and that the state had power to protect laborers against fraud on the part of employers in the payment of wages and in the mode of ascertaining the amount of the wages earned; 86 Va. 802; contra as to the last point, 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 481, on the ground that the act attempted to deprive persons of the right to fix by contract the manner of ascertaining compensation, and contra as to the payment of wages by any order or script not negotiable and redeemable in lawful money of the United States, 115 Mo. 807; 118 Pa. 431; 33 W. Va. 179, 188; 147 Ill. 66. A statute forbidding the waiving of payment of money in contracts between employer and employee was held constitutional on the ground that it protected and maintained the medium of payment established by the sovereign power of the United States; 128 Ind. 365.

As to the constitutionality of acts forbidding an employer to discharge his employee on account of his membership in a labor union, see LABOR UNION.

LIBERTY OF THE PERSON. See PERSONAL LIBERTY.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS. The right to print and publish the truth, from good motives and for justifiable ends. 8 Johns. Cas. 394.

The right in the publisher of a newspaper to print whatever he chooses without any previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor to exactly the same extent that any one else would be responsible. 18 W. Va. 183.

The right to print without any previous license, subject to the consequences of the law. 8 Term 431.

The right to publish in the first instance as the publisher pleases, and without control; but for proceeding to unwarrantable lengths he is answerable both to the community and to the individual. 4 Yeates 267. Liberty of the press means not only liberty to publish, but complete immunity from legal censure and punishment for the publication, so long as it is not harmful in its character, when tested by such standards as the law affords; Cooley, Const. Lim. [422]. See Story, Const. §§ 1870, 1888, 1891. It is said to consist in this "that neither courts of justice nor any judges whatever are authorized to take notice of writings intended for the press, but are confined to those which are actually printed." De Lome, Const. 254.

At common law liberty of the press was neither well protected nor well defined, and not until after many struggles was it so far recognized in England as to permit the publication of current news without the permission of government censors. May, Const. Hist. c. 7, § 10. The general publication of parliamentary debates dates only from the American revolution, and even then was considered a technical breach of privilege; Cooley, Const. Lim. [118]. A fair publication of a debate is now held to be privileged, and comments on public legislative proceedings are not actionable, so long as a jury shall think them honest and made in a fair spirit, and such as are justified by the circumstances; 1. R. 4 Q. B. 73.

In the colonial period the English practice was followed in this country. In 1640 the general laws were published for the first time in Massachusetts and protest by the magistrates, and in Virginia and New York printing was specially prohibited. The constitutional convention of 1787 sat with closed doors, as did the senate until 1793. By the constitutional liberty of the press is secured against restraint in the United States, but he who uses it is responsible for its abuse. Like the right to keep firearms, it will not protect the user from annoyance and destruction caused by him; 3 Pick. 313. The Sedition Act, July 14, 1798, attempted a restriction upon the freedom of the press, but by its terms it was self-limited; its constitutionality was always doubted by a large party, and its impolicy was beyond question. See Whart. St. Tr. 88, 66, 68; 2 Rand. Life of Jefferson 417; 5 Hildr. Hist. U. S. 247; Ord. Const. Leg.

Liberty of the press is allowed in publishing (1) naked and impartial statements of judicial proceedings involving a trial and not a mere ex parte examination; and when the nature of the case does not render it improper that the same should be published, or constitute such a publication an offence at law; 4 Sandf. 21, 120; 5 id. 256; 10 Ohio St. 548; 4 Wend. 188; 2 Hill 513; (2) in publishing news; Ord. Const. Leg. 289. Acts which have been held not in conflict with the constitutional guaranty of liberty of the press are:—An act making the publication of a grossly false and inaccurate report of the proceedings of any court a criminal offence and a contempt; 17 Mont. 140; an act taxing the selling of Sunday papers; 17 Tex. App. 253; an act forbidding the use of the mails for obscene matter; 45 Fed. Rep. 414; or for printed matter deemed by the government to be injurious to the people; 143 U. S. 110; 96 id. 727; or for sending threatening letters; 185 Mo. 450 (see LIBEL); an act forbidding the publication and sale of a newspaper devoted to the publication of scandal and immorality; 136 Mo. 227; an act directed against blasphemy; 20 Pick. 206; and a by-law of the Associated Press of New York, prohibiting a member from receiving or publishing the regular news despatches of any other news organization covering a like territory; 136 N. Y. 833, aff'g 15 N. Y. Suppl. 887.

A city cannot pass an ordinance declaring a certain named newspaper a public nuisance and forbidding its sale; 23 R. W. Rep. (Tex.) 938; nor can the advertisement of a dramatic production be prevented where the play is based upon the facts of a pending trial, as disclosed at a preliminary hearing and the coroner's inquest; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 458; and the constitutional guaranty of liberty of the press will not protect one who breaks a contract with a purchaser not to publish or be connected with another paper in the same locality; 94 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 512.

As to whether an injunction may be issued to restrain the publication of an alleged libel, see LIBEL.

See, generally, NEWSPAPER; LETTER; INJUNCTION.

LIBERTY OF SPEECH. The right to speak facts and express opinions. Whart. Dict.

The liberty of speech which both the federal and state constitutions protect is (1) Liberty of speech of legislators in public assemblies, and while engaged in discussing public matters, or in writing reports, or in the exercise of the functions of their office. This is an official privilege; 4 Mass. 1. (2) Liberty of speech of counsel in judicial proceedings, and while confining himself to matters that are strictly pertinent to the issue. This is also an official privilege; 3 Metc. 194; 1 Binn. 178.

In the discharge of his professional duty, counsel may use strong epithets, however derogatory to other persons they may be, if pertinent to the cause, and stated in his instructions, whether the thing were true or false. But if he were maliciously to travel out of his case for the purpose of slandering another, he would be liable to an action, and amenable to a just, and often more efficacious, punishment, inflicted by public opinion; 3 Chitty, Pr. 687.

No action will lie against a witness at the suit of a party aggrieved by his false testimony, even though malice be charged; 60 N. Y. 809; 21 La. Ann. 875; 28 La. 51. The remedy against a dishonest witness is confined to the criminal prosecution for perjury; but false accusations, contained in affidavits or other proceedings by which a prosecution is commenced for supposed crime, render the party liable to action if actual malice be averred and proven; 4 Cal. 624; Cooley, Const. Lim. 522.

An act forbidding the use of profane language is not an undue interference with free speech; 113 N. C. 683; 50 Fed. Rep. 921; 16 Blatch. 838; or one taxing itinerant vendors of a drug; 60 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 436; or an ordinance prohibiting a public address upon any of the public grounds of a city; 163 Mass. 510; but an act which makes it unlawful for certain specified officers to participate in politics by making political speeches or participate in political meetings is unconstitutional; 79 Va. 190.

Maliciously enticing employees of a receiver to leave his employ in pursuance of a combination to prevent the operation of the road is not protected by the constitutional guaranty of free speech; 63 Fed. Rep. 808. Congress has no power to punish individuals for disturbing the assemblies of peaceful citizens. That is a police power belonging to the state alone; 93 U. S. 534. See 33 L. R. A. 829, n.; Cooley, Const. Lim.; Ord. Const. Leg.; LABOR UNION; MALICE; SLANDER; LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

LIBERUM MARITAGIUM (Lat.). In Old English Law. Frank-marriage (q. v.). 2 Bla. Com. 115; Littleton § 17; Bract. fol. 21.

LIBERUM SERVITIUM. Free service. Service of a warlike sort by a feudatory tenant; sometimes called servitium liberum armorum. Somner, Gavelk. p. 56; Jacob, Law Dict.; 4 Co. 9.

Service not unbecoming the character of a freeman and a soldier to perform: as, to serve under the lord in his wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. 2 Bla. Com. 60. The tenure of free service does not make a villein a free man, unless homage, or manumission precede, any more than a tenure by villein services makes a freeman a villein. Bract. fol. 24.

LIBERUM TENEMENTUM. Freehold. Frank-tenement. 2 Bouv. Inst. n. 1690; 1 Washb. R. P. 46.

In Pleading. A plea in justification by the defendant in an action of trespass, by which he claims that he is the owner of the close described in the declaration, or that it is the freehold of some third person by whose command he entered. 2 Salk. 453; 7 Term 355; 1 Wms. Saund. 299 b, note.

It has the effect of compelling the plaintiff to a new assignment, setting out the abutments where he has set forth the locus in quo only generally in his declaration; 11 East 51, 73; 16 id. 343; 1 B. & C. 489; or to set forth tenancy in case he claims as tenant of the defendant, or the person ordering the trespass; 1 Saund. 299 b. It admits possession by the plaintiff, and the fact of the commission of a trespass as charged; 3 McCord 226; McKel. Pl. 2083; see Greenl. Ev. § 626.

LIBLAC. Witchcraft, particularly that kind which consisted in the compounding and administering of drugs and philters. Leg. Athel. 6; Wharton.

LIBRA PENSA. A pound of money by weight.

In early times, and more especially during periods of debasement of the currency, there was sometimes used as a measure of money a pound which, instead of being the twenty shillings or two hundred and forty silver pennies making up the customary pound, was an actual pound weight of pure silver. Byrne.

LIBRARY. Such books or works of literature, science, art, or business as one may have in his residence or office. 132 Ky. 589, 116 S. W. 789.

LIBRIPENS. A neutral person or balance holder, who was present at a conveyance of real property. He held in his hand the symbolic balance, which was struck by the purchaser with a piece of bronze as a sign of the completion of the conveyance. The bronze was then transferred to the seller as a sign of the purchase money. Morey, Rom. L. § 1, 60.

LICENCIADO. In Spanish Law. Lawyer or advocate. By a decree of the Spanish government of 6th November, 1843, it was declared that all persons who have obtained diplomas of "Licenciados in Jurisprudence" from any of the literary universities of Spain are entitled to practice in all the courts of Spain without first obtaining permission by the tribunals of justice.

LICENSEE (Lat. licere, to permit).

In Real Property Law. A permission. A right, given by some competent authority to do an act, which without such authority would be illegal, or a tort or trespass.

A permission to do some act or series of acts on the land of the licensor, without having any permanent interest in it; it is founded on personal confidence, and not assignable. It may be given in writing or by parol; it may be with or without consideration, but in either case it is usually subject to revocation, though constituting a protection to the party acting under it until the revocation takes place. 24 Mich. 983; 69 id. 815; 3 Wyo. 513.

An authority to do a particular act or series of acts on another's land without possessing any estate therein. 11 Mass. 538; 4 Sandf. Ch. 73; 60 Vt. 702; 1 Washb. R. P. *289.

The written evidence of the grant of such right.

An executed license exists when the licensed act has been done.

An executory license exists where the licensed act has not been performed.

An express license is one which is granted in direct terms.

An implied license is one which is presumed to have been given from the acts of the party authorized to give it.

It may be granted by the owner, or, in many cases, by a servant; Cro. Eliz. 246; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 427.

The distinction between an easement and a license is often so metaphysical, subtle, and shadowy as to elude analysis. The adjudications upon this subject are so numerous and discordant that taken in the aggregate they cannot be reconciled. But there are certain fundamental principles underlying most cases which enable courts to distinguish an easement from a license when construed in the light of surrounding circumstances; 33 N. J. Eq. 254; 94 Tenn. 397. An easement implies an interest in land which can only be created in writing or constructively its equivalent—prescription; 1 Washb. R. P. 629. A license may be created by parol; 13 M. & W. 838; 4 M. & S. 582; 7 Barb. 4; 61 Me. 422; 60 Tex. 267; by specialty; Pars. Con. 223; or by implication of circumstances; Hob. 62; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 427.

Licenses are of two kinds, simple or revocable, and coupled with a grant or irrevocable. Simple licenses are revocable at the will of the grantor. 11 Mass. 435; 15 Wend. 380; 81 Ga. 451; 78 Cal. 95; 24 N. H. 864; they are revoked ipso facto by the grantor's conveying the land to another; 4 M. & W. 538; 119 U. S. 561; or by his doing any other act preventing the user; 13 M. & W. 888; although the licensee has incurred expense; 10 Conn. 878; 24 N. H. 864; 4 Johns. 418; 87 E. L. & Eq. 469; 8 Wis. 117; 2 Gray 803; 1 Dev. & B. 492; 41 Minn. 56; 40 Ill. App. 641; 111 Mo. 887; 63 Hun 634; 90 Mich. 284; but see 14 S. & R. 267; and it is not so with a license closely coupled with a transfer of title to personal property; 8 Metc. 84; 11 Conn. 523.

A license is irrevocable when it is coupled with a grant or when the licensee has on the faith of the license spent money in executing works of a permanent character on the land; 2 B. & Ald. 724; 11 A. & E. 34; 8 East 802; 33 Ala. 600; 7 N. H. 237; 18 M. & W. 838 (but see comments on this case in 4 Del. Ch. 195, note); and in some states even parol licenses without consideration are held irrevocable when executed, on the ground of equitable estoppel; 83 Pa. 169; 59 Ill. 337; 45 Ga. 83; 60 Vt. 702; 40 Mo. App. 184.

The nature of the interest in the land of another which might be created by a parol license is thus stated by Bates, Ch., in Jackson & Sharp Co. v. P. W. & B. R. Co., 4 Del. Ch. 180, where the subject is carefully considered and the authorities collected: "It must be admitted that a license or permission to exercise some privilege upon the land of the licensor can create no estate or interest in the land, such as binds the land and is transmissible from the licensee, the utmost effect of a license being to confer a personal privilege, which is not assignable or transmissible, and is revocable at the licensor's pleasure. Nor does it matter whether the license be oral or in writing, so long as it remains a mere license, not converted into a conveyance, grant, or contract, nor rendered irrevocable by estoppel, as under some circumstances . . . it may be in equity though not at law. Few points have undergone more discussion, and have at length come to be better settled, than the insufficiency of a license at law to create or transfer an interest in land." It was also said that "at law a license can under no circumstances become irrevocable by estoppel when the effect would be to create an interest in land," there not having been "such conduct as would render the assertion of the legal right a fraud." See an extended note to this case, id. 195-8. See also 94 Tenn. 428, where it was held that the privilege to discharge water from an ore wash into a stream, given without words of grant by a lower proprietor to an iron company, with an agreement to accept a certain sum as the full amount of damages done by such water, is a license, not an easement, and does not extend to the grantee of the iron company.

The revocation of a license will not be permitted where such a revocation will amount to a fraud upon the licensee; 166 Pa. 807; 67 Vt. 272; 27 Ore. 849; but revocation may be presumed from a long period of non-user; 135 Mo. 647. Courts of equity will interfere to restrain the exercise of a legal right to revoke a license on the ground of preventing fraud; 4 Del. Ch. 160; and will do so on no other ground; id.; but in such case they will construe the license as an agreement to give the right and compel specific performance by deed; 4 C. E. Green 158; 66 N. C. 546; 1 Washb. R. P. 400; but this does not give the licensee an unqualified right to treat the license as unrevoked; 1 H. & C. 593; 23 Ex. 87; 11 W. R. 119. An occupancy of land under a contract void as against public policy cannot be treated as a possession under a license for the purpose of obtaining relief in equity; 62 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 1008. An executed license which destroys an easement enjoyed by the licensee in the licensee's land cannot be created without deed; 5 B. & C. 221; and the rule that an executed license cannot be revoked; 2 Gill 221; 8 Duer 255; 7 Bingh. 682; 129 Ind. 475; is not applicable to licenses which, if given by deed, would create an easement, but to those which, if so given, would extinguish or modify an easement; 2 Gray 802. See 47 Ill. App. 298. A license must be established by proof and is not to be inferred by equivocal declarations of a land owner; 31 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 810.

The effect of an executed license, although revoked, is to excuse the licensee from liability for acts done properly in pursuance thereof and their consequences; 22 Barb. 386; 2 Gray 802; 10 Conn. 878; 13 N. H. 264; 7 Taunt. 374; 5 B. & C. 221.

In Contracts. A permission to do some act which, if lawful, would otherwise be a trespass or tort; the evidence of such permission when it is in writing.

A covenant not within the statute of frauds may be released or discharged wholly or in part by a parol license; 10 Ad. & E. 65; 2 Add. Cont. [1218].

A license by a debtor to a creditor to seize and sell a specific chattel in discharge of a debt not paid at maturity. This is what is termed in civil law imperfect hypothecation. Such license is confined to the parties and is terminated when rights of third parties intervene; and it is not assignable. It gives no title to the chattel until executed, but possession taken under the license clothes the creditor with the ownership. It is annulled by bankruptcy; 2 Add. Cont., 8th Am. ed. [697]. See HYPOTHECATION.

Under a license in a lease to a lessor to enter and eject the lessee, he was authorized as between themselves to eject the tenant by main force, and the license was a good plea in bar of an action of trespass; 7 Man. & G. 316; 7 So. N. R. 1025.

In International Law. Permission granted by a belligerent state to its own subjects, or to the subjects of the enemy, or to neutrals to carry on a trade interdicted by war. 2 Hall. Int. Law 343.

Licenses operate as a dispensation of the rules of war, so far as their provisions extend. They are stricti juris, but are not to be construed with pedantic accuracy. 2 Hall. Int. Law 343; 1 Kent 163, n.; 4 C. Rob. 8. They can be granted only by the sovereign authority, or by those delegated for the purpose by special commission; 1 Doda. 228; Stew. Adm. 387; 8 Term 548; 1 C. Rob. 196; and they must be granted or assented to by both belligerents; Snow. Int. L. xxi. The Act of Congress, authorizing the president to license certain commercial intercourse with the states in rebellion, did not contemplate the exercise of that authority by subordinate officers of the executive department without the express order of the president; 5 Wall. 580. Licenses constitute a ground of capture and confiscation per se by the adverse belligerent party; Wheat. Int. Law 476. They legalize the commerce, and the alien licensee may sue and be sued in respect thereto as a natural-born subject; 2 Add. Cont. 134, 8th Am. ed. [1156]; 15 East 426; 12 id. 340, 8 Taunt. 568. See 2 Halleck, Int. L., Sir S. Baker's ed. ch. xxx.

In Pleading. A plea of justification to an action of trespass, that the defendant was authorized by the owner of the freehold to commit the trespass complained of.

A license must be specially pleaded to an action of trespass; 2 Term 166; but may be given in evidence in an action on the case; 2 Mod. 6; 8 East 308. See JUSTIFICATION.

In Governmental Regulation. Authority to do some act or carry on some trade or business, in its nature lawful but prohibited by statute, except with the permission of the civil authority or which would otherwise be unlawful.

A license to carry on a business or trade is an official permit to carry on the same or perform other acts forbidden by law except to persons obtaining such permit; 85 Tex. 228.

A license of this sort is a personal privilege, and one issued to a partner individually does not extend to his co-partner or to the firm; 27 Ala. 32. It has been held that even the servant of the licensee is not protected by his master's license; 63 Pa. 168; 4 B. Monr. 37; 7 Dana 337; its terms cannot be varied or extended by the licensee, although he may do every thing that is necessary and proper for his enjoyment of it; 8 Lea 328; 30 La. Ann. 1094; 31 id. 210; 78 Va. 438.

In some cases it is held that where a license is for the protection of the public and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business, and the license is for revenue merely, a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of an act is void; 64 Miss. 221; 4 C. B. N. s. 405; 103 Pa. 501; 27 Ill. App. 270. An innkeeper who fails to secure a license cannot establish a lien upon the goods of his guest; 38 Mo. 92; an attorney cannot recover for his services; 61 Ill. 189; or a surgeon; 37 Eng. L. & Eq. 475; or a physician; 81 Cal. 370 (where a statute made the failure to procure a license a misdemeanor); 105 N. C. 95; L. R. 10 Q. B. 66. But the contracts of unlicensed persons have, in some cases, been held valid; 85 Pa. 329; 23 N. H. 209; 45 Me. 402. See 65 Miss. 365.

A license fee is a tax; 41 La. Ann. 665; which a state may impose upon all citizens within its borders; 16 S. C. 47; but it cannot discriminate between residents and non-residents of the state; 57 Md. 251; or of a city or county; 182 Pa. 630; 5 Coldw. 554; 52 Cal. 606; 107 Ind. 502. Subject to this restriction, a license tax may be imposed upon particular classes of business men; 49 Tex. 279; 6 Sawy. 295; 12 Nev. 263; 9 Baxt. 518; 97 Ga. 114; but a fixed and definite license fee must be named, which all persons engaged in the business specified shall pay; 117 Ind. 221. An occupation tax must be levied only as a means of regulation not of revenue; 42 Neb. 223. Where an act authorizes the granting of licenses, but provides that they may be revoked at the pleasure of the authority granting them, a license granted under the act is not such a contract between the state and the individual that a revocation of it deprives the licensee of any property, immunity, or privilege within the meaning of the constitution; 138 Mass. 579; but in some cases it has been held that a license cannot be revoked without refunding the fee for the unexpired time; 27 N. H. 289; 3 Harring. 441.

The repeal of the act under which the license was granted does not thereby revoke the license; 46 Ala. 329; 1 Ohio St. 15; 119 Pa. 417; but an act prohibiting the business operates at once to revoke the license; 5 Gray 597.

When the power is exercised by municipal corporations, a license is the requirement, by the municipality, of the payment of a certain sum by a person for the privilege of pursuing his profession or calling, whether harmful or innocent, for the general purpose of producing a reliable source of revenue; Tied. Lim. Pol. Pow. 271.

If the occupation is harmful, the sum paid for its prosecution may be said to be a license fee; but if innocent, it is a license tax; 25 Minn. 248; 11 Mich. 49. See 32 N. Y. 261; 26 N. J. L. 296; 60 Pa. 445; 50 Ga. 475; 1 Ohio St. 268. Mere taxation of an unlawful business does not legalize it; 8 L. R. A. Tenn. 280. Where the occupation is not dangerous to the public, either directly or incidentally, it cannot be subjected to any police regulation which does not fall within the power of taxation; Tied. Lim. Pol. Pow. 278. In the regulation of occupations harmful to the public, it is constitutional to require those who apply for a license to pay a reasonable sum to defray the expense of issuing the license and maintaining the proper supervision. What is a reasonable sum must be determined by the facts of each case; but where it is a plain case of police regulation, the courts are not compelled to be too exact in determining the expense of regulation and supervision, so long as the sum demanded is not altogether unreasonable; Tied. Lim. Pol. Pow. 274; 9 Pick. 415; 39 Conn. 140; 60 Pa. 445; 11 Mich. 847; 81 Ia. 102.

A police regulation is not necessarily invalid because in its incidental operations the receipts of the municipality are augmented; 60 Pa. 445; an ordinance which does not fix a definite fee for the pursuit of any occupation, and permit all persons to engage therein, upon payment of such fee, is invalid; 3 L. R. A. 261.

The fact that the income derived from a license is not directly applied to payment of the municipal expenses of regulation and supervision of the business, does not affect the validity of the license, if the amount is not disproportionate to the cost of issuing the license and regulating the business; 42 Neb. 223.

Revenue derived from licensing a harmful occupation with a view to its partial suppression, in excess of that required to maintain proper supervision of it, is not a tax, since its primary object is to restrict an occupation and not to raise revenue; 32 Mich. 406; 16 Wis. 566.

The courts are said by Tiedman, Lim. Police Power, to be not harmonious as to the grounds justifying a license for all kinds of employment; yet the right to impose a license is generally recognized; 9 Pick. 415; 57 N. Y. 591; 42 N. J. L. 364; 60 Pa. 445; 7 Md. 1; 50 Ga. 580; 27 Ala. 55; 15 Ohio 625; 11 Mich. 43; 29 Ia. 123; 101 Ill. 475. The same author cites the following cases: licensing of hucksters has been held unreasonable; 5 Cow. 463; 42 N. J. L. 364; 29 Wis. 807; 25 Minn. 248; and a license tax upon lawyers and physicians is held to be reasonable; 20 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 580; 12 Mo. 288; 5 Ohio 21; 36 Ga. 480; 17 Fla. 169; on bakers; 3 Ala. 187; on places of public amusement; 2 La. Ann. 550; 7 Md. 1; on hacks and draymen; 57 N. Y. 591; 58 Pa. 119; 70 Mo. 562; 15 Ohio 625; 122 Mass. 60; 27 Minn. 164; on peddlers; 57 Ind. 74; 57 Cal. 92; 51 Miss. 13; on the sale of milk; 82 N. Y. 324; 100 Ill. 57; on auctioneers; 68 Ill. 372; 88 Ia. 96; on selling liquor; 22 Minn. 812; 21 Vt. 436; 19 Fla. 563; 39 Ind. 429; 11 Neb. 547; 10 Ia. 441; 25 Md. 641; 20 Ohio St. 308; 78 Mo. 302; 93 Ill. 669; 32 Mich. 406; on bicycles; 19 C. A city ordinance imposing a pole and wire tax upon a telegraph company doing interstate business, in excess of the reasonable expense to the city in the supervision and regulation thereof, is void; 82 Fed. A license tax upon an agent of a railroad company doing interstate business is unlawful; 136 U. S. 104, diss. Fuller, C. J., Gray and Brewer, JJ.; 136 U. A "license tax" within the meaning of the constitution is not a burden on property, but on that which results from its enjoyment, or the conduct of the business or calling. 97 Ky. 395, 30 S. W. 974.

LICENTIA. License; liberty; permission. See LICENSE.

LICENTIA CONCORDANDI (Lat. leave to agree). One of the formal steps in the levying a fine. When an action is brought for the purpose of levying a fine, the defendant, knowing himself to be in the wrong, is supposed to make overtures of accommodation to the plaintiff, who accepts them, but, having given pledges to prosecute his suit, applies to the court, upon the return of the writ of covenant, for leave to make the matter up; this, which is readily granted, is called the licentia concordandi. 5 Co. 89; Cruise, Dig. tit. 85, c. 2, 22.

LICENTIA LOQUENDI. Imparlance.

LICENTIA SURGENDI. In Old English Law. Liberty of rising. A liberty or space of time given by the court to a tenant, who is excoined, de malo leati, in a real action, to arise out of his bed. Also, the writ thereupon. If the demandant can show that the tenant was seen abroad before leave of court, and before being viewed by the knights appointed by the court for that purpose, such tenant shall be taken to be deceitfully excoined, and to have made default. Bract. lib. 5; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 10.

LICENTIA TRANSFRETANDI. A writ or warrant directed to the keeper of the port of Dover, or other seaport, commanding him to let the person who has this license of the king pass over sea. Reg. Orig. 83.

LICENTIOUSNESS. The doing what one pleases, without regard to the rights of others.

It differs from liberty in this, that the latter is restrained by natural or positive law, and consists in doing whatever we please not inconsistent with the rights of others, whereas the former does not respect those rights. Wolf, Inst. § 64.

LICET (Lat.). It is lawful; not forbidden by law.

Although, Calvinus, Lex. An averment that, "although such a thing is done or not done," is not implicative of the doing or not doing, but a direct averment of it. Fload. 127.

LICET SÆPIUS REQUISITUS (although often requested). In Pleading.

A formal allegation in a declaration that the defendant has been often requested to perform the acts the non-performance of which is complained of.

It is usually alleged in the declaration that the defendant, licet sæpius requisitus, etc., did not perform the contract the violation of which is the foundation of the action. This allegation is generally sufficient when a request is not parcel of the contract. Indeed, in such cases it is unnecessary even to lay a general request; for the bringing of the suit is itself a sufficient request; 1 Saund. 33, n. 2; 2 id. 118, note 3; 2 H. Bla. 131; 1 Johns. Cas. 99, 319; 3 M. & S. 150. See DEMAND.

LIEGE (from liga, a bond, or litis, a man wholly at command of his lord. Blount).

In Feudal Law. Bound by a feudal tenure; bound in allegiance to the lord paramount, who owned no superior.

The term was applied to the lord, or liege lord, to whom allegiance was due, since he was bound to protection and a just government, and also to the feudatory, liegeman, or subject bound to allegiance, for he was bound to tribute and due subjection. 34 & 85 Hen. VIII. So lieges are the king's subjects. Stat. 8 Hen. VI. c. 10; 14 Hen. VIII. c. 2. So in Scotland. Bell, Dict. But in ancient times private persons, as lords of manors, had their lieges. Jacob, Law Dict.; 1 Bla. Com. 367.

Liege, or ligius, was used in old records for full, pure, or perfect: e. g. ligia potestas, full and free power of disposal. Paroch. Antiq. 280. So in Scotland. See LIEGE POUSTIE.

LIEGE POUSTIE (Legitima Potestas).

In Scotch Law. That state of health which gives a person full power to dispose of, mortis causa or otherwise, his heritable property. Bell, Dict.

A deed executed at time of such state of health, as opposed to a death-bed conveyance. Id. A person is in liege poustie, or in legitima potestas, who is in health and capacity, and enr juris. 1 Bell, Com. 85; 6 Cl. & F. 540; Ersk. Prin. III. VIII. 46.

LIEN. A hold or claim which one person has upon the property of another as a security for some debt or charge.

The right which one person possesses, in certain cases, of detaining property placed in his possession belonging to another, until some demand which the former has been satisfied. 2 East 235.

A qualified right which, in certain cases, may be exercised over the property of another. 6 East 25, n.

A right to hold. 2 Campb. 579.

A right, in regard to personal property, to detain the property till some claim or charge is satisfied. Metc. Yelv. 67, n.

The right of retaining or continuing possession till the price is paid. 1 Parsons, Mar. Law, 144.

A lien is defined by statute in California, Utah, New Mexico, and the Dakotas, to be a charge imposed upon specific property by which it is made security for the performance of an act.

In its most extensive signification, the term lien includes every case in which real or personal property is charged with the payment of a debt or duty; every such charge being denominated a lien on the property. It differs from an estate in or title to the property, as it may be discharged at any time by payment of the sum for which the lien attaches. It differs from a mortgage in the fact that a mortgage is made and the property delivered, or otherwise, for the express purpose of security; while the lien attaches as incidental to the main purpose of the bailment, or, as in case of the lien of a judgment, by mere act of the law, without any act of the party. In this general sense the word is commonly used by English and American law writers to include those preferred or privileged claims given by statute or by admiralty law, and which seem to have been adopted from the civil law, as well as the security existing at common law, to which the term more exactly applies. In its more limited as well as commoner sense, the word lien indicates a mere right to hold the property of another as security until some claim is satisfied.

The civil law embraces, under the head of mortgage and privilege, the peculiar securities which, in common and maritime law, and equity, are termed liens. See MORTGAGE; PRIVILEGE; HYPOTHECATION.

In Scotch law what corresponds to the common law lien is included under the rights termed hypothec and retention, though certain rights of retention are also called liens; Ersk. Prin. 374. See RETENTION; HYPOTHECATION.

Common Law Lien. As distinguished from the other classes, a lien at common law consists in a mere right to retain possession until the debt or charge is paid. 2 Story 131; 24 Me. 214; 5 Ohio 88; 10 Barb. 626; 43 Ill. 424; 66 Tex. 159.

In the case of a factor an apparent exception exists, as he is allowed a lien on the proceeds of goods sold, as well as on the goods themselves. But this seems to result from the relation of the parties and the purposes of the bailment; to effectuate which, and at the same time give a security to the factor, the law considers the possession, or right to possession, of the proceeds, the same thing as the possession of the goods themselves; 1 Wall. 166; 9 Bosw. 660; Story, Ag. § 111.

A particular lien is a right to retain the property of another on account of labor employed or money expended on that specific property.

A general lien is a right to retain the property of another on account of a general balance due from the owner. 3 B. & P. 494.

Of course, where a general lien exists, a particular lien is included.

Particular liens constitute the oldest class of liens, and the one most favored by the common law; 4 Burr. 2221; Dougl. 87; 3 B. & P. 126. But courts ceased to originate liens at an early period; 9 East 426; while general liens have been looked upon with jealousy, being considered encroachments upon the common law and founded solely in the usage of and for the benefit of trade; 3 B. & P. 42, 26, 494.

Liens either exist by law, arise from usage, or are created by express agreement.

Liens which exist by the common law generally arise in cases of bailment. Thus, a particular lien exists when goods are delivered to a handicraftsman of any sort for the execution of the purposes of his trade upon them; see infra; or where a person is, from the nature of his occupation, under a legal obligation to receive and be at trouble or expense about the personal property of another; 3 B. & P. 42; 3 Vt. 245; 5 B. & Ald. 350.

A lien sometimes arises where there is no bailment, as the maritime liens such as salvage, and a finder's lien for a reward, as to both of which, see infra. But this principle does not apply, generally, it is said, to the preservation of things found upon land, where no reward is offered; 2 H. Bl. 254; 2 W. Bl. 1107; 7 Barb. 113; 4 Watts 63; 10 Johns. 102; Story, Bailm. § 621, note a.

Liens which arise by usage are usually general liens, and the usage is said to be either the general usage of trade, or the particular usage of the parties; 3 B. & P. 119; 4 Burr. 2222; 1 Atk. 228; Amb. 252.

The usage must be so general that the party delivering the goods may be presumed to have known it, and to have made the right of lien a part of the contract; 4 C. & P. 152; 3 B. & P. 50. And it is said that the lien must be for a general balance arising from similar transactions between the parties, and the debt must have accrued in the business of the party claiming the lien; 1 W. Bl. 651; and it seems that more decisive proof of general usage is required in those occupations in which the workmen are required to receive their employment when offered them, such as carriers; 6 Term 14; 6 East 519. But where a general lien has been once established, the courts will not allow it to be disturbed; 1 Esp. 109.

A general lien from particular usage between the parties is presumed from proof of their having before dealt upon that basis; 6 Term 19. If a debtor, who has already pledged property to secure a loan, borrow a further sum, the lien is for the whole debt; 3 Vern. 691.

Lien, general or particular, may be created by express agreement of parties; Cro. Car. 271; 6 Term 14; as when property is delivered under such agreement for repair or the execution of any purpose upon it or in case of pawns; 2 Kent 637. And an agreement among tradesmen to require such lien, if known to the bailor, will bind him as by a lien of this kind. A tradesman obliged to accept employment from all comers cannot by mere notice create such lien by implication; express assent must be proved; 3 B. & P. 42; 5 B. & Ald. 350.

LIENS EXISTING BY THE COMMON LAW, IN THE ABSENCE OF ANY SPECIAL AGREEMENT. Every bailor for hire who has, by his labor or skill, conferred value on specific chattels bailed to him for that purpose has a particular lien upon them; 2 W. & S. 892; 8 Selw. N. P. 1163; 6 Term 14; 96 Pa. 486; 95 id. 845; 26 Miss. 182; 4 Wend. 292; 60 Wis. 26; 4 N. J. L. 105; so also have wharfingers; 7 B. & C. 212; 48 N. Y. 554; 2 Gall. 489; warehousemen; 18 Ill. 286; 18 Ark. 437; 1 Minn. 406; 31 Miss. 261; 84 E. L. & Eq. 116; see 26 Abb. N. C. 134; who are entitled to a lien on goods remaining in the warehouse for a general balance of storage due on all goods stored under a single contract; 53 Fed. Rep. 401; dyers and tailors; Cro. Car. 271; 9 East 483; 4 Burr. 2214; but a tailor making cloth into clothing as a sub-contractor, under a contract with one who received the cloth from the owner, has no lien on the clothing for his services; 174 Pa. 119; the finder of lost property for which a reward is offered; 3 Metc. 352; 8 Gill 213; 7 Barb. 118; 52 Pa. 484; a vendor of goods, for the price, so long as he retains possession; 1 H. Bla. 363; 8 H. L. Cas. 338; 6 McLean 472; 58 Wis. 388; 36 W. Va. 391; 131 U. S. 287; Benj. Sales, § 796; pawners, from the very nature of their contract; 15 Mass. 408; 3 Vt. 309; 9 Wend. 845; 3 Mo. 219; 39 Me. 45; but only where the pawnor has authority to make such pledge; 2 Campb. 836, n. A pledge, even where the pawnor is innocent, does not bind the owner, unless the pawnor has authority to make the pledge; 1 Mas. 440; 4 Johns. 103; 1 M. & S. 140; 20 How. 848; 98 Mass. 803; 57 Ga. 274; see, as to stock, 4 Allen 272; 100 Mass. 382; 48 Cal. 99. The pawnor does not have a general lien; 15 Mass. 490; 27 La. Ann. 110; 37 N. Y. 540; and he does not lose his particular lien by a re-delivery for a special and limited purpose; 47 Ill. 198; 18 C. B. N. s. 815; 12 Gray 465. Other liens recognized with respect to the particular property which is the subject matter of the dealings between the parties are as follows:

Common carriers, for transportation of goods; 6 East 519; Wr. Ohio 216; 25 Wis. 241; 1 Minn. 301; 51 Ala. 512; 10 Wall. 15; 104 Mass. 156; 43 Me. 438; but not if the goods are taken tortiously from the owner's possession, where the carrier is innocent; 1 Dougl. Mich. 1; 5 Cush. 187; 6 Whart. 418; 1 B. & Ad. 450; nor if the carrier transport them for a mere hire; 107 Mass. 126. Part of the goods may be detained for the whole freight of goods belonging to the same person; 6 East 622. A carrier has a lien on baggage for the fare of the passenger, which includes the transportation of both; Sto. Bailm. § 604; Hutoh. Car. § 719; 2 Campb. 681; 30 Fed. Rep. 94. In the last case it was held by Dady, J., that this lien extended so far as to warrant the detention of the baggage to enforce the payment of an additional fare for the last part of the journey, covered by the ticket, charged by the conductor after the passenger had stopped over without permission; but this decision is challenged by Professor Ewell, in a note which collects and reviews cases considered as bearing upon the question; 28 Am. L. Reg. N. s. 293. If property is damaged while in charge of a common carrier to a greater amount than the bill for freight, his lien is extinguished; 88 S. C. 78. The lien of a carrier and warehouseman for keeping property is superior to that of a pledgee who has secured the property to be transported and stored; 53 Minn. 327. Where a company refuses to deliver freight to the proper owner or consignee, on the ground that it has a lien thereon for freight charges and storage, and the owner resorts to a suit to recover possession of the property, it cannot claim judgment on the ground that it has a lien for storage, where it has been decided that it had no lien for freight charges; 15 Blatchf. 525.

The carriers' common law lien did not include any right of sale; 6 East 21; 20 Wend. 267; but the right to the lien is recognized and a power of sale given by statute in most states. In some states this right of sale is given to other bailees, as innkeepers, factors, etc. For the statutes on this subject see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 4353-6.

Innkeepers may detain a horse for his keep; 6 Term 141; 9 Pick. 280, 316, 332; though, perhaps, not if the person leaving him be not a guest; 69 Me. 499; 11 Barb. 41; but not sell him; Bacon. Abr. Inns (D); 8 Mod. 178; 8 Gray 383; Schoul. Lib. 294; except by custom of London and Exeter; F. Moo. 876; but see supra; and cannot retake the horse or any other goods on which he has a lien, after giving them up; 8 Mod. 178; Metc. Yelv. 67; L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 494. They may detain the goods of a traveller, but not of a boarder; 43 Vt. 30; 27 Misc. 202; L. R. 7 Q. B. 711; 36 La. 651; 8 Rich. S. C. 423; 52 Minn. 516. See, generally, 1 Smith, L. Cas., 9th Am. ed. 253, 259. The innkeeper's common law lien is now generally regulated by statutes, many of which also confer on boarding-house keepers all the privileges of innkeepers; 43 N. H. 332; 42 Barb. 628; 27 Wis. 406; 110 Mass. 158. See 52 N. J. L. 277. For reference to these statutes see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 4393. An innkeeper's lien is a particular lien; 9 East 433; Cro. Car. 271; 2 E. D. Sm. 195; it attaches to goods in the possession of his guest, though they belong to a stranger, provided the innkeeper has no notice of such fact; 52 Minn. 516; 13 Or. 493; but if he owes the guest for labor more than she does for board, he has no lien; 3 Colo. App. 519. Where a husband and wife were guests at a hotel, although credit was given to the husband who made payments on account, yet the wife's luggage which was her separate property, was subject to a lien for the balance of the hotel bill; 25 Q. B. Div. 491. See a full note on the innkeeper's lien, 21 L. R. A. 229. In holding that an innkeeper has a lien on goods which a traveller brings to the inn as luggage, the English court of appeal said that it would not disturb a well-known and very large business carried on in England for centuries, by holding otherwise; [1895] 2 Q. B. 601.

Agistors of cattle and livery-stable keepers have no lien; Cro. Car. 271; 7 Gray 183; 35 Me. 153; 28 Cal. 844; 36 Vt. 220; 78 N. C. 96; 6 East 509; except by statute; 3 Colo. App. 385; 66 Hun 827; 34 Neb. 483; 19 Or. 317; 63 Vt. 436.

An agistor's lien cannot be based upon a breach of the contract of agistment; 58 Mo. App. 1; and when the owner of stock allows it to remain in the hands of the agistor longer than the contract time, the latter may claim a lien for their keeping during such term; id. One who boards a horse under contract with a person not the owner thereof has no right to a lien unless it is shown that such person had authority to act for the owner; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 525. Persons who have been held entitled to a lien for keeping animals are: ranchmen; 7 Mont. 865; stable keeper; 155 Mass. 481; 28 Mo. App. 566; but not a groom merely employed to take charge of the horse; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 203. Such lien accrues only to one in possession; 57 Conn. 547; s. c. 6 L. R. A. 83; 46 Ohio St. 560; 12 Wash. 46; 43 Minn. 148; 89 Ia. 850; 28 Ill. App. 815; contra, see 28 Mo. App. 617. One wrongfully converting an animal to his own use has no lien; 44 Kan. 543; nor one receiving from a bailee with notice; 41 Mo. App. 416. A liveryman's lien, under the Pennsylvania act, 1807, for boarding a horse does not extend to a carriage and harness kept with it; 14 Lanc. L. Rev. Pa. 255. This lien depends solely upon statutes; 64 Minn. 472.

Factors, brokers, and commission agents, on goods and papers; 3 Term 119; 1 Johns. Cas. 437, n.; 8 Wheat. 268; 28 Vt. 118; 34 Me. 532; 150 Pa. 481; 38 W. Va. 158; on part of the goods for the whole claim; 6 East 622; or on the proceeds of sale of the goods; 5 B. & Ald. 27; 72 Ill. 226; 15 Mass. 389; but only for such goods as come to them as factors; 11 E. L. & Eq. 528; but not such as are delivered directly by the owner to the purchaser and do not come into possession of the factor; 149 Ill. 9; s. c. 25 L. R. A. 746. If a factor disobey instructions he loses his lien upon money deposited with him as security; 40 Ill. 313; 114 id. 196.

Bankers, on all securities left with them by their employers; 5 Term 438; 1 How. 234; 8 Ill. 233; see 180 U. S. 854. But see also 11 Pa. 291. But not on securities collateral to a specific loan; L. R. 4 App. Cas. 413; 47 Barb. 395; 137 Mass. 263; or for debts not due; 98 Ill. 558; 74 N. Y. 467; or on the account of a firm for the debt of a partner; 35 N. Y. 320; 11 Beav. 546.

The lien of mechanics and material men upon a building or improvement in the construction of which labor or material is used, exists only by virtue of the statutes creating it; 22 Neb. 126. See Mechanics' Lien, infra.

As to the lien of attorneys and other court officers for fees, see Attorneys' Lien, infra.

As to liens on the assets of insolvent persons or corporations for wages of labor or service, which are purely statutory, having no relation to the common law idea of lien, see LABORER.

REQUISITES. There must have been a delivery of the property into the possession of the party claiming the lien, or his agent; 3 Term 119; 6 East 25, n.

Where a person, in pursuance of the authority and directions of the owner of property, delivers it to a tradesman for the execution of the purposes of his trade upon it, the tradesman will not have a general lien against the owner for a balance due from the person delivering it, if he knew that the one delivering was not the real owner; 1 East 835; 2 Campb. 218. Thus, a carrier, who, by the usage of trade, is to be paid by the consignor, has no lien for a general balance against the consignee; 5 B. & P. 64. Nor can a claim against the consignee destroy the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu; 3 B. & P. 43. But a particular lien may undoubtedly be derived through the acts of agents acting within the scope of their employment; 9 East 238; 8 B. & P. 119. And the same would be true of a general lien against the owner for a balance due from him.

No lien exists where the party claiming it acquires possession by wrong; 3 Term 485; or by misrepresentation; 1 Campb. 12; or by his unauthorized and voluntary act; 8 Term 810, 610; 2 H. Bla. 254; 3 W. Bla. 1117 (but see 4 Burr. 2318).

Or where the act of the servant or agent delivering the property is totally unauthorized, and the pledge of it is tortious against the owner, whether delivered as a pledge or for the execution of the purposes of a trade thereupon; 5 Ves. 111; 6 East 17.

A delivery by a debtor for the purpose of preferring a creditor will not be allowed to operate as a delivery sufficient for a lien to attach; 4 Burr. 2389; 3 Ves. 85; 2 Campb. 579; 11 East 846.

A mere creditor happening to have in his possession specific articles belonging to his debtor, has no lien upon them; 15 Mass.

490; nor is a lien created by advancing money to enable a purchaser of land to complete his purchase; 3 Johns. Ch. 86; 6 G. & J. 4; nor by an advancement of money to an administrator to pay debts of the intestate; 4 Ohio 495; the owner of land has no lien on property cast upon it by drift; 16 Pa. 393. A lien cannot be created upon a mere right of action for a personal tort; 53 Minn. 349. No lien upon a particular fund is acquired by a creditor by reason of a promise to pay a debt out of it; 18 Wend. 319; nor upon land by the promise to pay out of the proceeds of its sale; 46 Ill. App. 541. Nor can parties contract to extend the area of property to be covered by a lien; 149 U. S. 574. A mere loan or advancement of money to pay the debt of another creates no lien; 72 La. 550; 47 Ark. 111; 124 Ind. 545. See 9 L. R. A. 173, note; SUBROGATION. At common law a corporation has no lien upon the stock of one of its members for an indebtedness due to it by him; 50 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 575; 15 Ore. 413; but see 99 Pa. 513; 75 Va. 327; 77 id. 445, in which cases such lien seems to have been enforced under general statutes. By-laws creating such lien are common and are valid; 23 N. J. Eq. 325; 61 Mo. 319; 58 Miss. 421; 48 Ia. 339; 9 R. I. 308; 2 Sawy. 103; 3 Cliff. 429; not, however, against innocent purchasers; 18 Wall. 539; 59 N. Y. 96; 103 Pa. 488; 63 Cal. 359; 8 Mo. App. 249; 33 La. Ann. 1298. A statutory lien of a corporation on its stock for debts due by a stockholder is good against all the world. A sale of the stock to an innocent third party does not discharge it; 73 N. W. (Minn.) 635. Such is declared to be "the weight of authority" by a work which is itself an authority; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 1032.

WAIVER. Possession is a necessary element of common-law liens; and if the creditor once knowingly parts with it after the lien attaches, the lien is gone; 5 Ohio 89; 6 East 25, n.; 42 Me. 50; 2 Edw. Ch. 181; 5 Binn. 398; 4 Denio 498; 42 Me. 50; 11 Cush. 231; 2 Swan 561; 23 Vt. 217; 48 Fed. Rep. 480; Benj. Sales § 799; Trickett. Liens 11, 16, 616; the abandonment of his privilege by a vendor need not be in absolute terms, but it is enough if it can be inferred from the acts of the parties; 40 La. Ann. 615. Parting with possession, if consistent with the contract, the course of business, and the intention of the parties, will not discharge a lien created by a contract; 32 Me. 211. There may be a special agreement extending the lien, though not to affect third persons; 30 Wend. 467. Delivery may be constructive; Amb. 252; and so may possession; 5 Ga. 153. A lien cannot be transferred; 8 Pick. 73; but property subject to it may be delivered to a third person, as to the creditor's servant, with notice, so as to preserve the lien of the original creditor; 2 East 529. But it must not be delivered to the owner or his agent; 2 East 529; 4 Johns. 103. But if the property be of a perishable nature, possession may be given to the owner under proper agreements; 8 Term 190. Generally a delivery of part of goods sold is not equivalent to a delivery of the whole, so as to destroy the vendor's lien, but the lien will remain on the part retained for the price of the whole, if the intention to separate the goods delivered from the rest is manifest; Benj. Sales § 805. A grantor's lien on the premises conveyed for the purchase price is a personal privilege not assignable with the debt, nor can the creditor of the grantor be subrogated to the same; 89 Fed. Rep. 89; 78 Ga. 173; 128 Ill. 178. See 84 Ala. 281.

Neglect to insist upon a lien, in giving reasons for a refusal to deliver property on demand, has been held a waiver; 1 Campb. 410, n.; 7 Ind. 21; 13 Ark. 437.

Where there is a special agreement made, or act done, inconsistent with the existence of the lien, such as an agreement to give credit, or where a distinct security is taken, or the possession of the property is acquired for another distinct purpose, and for that only, or where the property is attached by the creditor, no lien arises; 3 Marsh. 339; 5 M. & S. 180; 8 N. H. 441; 17 Pick. 140; 4 Vt. 549; 10 Conn. 108. But such agreement must be clearly inconsistent with the lien; 1 Dutch. 443; 82 Me. 319. See 109 U. S. 702.

The only remedy or use of the lien at common law is to allow the creditor to retain possession of the goods; 88 Me. 438; 1 Mas. 319. And he may do this against assignees of the debtor; 1 Burr. 489.

A waiver of exemption by a debtor as to any lien will ensure to the benefit of all prior liens, on the principle that a debtor cannot alter the precedence settled by law; 124 Pa. 347.

ATTORNEY'S LIEN. This, under English law, was a lien for costs taxed in the cause. In the early cases the attorney or solicitor was put upon the same footing as other court officers, such as clerks who had alien on papers; 3 Ves. 25; Beames, Costs 311. The doctrine of attorney's lien as originally held was that it was confined to costs, and the plaintiff might settle the case in the absence of notice from the attorney; 4 Term 124; 13 Ves., Sumn. ed. 59, n.; there was also a lien on papers; 6 Madd. 66; but none on the fund; 4 id. 391. There were two classes of liens recognized, active and passive, the former being on the fund for costs, and the latter a right to retain papers; 4 Myl. & Cr. 354. The attorney was not dominus litis; 12 M. & W. 440; and his lien would not prevail over a garnishment; 1 H. & M. 171. In the United States many cases sustain the lien upon the fruits of the judgment for fees; 66 Ala. 29; 42 Ark. 402; 6 Fla. 214; 51 Conn. 105; 14 Ga. 89; 17 Kan. 20; 39 Minn. 373; 1 Heisk. 503; 16 W. Va. 378; 10 Wis. 112. Some cases sustain the lien for a fee agreed upon as being within the principle of the common law lien for costs; 51 N. Y. 140; 70 id. 98; but the lien is waived by consent to a payment to the client; 112 id. 157. Others recognize a retaining lien on papers; 128 Ill. 681; 10 Wall. 483; and as between solicitor and client for reasonable compensation on money collected; 105 U. S. 527; 71 Ia. 32; but none, in either of these cases, upon a judgment, or unliquidated damages; 5 Bush 601; or in an action of tort; 66 Me. 237.

In some states the cases sustain a statutory lien for fees; 10 Col. 228; paramount to set off; 88 Ind. 172; 10 Neb. 574; 15 Johns. 406; 1 Rich. 207; 40 Mich. 218; the lien binds money or papers in possession of the attorney for all professional services, but for them only; 56 id. 135.

In others, statutory liens are held to apply only to taxable fees; 69 Me. 381; 11 Mass. 238; and only after final judgment and execution issued; 103 id. 83. So in New York prior to the code, the common law lien was confined to taxed costs; 1 Paine & Duer, Prac. 190; and did not affect damages recovered until they came into his hands; 12 Wend. 261.

Some cases sustain a lien on papers for a general balance; 11 N. H. 163; and on the recovery in the cause, but not those due in other causes; 4 id. 347; 48 Fed. Rep. 145; others, for costs, but subordinate to set-off; 14 Vt. 247; and ineffective as against an assignment; id. 486.

Liens may be defeated by settlement; 39 Ga. 5; 21 Ia. 528; if there is no collusion; 41 Ill. 136.

The lien is denied absolutely in some states; 1 Bland 98; 49 Md. 48, 212; 44 Miss. 530; 18 Mo. 18; 35 Ohio St. 581; 3 Watts 387; though some cases, denying the lien, hold that fees may be deducted from money in hand; 19 Pa. 95; 30 Tex. 180; see 12 Op. Atty. Gen. 216; but in another case it was said that in the absence of an express agreement, an attorney's lien is not acquired upon a judgment rendered in a suit prosecuted by him, nor upon the money recovered by means of his legal services; 163 Ill. 684.

An attorney has a lien on land for sums expended for his client's benefit in obtaining full title; 48 La. Ann. 54; but not for fees in maintaining title; 40 id. 135; also on a judgment in favor of defendant for costs; 16 Miss. Rep. 515; and the attorney of a stockholder in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by the officers of the corporation, has a lien for his fees on the property recovered; 93 Tenn. 691; also on money collected for his client until paid the general balance due him for his services; 66 Vt. 510. An attorney for plaintiff in an action by an administrator to recover damages for the death of his intestate has a lien on the amount recovered; 78 Hun 575; but one retained by a legatee to procure the establishment of a will has none, for his services, on the legacy to his client; 29 Fla. 476. In proceedings to compel an attorney to deliver up property where his claim is indefinite, a reference is properly ordered to ascertain the amount, giving plaintiff the option of making a deposit sufficient to secure whatever amount may be established on the reference, and he is not deprived of his lien simply because his claim is indefinite; 66 Hun 626; 137 N. Y. 605. An equitable lien is acquired by an attorney where, by an agreement with the owner of property condemned for a city street, he procures an increase in the amount of damages awarded; 66 Hun 626. He has a lien upon the cause of action for agreed compensation, which attaches to the judgment and the proceeds thereof, superior to the rights of a receiver appointed in supplementary proceedings; 11 App. Div. N. Y. 236.

It has been held that an attorney has no lien, at common law, on his client's cause of action; 72 Fed. Rep. 555; or, independently of a statute, for services; 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 413; or in a proceeding by a guardian for the removal of funds of his ward to a foreign state, for fees incurred in the proceeding; 36 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 188. The lien cannot be asserted against money appropriated by a legislative act, while it is in the hands of the state treasurer; 40 Neb. 834. The attorney employed by a pledgee of notes, impounded in an equity suit, to sue on them at law, has no lien upon the fund realized, as against the other parties to the equity suit; 67 Fed. Rep. 857. An agreement on the settlement of certain cases that the fees of an attorney should be included in the fees to be paid in another case, if a judgment be recovered, does not create a lien on the judgment for fees on the cases settled; 59 Fed. Rep. 750. Where an attorney received money for bail, to be returned on final disposition of the charge, it was held that an attorney's lien did not exist on the money, his agreement being to return it on receiving it back from the magistrate; 24 Ore. 188.

An attorney's lien for services in procuring a judgment is limited to the attorney of record and does not extend to attorneys employed to assist him; 59 Fed. Rep. 750; nor does it extend to prospective services; 48 id. 145.

An attorney whose services are employed merely in defending the title to land has no lien upon the land for his services; 56 Ark. 324; nor is there a lien on land recovered; 36 W. Va. 200. The attorney for defendant is not entitled to any lien so as to prevent a settlement by defendant, where the answer simply sets up a defence and not a counterclaim; 16 App. Div. N. Y. 70. And the right of an attorney to a lien on his client's papers is lost by the substitution of another attorney in his place on his refusal to go on with the case without the payment of fees which he claims to have already earned; 16 App. Div. N. Y. 126. No lien can accrue in favor of the attorney for plaintiff where the action is settled by plaintiff before defendant has notice of the attorney's claim for a lien; 50 Neb. 878. But acceptance of a client's note for his fee is not a waiver of his statutory lien; 86 Ga. 138.

Where an attorney having a lien on a judgment takes an assignment thereof to himself, and claims the absolute ownership of the judgment, he relinquishes whatever rights he might have been entitled to by virtue of his lien; 43 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 1042; and taking an independent security to secure payment of his fee waives his lien, even though the security proves unavailable; 7 Houst. 183.

It has been held that, where a judgment requires the claim of an intervening creditor of the plaintiff to be first paid out of the amount for which the plaintiff has judgment, the right of the creditor is superior to the lien of an attorney: 65 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 413. An attorney's lien is subordinate to the right of the adverse party to any proper set-off, or other available defenses: 44 Neb. 900; 3 S. D. 477.

Equitable Liens are such as exist in equity, and of which courts of equity alone take cognizance.

A court of equity will raise equitable liens for the purpose of justice, and if a lien could not be created otherwise, could even make a company execute a conveyance for that purpose; 3 Hughes 320.

A lien is neither a ius in re nor a ius ad rem; it is not property in the thing, nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing. It more properly constitutes a charge upon the thing. In regard to these liens, it may be generally stated that they arise from constructive trusts. They are, therefore, wholly independent of the possession of the thing to which they are attached as an incumbrance; and they can be enforced only in courts of equity; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1215.

An equitable lien on a sale of realty is very different from a lien at law; for it operates after the possession has been changed, and is available by way of charge instead of detainer. Ad. Eq. 127.

Every express executory agreement in writing, whereby the contracting party sufficiently indicates an intention to make some particular property, real or personal, or fund therein identified, a security for a debt or other obligation, or whereby the party promises to convey, assign, or transfer the property as security, creates an equitable lien upon the property so indicated which is enforceable against the property; 30 W. Va. 790.

VENDOR'S LIEN. First in importance among equitable liens is the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money. The principle upon which it rests is that where a conveyance is made prematurely before payment of the price, the purchase money is a charge on the estate in the hands of the vendee; 4 Kent 151; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1217; Bishp. Eq. 353; 15 Ves. 329; 1 Bro. C. C. 420, 424, n. There has been some discussion as to its exact nature and whether it is to be classed in any sense as an implied trust, but the more reasonable view seems to be that it is not, at least in such sense as to carry with it the idea of any title, but that it is strictly a mere charge, the true nature of which perhaps cannot be better expressed than by the use of the term equitable lien. "The principle upon which such a lien rests has been held to be that one who gets the estate of another ought not, in conscience, to be allowed to keep it without paying the consideration." 147 U. S. 133. As to the nature and origin of the lien see also 1 Bishp. Eq. 354; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1219; 2 Sugd. Vend. & P. 876; 1 Mas. 191; 1 Pingr. Mort. 319; 1 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. 866; 118 Mass. 261; 22 Am. St. Rep. 279.

"No other single topic belonging to the equity jurisprudence has occasioned such a diversity and even discord of opinion among the American courts as this of the grantor's lien. Upon nearly every question that has arisen as to its operation, its waiver or discharge, the parties against whom it avails, and the parties in whose favor it exists, the decisions in the different states and even sometimes in the same state, are directly conflicting." 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1251.

Unless waived the lien remains till the whole purchase money is paid; 15 Ves. 329; 1 Vern. 267.

In order to create a vendor's lien there must be a fixed amount of unpaid purchase money due to the vendor. A vendee's obligation to a vendor on a collateral covenant made at the time of a purchase will not give rise to a vendor's lien, unless the vendor expressly reserves such a lien in his deed; 36 Fed. Rep. 577.

A grantor's lien on the premises conveyed, for the purchase price, is a personal privilege not assignable with the debt; nor can the creditor of the grantor be subrogated to the same; 39 Fed. Rep. 89; 78 Ga. 173; 128 Ill. 178; but see 84 Ala. 281; 4 N. Mex. 347; 70 Tex. 132; 87 Tenn. 41. The lien exists against all the world except bona fide purchasers without notice; 1 Johns. Ch. 308; 9 Ind. 490; 12 R. L. 92; it is good against the land in the hands of heirs or subsequent purchasers with notice; 3 Russ. 498; 1 Sch. & L. 135; against assignees in bankruptcy; 2 H. R. 183; 1 Bro. Ch. 420; and whether the estate is actually conveyed or only contracted to be conveyed; 2 Dick. Ch. 730; 12 Ad. & E. 632. But as a general rule the lien does not prevail against the creditors of the purchaser; 7 Wheat. 46; 10 Barb. 626; 2 Sugd. Vend. & P. (681)n.; but whether it will do so it is said "depends upon the relative equities and rights of the disputants in comparison with one another." 1 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. 374; and see 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1228. See, as to assignability, 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 393, where the cases are collected by states. The question is involved in too much confusion for any successful effort to state a general rule.

The doctrine of vendor's lien, firmly settled in England, has been received with varying degrees of favor in the United States, some of them refusing to accept it. This would be in accord with the disfavor shown in this country to secret liens which has naturally resulted from the universal habit of requiring title papers and charges on real estate to be matters of record. In a general way the American cases may be grouped as follows: (1) Those which follow the English doctrine of Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, sustaining the lien as already defined. In this class are included a majority of the states, though it is to be noted that in the classification of states frequently made with reference to this subject, there is a failure to note an important distinction between those states where the lien is recognized before a conveyance, and those in which the English doctrine is carried to its fullest extent and a grantor's lien sustained. A careful examination of the cases would probably leave the states which go to this extent in a considerable minority, as the lien is frequently recognized in favor of a vendor who has only executed a contract of sale and put the vendee in possession; 29 Neb. 672; 3 Ired. Eq. 117; while the lien is not recognized after a deed; id. 182. So in a state usually included among those recognizing the lien; 14 Ore. 268; it has been recently held that "where real estate is granted by absolute deed, followed by delivery of possession to the grantee, no implied equitable lien for the unpaid purchase money remains in the grantor;" 45 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 290. (2) The implied vendor's lien is abolished by statute in Vermont, Iowa, Virginia, West Virginia, and Georgia. It is recognized and process provided for it in Tennessee, California, the Dakotas, Louisiana, and Arizona. And in Arkansas and Alabama the lien passes to an assignee of the note or bond for purchase money; 1 8tims. Am. Stat. L. § 1950. (3) The doctrine has been expressly disavowed in several states; 29 Me. 410; 13 Kan. 245; 49 Pa. 9; 2 Dessaus. 509; 10 R. L. 334; 118 Mass. 261; 44 N. H. 102; 17 Conn. 575. In Delaware the question remains without direct decision but with judicial expressions strongly adverse; 1 Harring. 69; 3 Del. Ch. 189; 36 Fed. Rep. 860. (4) The federal courts recognize and enforce the lien "if in harmony with the jurisprudence of the state in which the case is brought;" 147 U. S. 133. Classifications of cases in the state courts on this subject may be found in Bishp. Eq. § 353, notes; 1 Pingr. Mortg. 318, notes; Tiedm. R. P. 292, notes; 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 393.

In a rather unusual case, it was held that where a vendee, as a consideration, assumes debts of the vendor and settles them at a compromise, the vendor has a lien for the amount of the rebate; 150 Ill. 212.

Waiver. The lien may be waived by agreement; but postponement of the day of payment is not a waiver, not being inconsistent with the nature of the lien; nor taking personal security; Ad. Eq. 128; 1 Johns. Ch. 308; 2 Humphr. 248; 1 Mas. 192; 2 Ohio 883; 1 Blackf. 246; 8 Ga. 333; 1 Ball & B. 514. An acknowledgment of the payment of the purchase-money in the body of the deed, or by a receipt, will not operate as a waiver or discharge of the vendor's lien if the purchase-money has not in fact been paid; 30 N. J. Eq. 569; 50 Ala. 228; 29 Ark. 857. Taking the note or other personal security of the vendee payable at a future day is generally held merely a means of payment, and not a security destroying the lien; 1 Sch. & L. 135; 2 V. & B. 306; 12 W. Va. 575; 50 Ala. 84; 26 N. J. Eq. 311; 44 Miss. 508; 25 Ark. 510; 21 Vt. 271; 1 Johns. Ch. 308. Where notes were taken of which part were not due and of those due payment had been made or tendered there was no vendor's lien; 24 Ore. 212. And if it be the note of a third party, or an independent security on real estate, it would generally be a waiver; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1226, n.; 4 Kent 151; 4 Wheat. 290; 1 Mas. 212; 4 Mo. App. 292; 67 Ill. 599; 10 R. L. 334; 10 Heisk. 477; 43 Miss. 570; 46 Texas 204; 30 Md. 422; 20 Ohio 544; 15 Ind. 435; 16 N. H. 592; 17 Cal. 70; 2 Mich. 243; 4 N. Y. 312; 66 Mo. 44. And, generally, the question of relinquishment will turn upon the facts of each case; 3 Russ. Ch. 488; 3 Sugd. Vend. c. 18; 8 J. J. Marsh. 553. As to waiver see 4 West. Rep. 783; extinguishment, see 14 Am. St. Rep. 61; estoppel, 5 Cent. L. J. 221.

See, generally, Herman, Mortg.; Miller, Eq. Mortg.; Perry, Trusts § 232; 2 Washb. R. P. 509, n. 6; EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

OTHER EQUITABLE LIENS. In a case analogous to the vendor's lien, where money has been paid prematurely before conveyance made, the purchaser and his representatives have a lien; 3 Y. & J. 264; 11 Price 58; 1 P. Wms. 278.

So where the purchase money has been deposited in the hands of a third person, to cover incumbrances; 1 T. & T. 469; 1 Ves. 478. Yet a lien will not be created for a third party, who was to receive an annuity under a covenant as a part of the consideration for the conveyance; 3 Sim. 499; 1 M. & K. 297; 2 Keen 81.

The deposit of the title-deeds of an estate gives an equitable lien on the estate; 4 Bro. C. C. 269; s. c. 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 931; L. R. 3 P. C. C. 209; Bishp. Eq. 357; without any express agreement either by parol or in writing. But not when the circumstances of the deposit were such as to show that no such lien was intended; 36 Beav. 27. This equitable lien has been recognized in 2 Sandf. Ch. 9; 2 Hill, Ch. 106; 12 Wiso. 413; 10 Sm. & M. 418; but denied in 2 Disn. 9; 1 Rawle 325. See 8 B. Monr. 435; 18 N. J. Eq. 104. This lien is not favored, and is confined strictly to an actual, immediate, and bona fide deposit of the title deeds with the creditor, as a security, in order to create the lien; 12 Ves. 197; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; 4 Kent 150. It would not be valid under the recording acts as against a bona fide purchaser from the owner of the title, without notice.

One who has a lien for the same debt on two funds, on one only of which another person has a lien, may be compelled in equity by the latter to resort first to the other fund for satisfaction; 8 Ves. 388; 1 Johns. Ch. 318; 1 Story, Eq. § 633; but not where there are prior liens on both funds; 184 Pa. 818.

When a single lien covers several parcels of land, such of them as still belong to the real debtor will be primarily charged, to the exoneration of lands transferred to third parties; and if the purchasers are called upon to pay, they will be charged successively in the reverse order of time of transfers to them; 5 Johns. Ch. 440; 1 Pa. 275; but see contra, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1238.

One joint tenant has, in many cases, a lien on the common estate for repairs put on by himself above his share of the liability; 1 Ball & B. 199; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1236; Sugd. Vend. 611.

And equity applies this principle even to cases where a tenant for life makes permanent improvements in good faith; 1 Sm. & S. 353. So where a party has made improvements under a defective title; 6 Madd. 2; 9 Mod. 11.

An agreement between two legatees whereby one purchases the interest of the other and agrees that the executor shall hold his own interest in the estate as security for the payment of the consideration, and shall pay to the vendee any sum due under the will to the vendee, creates an equitable lien on the personal property or its proceeds, to which the vendee is entitled under the will, but not on the real estate; 20 S. Rep. (Ala.) 456.

So, too, there is a lien where property is conveyed inter vivos, or is bequeathed or devised by last will and testament, subject to a charge for the payment of debts; or to other charges in favor of third persons; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1244. A distinction must be kept in mind between a devise in trust to pay certain sums, and a devise subject to charges.

An equitable lien may be given by express contract upon future property; 50 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 546; but it is not created by a mere promise to pay a debt from a particular fund if it should ever come into existence; 78 Fed. Rep. 417.

An acknowledgment in a deed to a firm that a judgment in favor of the grantor against a member of the firm is to stand against a fractional portion of the property conveyed, creates a lien by deed; 38 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 519.

A covenant to convey and settle lands does not give the covenantee a lien; but was held to do so in case of a covenant to settle lands in lieu of dower; 3 Bro. Ch. 489; 1 Ves. 451; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 471.

A court of equity cannot create a lien upon lands to secure a party for a breach of contract, whether under seal or not, when there is no agreement for a lien between the parties; 74 Mich. 57.

A bargain and sale of personal property, accompanied by delivery, divests the vendor of any lien for payment, unless such lien is secured by chattel mortgage or by agreement between the parties; 131 U. S. 287.

An equitable lien upon real estate does not result from the sale of personal property, even though it is used in the erection of buildings thereon; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 910. As to equitable liens on personality, see 14 Cent. L. J. 42; on chattels, 19 id. 2, 24.

Where the owner of an equity of redemption in mortgaged lands agreed to charge a certain lot with the payment of two mortgages held upon other property, and agreed to execute proper mortgages on said land, or to pay off the mortgage already given, the agreement created an equitable charge in favor of the mortgages named in the instrument; 26 Can. S. C. R. 41.

The holder of a mere equitable lien cannot compel the owner of the legal estate to account for the rents and profits received by him while occupying the premises; 88 Me. 479.

The holder of the legal title to land cannot, by private sale to a corporation having the right of eminent domain, defeat inchoate liens which would otherwise attach as the result of legal proceedings; 109 Ala. 448.

As to equitable liens generally, see Jones, Liens; 35 Alb. L. J. 188; 4 L. R. A. 247.

Maritime Liens. Maritime liens do not include or require possession. The word lien is used in maritime law, not in the strict legal sense in which we understand it in courts of common law, in which case there could be no lien where there was no possession, actual or constructive; but to express, as if by analogy, the nature of claims which neither presuppose nor originate in possession; 22 E. L. & Eq. 62. See 15 Boet. Law Rep. 555; 16 id. 1, 264; Ben-

Adm. § 271. A distinction is made in the United States between qualified maritime liens, which depend upon possession, and absolute maritime liens, which do not require nor depend upon possession; 7 How. 739; 21 Am. Law Reg. 1. The sole essentials of admiralty jurisdiction in a suit in rem for breach of contract are that the contract is maritime and that the property proceeded against is within the lawful custody of the court. The existence of a maritime lien is not jurisdictional, but is a matter going to the merits; 108 U. S. 137. To sustain a maritime lien there must be, either in fact or by presumption of law, a credit of the ship; 60 Fed. Rep. 766.

The shipper of goods has a lien upon the ship, for the value of the goods sent, which can be enforced in admiralty; 1 Blatchf. & H. 300; 22 How. 491; 3 Blatchf. 271, 289; and, generally, every act of the master binds the vessel, if it be done within the scope of his authority; 1 W. Rob. 392; 18 How. 132; where the possession of the master is not tortious, but under a color of right; 6 McLean 484. This does not apply to contracts of material men with the master of a domestic ship; 1 Conkl. Adm. 73; and the act must have been within the scope of the master's employment; 18 How. 132. See 1 C. Rob. 84. This lien follows the ship even in the hands of a purchaser, without notice, before the creditor has had a reasonable opportunity to enforce his lien; 1 Ware 188. If the master borrow money for the ship's necessity, the lender has a lien on the ship for the amount; 4 Dall. 225; 8 Me. 298; 36 Fed. Rep. 197. A sale of the vessel by the master through necessity cuts out the lien of the shipper of the cargo in the vessel; 6 Wall. 18.

The owner of a ship has a lien on the cargo carried for the freight earned, whether reserved by a bill of lading or not; 4 B. & Ald. 630; 6 Pick. 248; 5 Sandf. 97; 5 Ohio 88; 8 Wheat. 605; 2 W. & M. 178.

Where freight has been earned for the transportation of goods before the United States declares them forfeited for a fraudulent custom house entry, and sells them, the freight has a lien on the proceeds, if the vessel owners were innocent; 9 Fed. Rep. 595.

This lien is, at most, only a qualified maritime lien; see 1 Pars. Mar. Law 174, n. The lien exists in case of a chartered ship; 4 Cow. 470; 1 Paine 358; 4 B. & Ald. 630; 8 Wheat. 605; to the extent of the freight due under the bill of lading; 1 B. & Ald. 711; 1 Sumn. 551. But if the charterer takes possession and management of the ship, he has the lien; 8 Cra. 39; 6 Pick. 248; 4 Cow. 470; 4 M. & G. 502. No lien for freight attaches before the ship has broken ground; 1 B. & P. 634; 5 Binn. 392; 3 Gray 92. But see, as to the damages for removing goods from the ship before she sails, 28 E. L. & Eq. 210; 2 C. & P. 334; 2 Gray 92.

No lien exists for dead freight; 3 M. & S. 205. The lien attaches only for freight earned; 3 M. & S. 205; Ware 149. The lien is lost by a delivery of the goods; 38 Fed. Rep. 528; 34 id. 909; 6 Hill 43; but not if the delivery be involuntary or procured by fraud; id. So it is by stipulations inconsistent with its exercise; 17 How. 53; 10 Conn. 104; 6 Pick. 248; 4 B. & Ald. 50; as, by an agreement to receive the freight at a day subsequent to the entire delivery of the goods, a distinction being, however, taken between the unloading or arrival of the ship, and the delivery of the goods; 18 Johns. 157; 14 M. & W. 794; 3 Sumn. 589; 10 Mass. 510.

A third person cannot take advantage of the existence of such lien; 3 East 85. A vendor, before exercising the right of stoppage in transitu, must discharge this lien by payment of freight; 15 Me. 314; 3 B. & P. 42.

Master's lien. In England, the master had no lien, at common law, on the ship for wages, nor disbursements; 4 De Gex & J. 334; 1 B. & Ald. 576; 6 How. 112; 15 U. S. App. 229; but by the act of 1854 he has the same lien for his wages as a seaman; and this may be enforced in the admiralty courts of the United States; 22 Boet. L. Rep. 150; 9 Wall. 485; 8 Fed. Rep. 577; 7 id. 247, 674. The district court may, but is not bound to exercise jurisdiction in favor of a British subject against a British ship; 22 Boet. L. Rep. 150. Its enforcement is only a question of comity; 9 Wall. 485.

In the United States, he has no lien for his wages; 2 Paine 201; 14 Pa. 84; 18 Pick. 530; 36 Fed. Rep. 493. This does not apply to one not master in fact; see 198. As to lien for disbursements, see 2 Curt. C. C. 427; 14 Pa. 34; 11 Pet. 175. He may be substituted if he discharge a lien; 1 Pet. Adm. 228; see 116; 3 Mas. 255. But he has alien on the freight for disbursements; 4 Mas. 91; 5 Wend. 815; for wages in a peculiar case; Ware 149; and on the cargo, where it belongs to the ship-owners; 14 Me. 180. He may, therefore detain goods against the shipper or consignee, even after payment to owner, if the master give reasonable notice; 11 Mass. 72; 5 Wend. 815. But see 5 D. & R. 552. The master may retain goods till a contribution bond is signed; 11 Johns. 23; 11 Me. 150.

Admiralty has jurisdiction of a libel in rem by a master for his wages, where that lien is given by a state statute; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114.

The seamen's lien for wages attaches to the ship and freight, and the proceeds of both, and follows them into whosoever hands they come; 2 Sumn. 443; and lies against a part, or the whole, of the fund; 8 Sumn. 50, 286; but not the cargo; 5 Pet. 675. It applies to proceeds of a vessel sold, under attachment in a state court; 2 Wall. C. C. 592, overruling 1 Newb. 215; and to a vessel while in the hands of a receiver of a state court, for wages accruing during the receivership; 168 U. S. 437.

Seamen discharged by the breaking up of a voyage are entitled to no lien for services not performed, when they could have obtained other employment of like character and at as good or better wages; 37 Fed. Rep. 696.

This lien of a seaman is of the nature of the privilegium of the civil law, does not depend upon possession, and takes precedence of a bottomry bond or hypothecation; 2 Pars. Mar. Law 62, and cases cited; 15 Boet. L. Rep. 535; Ware 134; or over subsequent collision liens; 35 Fed. Rep. 665. Taking the master's order does not destroy the lien; Ware 185. And see 2 Hagg. Adm. 136. For services for bringing a vessel into port, moving her about, drying her sails, etc., there is a lien; 59 Fed. Rep. 299; but not for services of a watchman in the home port; 63 Fed. Rep. 236; nor for men hired to watch the cargo of a vessel, by a contractor; 58 Fed. Rep. 908. Generally, all persons serving in a way directly and materially useful to the navigation of the vessel have a lien for their services; Gilp. 505; 3 Hagg. Adm. 876; Ware 83; 1 Blatchf. & H. 423; 1 Sumn. 384. A woman has it if she performs seaman's service; 1 Hagg. Adm. 187; 18 Boet. L. Rep. 672; 1 Newb. 5. Men hired for service on a barge without sails, masts, or rudder, with no duties upon land except in loading and unloading, have a lien on the vessel; 36 Fed. Rep. 607. The lien exists against ships owned by private persons, but not against government ships employed in the public service; 9 Wheat. 409; 3 Sumn. 308. See as to lien for seamen's wages, 4 Can. L. T. 153, 218.

Under the law of England no maritime lien is recognized for personal injuries received by a seaman on board ship; 36 Fed. Rep. 773. The question is unsettled in America, as to whether admiralty has jurisdiction over actions for personal injuries, either in rem or even against the owner; Bened. Adm. § 800 a. See 119 U. S. 199.

A ship broker, who obtains a crew, has been held to have a lien for his services and advances for their wages; 1 Blatchf. & H. 189. One who performs towage service on the navigable waters of the United States acquires a lien, which may be enforced by proceedings in rem, and cannot be destroyed by the sale of the vessel under a state law;

9 Fed. Rep. 777.

Stevedores are said to have no lien; Olcott 120; 1 Wall. Jr. 370. A stevedore would not have it, for services on a vessel in the home port; 37 Fed. Rep. 209; id. 696; 30 id. 493; 81 id. 216; and see 35 id. 916; 59 id. 908; 6 C. C. App. 818; s. C. 57 Fed. Rep. 224; but would in other than the home port; 2 U. S. App. 349; it is said to be a maritime contract when the service is rendered in a foreign port. Benedict is of the opinion that the tendency of the authorities is now to favor a stevedore's lien. See Bened. Adm. § 265; but the latest decision is that in the home port they have not. See a critical review of the cases "incorporated" by the court in its opinion; 81 Fed. Rep. 216.

Material men. By the civil law those who build, repair, or supply a ship have a lien upon the ship for the debt thus contracted, but the courts of the common law do not recognize the lien as a maritime lien, but only recognize the common law lien of the mechanic who by virtue of his possession, and not otherwise, was allowed a lien; Bened. Adm. § 271. It is well settled that material men furnishing supplies and materials to a vessel in her home port do not thereby acquire any lien upon the vessel by the general maritime laws in the United States; 21 Wall. 558; 89 Me. 512; 43 U. S. App. 267; but admiralty will enforce a lien given by a state law; 21 Wall. 558; 52 Fed. Rep. 653. The supreme court has decided, 4 Wheat. 438, that unless the local law of the particular state where the supplies are furnished gives a lien, there is no lien in the case of domestic vessels; 94 U. S. 320. Material men are those whose trade it is to build, repair, or equip ships, or to furnish them with tackle and provisions necessary of any kind; see Bened. Adm. § 268; 3 Hagg. Adm. 129; 49 Fed. Rep. 888. In regard to foreign ships, it has been held that material men have a lien on the ship only when the supplies were necessary and could be obtained only on the credit of the ship; 19 How. 359; 13 Wall. 329; 61 Fed. Rep. 514; 79 Fed. Rep. 365; which must appear either in fact or by presumption of law; 60 id. 766. The lien for repairs continues only as long as possession is retained, on domestic ships; Wright (Ohio) 669; 4 Wheat. 488; 1 Story 68; and is gone if possession is lost; 14 Conn. 404; 4 Wheat. 488; 4 Wash. C. C. 453. When the supplies are furnished to a vessel in a foreign port by order of her master, a lien is implied, but for work done by order of the owner no lien will be held to exist unless proved by the agreement of the parties; 50 Fed. Rep. 844. Necessary supplies furnished to a vessel which has not obtained a registry in any port, at a port other than that which is the owner's residence, on the credit of the vessel, and not of the owner, are supplies furnished at a foreign port, for which a lien lies in admiralty; 81 Fed. Rep. 964; 9 Am. L. Rev. 638. There is a maritime lien for coal furnished to a foreign steamer at the wharf for daily use in the presence of the master; 75 Fed. Rep. 684; but not when supplied on the order of a charterer who was required by the charter to provide and pay for the coal and had an office at the port of supply; 165 U. S. 264.

The several states of the United States are foreign to each other in this respect. Where repairs are made at the home port of the owner, the maritime law of the United States gives no maritime lien, the rights of the parties being altogether governed by the local law. The liens given by the state laws have, however, been enforced by the federal courts, not as rights which they were bound to enforce, but as discretionary powers which they might lawfully exercise, when the controversies were within the admiralty jurisdiction; 1 Black 523; 21 Wall. 558; 95 U. S. 69; 1 Fed. Rep. 218; 3 id. 364; 8 id. 866. The state legislatures cannot create a maritime lien, nor can they confer jurisdiction upon a state court to enforce such a lien by a proceeding in rem; but they can authorize their enforcement by common-law remedies; Bened. Adm. 270; 4 Wall. 480, 571; 18 id. 534; 9 Am.

L. Rev. 638; 24 La. 192; 43 N. Y. 554; 21 Am. L. Rev. n. s. 88; 7 Am. L. Rev. n. s. 183. A lien under a state statute for repairs or supplies, furnished to a vessel in a home port is a right of property in the vessel and enforceable by process in rem exclusively in the federal district courts; 167 U. S. 806, reversing 157 Mass. 525. When a right, maritime in its nature and to be enforced by process in the nature of admiralty, has been given by the statute of a state, the admiralty courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction to enforce that right according to their own rules of procedure; 148 U. S. 1. When a lien is created by a general maritime law for repairs or supplies in a foreign port, the admiralty jurisdiction in rem of the courts of the United States is exclusive; 4 Wall. 411. That there is admiralty jurisdiction to enforce liens given by a state statute was also held in 38 Fed. Rep. 197; 40 id. 253; 46 id. 797; but see id. 136; 53 id. 599; 61 id. 860. And it is said that if a maritime lien upon a foreign vessel can be conferred by a state statute, a statute giving a lien for repairs, not furnished upon the credit of the vessel, cannot be enforced in a federal court of admiralty; 45 U. S. App. 18.

It is held by the Circuit Court of Appeals that a court of admiralty may entertain jurisdiction in rem against a vessel for the death of a passenger caused by a maritime collision; 70 Fed. Rep. 874. This right is based on a state statute giving not only a right of action for death, but a lien and preference over other demands in favor of such cause of action. This statutory provision distinguishes the case from 145 U. S. 835, where the right to a libel in rem in such case is denied, although the local law gave a right of action for death, but did not expressly create any lien on the vessel. See 1 L. R. A. 505.

As to the order of precedence of these liens, see DAVIS 199; Ware 565; 2 Curt. C. C. 421; 8 Fed. Rep. 331, 333. In the distribution of funds to pay liens, wages claims will rank first; claims for materials and supplies next; and claims under contracts of affreightment thereafter; 38 Fed. Rep. 493. Maritime liens for necessary advances made or supplies furnished to keep a vessel fit for sea, take precedence of all prior claims upon her, unless for seaman's wages or salvage; 148 U. S. 1. They take priority over a mortgage on the vessel, although it has been duly recorded; 86 Fed. Rep. 501. Liens for damages arising from collision take precedence of the lien for a seaman's wages accruing prior to the collision; 40 Fed. Rep. 331; 49 id. 577; 50 id. 224. Among the holders of liens equal in dignity, the one who first instituted proceedings to enforce his claim is preferred; 48 Fed. Rep. 885.

Giving credit will not be a waiver of a lien on a foreign ship, unless so given as to be inconsistent with the right to a lien; 7 Pet. 324; 1 Sumn. 78; 5 Sandf. 342; 4 Ben. 151. A delay of nine months after midsummer repairs before proceeding to enforce a lien therefor, is not laches, but a year's delay is; 35 Fed. Rep. 665; see 43 id. 889. A lien for repairs is in the nature of a proprietary right and is not lost by merely delivering the vessel to the owner before payment; 49 Fed. Rep. 388. A note does not extinguish the lien of the claim for which it is given, unless such is the understanding of the parties at the time; 20 Fed. Rep. 928; 50 id. 703; 60 id. 926; 8 U. S. App. 109.

Builders' liens may be placed on the common-law ground that a workman employing skill and labor on an article has a lien upon it; 2 Rose 91; 4 B. & Ald. 341; Wright (Ohio) 660; 4 Wheat. 438; 1 Stor. 68; also a lien for the purpose of finishing the ship, where payments are made by instalments; 5 B. & Ald. 942.

Collision. In case of collision the injured vessel has a lien upon the one in fault for the damage done; 23 E. L. & Eq. 62; Crabb 580; and the lien lasts a reasonable time; 18 Bos. L. Rep. 91; 1 Pars. Sh. & Ad. 531. A salvage lien exists when a ship or goods come into the possession of a person who preserves them from peril at sea, to be reimbursed his expenses and compensated; Sprague 57; Davis 20; Edw. Adm. 175.

A salvage service carries with it a maritime lien on the things saved, whether the vessel is foreign or domestic; 38 Fed. Rep. 671.

A part-owner, merely as such, has no lien whatever, but acquires such a lien when any of the elements of partnership or agency, with bailment upon which his lien may rest, enter into his relation with the other part-owners; 1 Pars. Sh. & Ad. 115. See 85 Fed. Rep. 785.

A part-owner who has advanced more than his share towards building a vessel has no lien on her for such surplus; 6 Pick. 46; and none, it is said, for advances on account of a voyage; 4 Pick. 456; 7 Bingham 709. The relation of partners must exist to give the lien; 20 Johns. 61; 4 B. Monr. 458; 8 B. & C. 612; 6 Pick. 120; 5 Mann. & R. 25. And part-owners of a ship may become partners for a particular venture; 1 Ves. Sr. 497; 3 W. & M. 193; 10 Mo. 701; 9 Pick. 334. But see 14 Pa. 34.

The ship's husband, if a partner, has a partner's lien; if not, he may have a lien on the proceeds of the voyage; 8 B. & C. 612; 16 Conn. 12, 23; 3 W. & M. 193; or of the ship herself, if sold, or on her documents, if any of these have come into his actual possession. And the lien applies to all disbursements and liabilities for the ship. But it is doubtful if his mere office gives him a lien; 2 Curt. C. C. 427; 2 V. & B. 243.

Under the general maritime law, there is no lien on a vessel for marine insurance premiums due from her owner; 49 Fed. Rep. 279; but there is for wharfage for a foreign vessel; 56 Fed. Rep. 609. See 60 id. 766.

Deposit of a bill of lading gives a lien for the amount advanced on the strength of the security; 5 Taunt. 558; 2 Wash. C. C. 283.

These liens of part-owners and by deposit of a bill of lading are not maritime liens, however, and could not be enforced in admiralty.

See ADMIRALTY; SALVAGE; JETTISON; BOTTOMRY; RESPONDENTIA; IN REM; COLLISION; SEAMEN; MARSHALLING OF ASSETS; MASTER; MARITIME CAUSE; MARITIME CONTRACT; CAPTAIN; PRIVILEGE.

Statutory Liens. Under this head it is convenient to consider some of those liens which subsist at common law, but have been extensively modified by statutory regulations, as well as those which subsist entirely by force of statutory regulations.

The principal liens of this class are judgment liens, and liens of material men and builders, but there have also been provided by legislation in recent years in many states, liens specially designed for the protection of leading local business interests, such as logging liens, and various agricultural liens intended to facilitate the obtaining of money or credit on the faith of crops unmaturing.

JUDGMENT LIEN. At common law, a judgment is merely a general security and not a specific lien on land; 2 Sugd. Vend. *517; but by stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, it is made a charge upon all lands, tenements, etc., of which the debtor is owner or in which he is in any way interested, and it binds all persons claiming under him after such judgment, including his issue, and other persons whom he could bar; id. *523. By stat. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 113, judgments are not liens upon lands until such lands have been actually delivered in execution.

In the United States generally judgments are liens on lands within the county from the date on which they are docketed or entered. In New Jersey a judgment of the supreme court is a lien throughout the state. In a few of the states the lien attaches immediately when the judgment is recovered. In others it is necessary, in order to make a judgment a lien in any county, that a transcript of the judgment be recorded.

In many states, it requires an execution to create a lien by judgment, which, in some states, must issue within a specific period after judgment, e. g. one year in Virginia, and two years in West Virginia, while in Delaware the common-law rule that an execution must issue within a year and a day is enforced by the systematic entry on the judgment docket by the prothonotary of the issue of an execution vice comes (q. r.), which is, in fact, never issued and is a fiction in all respects except as to the prothonotary's fee.

Judgments in the federal courts have the same lien as those in the respective state courts wherein they are held, except that they extend to all lands of defendant in the district. Judgments in the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania have been decided to be liens against land in both the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania.

The time during which a judgment lien continues in force varies in the several states; it is one year in Tennessee; two years in Idaho and Nevada; three years in Arkansas and Missouri; four years in Georgia; five years in Kansas, Nebraska, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Utah, Washington, California, Wyoming and Oklahoma Territory; six years in Colorado and Montana; seven years in Illinois; ten years in Alabama, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin, South Dakota, Virginia and West Virginia; twelve years in Maryland; twenty years in New Jersey. There is no statutory limitation in Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico and the District of Columbia, and in Delaware, except in New Castle County, where there is a limitation of ten years. In these latter states the only limitation of the lien is the presumption of payment. In Delaware a judgment is presumed to be paid in twenty years, that being the period which bars proceedings affecting land or actions on specialties. Judgments are no lien in Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, Arizona and Indian Territory. A verdict is a lien in Pennsylvania.

MECHANICS' LIENS. The lien of mechanics and material men on buildings and for work done and materials furnished is unknown either at common law or in equity; 13 Pa. 167; 6 Wall. 561; but it exists in all of the United States by statute, to a greater or less extent. Each state has its own mechanic's lien law, differing often in minor particulars, but alike in the general provisions. These statutes are remedial and should be liberally construed; 22 Neb. 656, 136. In most of the states, this lien is equal to that of a judgment or mortgage, and can be assigned and enforced in a similar manner; 26 Conn. 317. The lien affects only real estate, and attaches to the materials only when they become real estate by being erected into a building and attached to the land; 2 Vroom 477; but should the building be removed or destroyed, the lien does not remain upon the land; 26 Pa. 246; nor upon any portion of the materials of which the building was composed; 28 Pa. 161.

In many cases a single lien is allowed upon separate buildings; 148 Mass. 104; 76 Md. 397; 120 Mo. 38; 96 Mich. 175; 101 U. S. 721; contra, 61 Conn. 578; 167 Pa. 614; 153 id. 293; but see 151 Pa. 153; 158 id. 238. Two owners of contiguous lots may by their acts connect them so as to constitute one lot and make them subject to lien for work or material; 51 Minn. 364. See note on this subject 17 L. R. A. 814, and a later collection of cases, 8 Gen. Dig. n. s. 891.

The benefits of the statute apply only to the class of persons named therein. The contractor seems to be universally secured by the lien, and in most of the states the sub-contractor and material man are also protected by a lien. In some states these provisions extend to workmen, but generally they do not; Phill. Mech. Liens, 58. A contractor's lien is not defeated by the fact that the work was only partly performed, where such part performance has been accepted; 85 Ala. 311; 74 Wis. 183. A contract by which a contractor agrees that he will not suffer or permit to be filed any mechanics' lien or liens against a building waives the right to file a lien in his own favor; 181 Pa. 598.

Mechanics' lien laws extend to non-residents as well as residents; 2 Swan 180; 17 Minn. 858.

A New York statute giving a lien to "any person" who has furnished materials for a building in the state is available under a contract made and payable in another state; 38 L. R. A. (N. Y.) 410.

Where the statute was silent on the subject of assigning a mechanic's lien, it was held that an assignee could not prosecute in his own name and avail himself of its privileges; 10 Wisc. 331; 36 Me. 384; but in other states it has been held that the lien may be assigned precisely as any other chose in action, the assignee taking subject to the equities of the parties; 15 Gratt. 63; 12 Pa. 339; 14 All. 139; 14 Abb. Pr. n. s. 281. The right of lien survives to an executor or administrator; 14 Minn. 145.

A mechanic's lien is not released by taking a note on account of it, to be credited when paid, even if the note be discounted; 68 Fed. Rep. 778; 82 U. S. App. 435; but taking a note which will mature after the expiration of the statutory period for enforcing a lien, operates as a waiver of it even under a statute providing that the taking of a note shall not discharge the lien; 64 Minn. 269. Taking a note as security has been held in many cases to affect the right to a lien; 43 N. J. Eq. 282; 85 Ga. 109; 78 Wis. 150; 121 Ill. 571; 21 Can. S. C. 406; 3 N. Dak. 53; 94 Mich. 299; see 96 id. 118; in others it has been held that the lien is not affected; 76 Md. 337; 7 Miso. Rep. 79, 609; 91 Ga. 651; 6 S. Dak. 160; 67 Hun 109; 157 Mass. 584; 88 Fed. Rep. 593.

A lien cannot be acquired against certain classes of property which are exempted on the ground of public policy. See 88 Fed. Rep. 565. Thus public school-houses; 37 How. Pr. 520; 10 Pa. 275; 13 Utah 211; 13 Ore. 283; 51 Ia. 70; 89 Cal. 160; court-houses, public offices, or jails, are exempt; 7 W. & S. 197; 47 N. Y. 666; 112 N. C. 335; 38 W. Va. 691; 70 Ia. 479; 89 Wis. 264; 105 N. Y. 139; 110 Ala. 539; 83 Tex. 202, 291; but see 62 Kan. 250; so also are graveyards; 3 Pa. L. J. 343; but a church has been held subject to a mechanic's lien; 44 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 354. Such a lien cannot extend to the valves constituting part of the water works of a corporation organized to furnish a city with water; 89 Wis. 264; 142 Pa. 610; 60 id. 27; or to the plant of such corporation; 89 Wis. 264; or a street railway; 68 Fed. Rep. 906; 29 U. S. App. 698; 2 Wash. 112; but see 10 Lanc. L. Rev. Pa. 78; or a power house connected with the same; 29 U. S. App. 698; 16 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 18; or to the property of an electric light company having a franchise to occupy streets; 48 Kan. 187; 19 Ore. 61. Some question has arisen whether mechanics' lien laws apply to railroads. When the statute gives a lien on "buildings" they are said not to be covered; 2 Jones, Liens § 1618; otherwise if the word used is "structure," "erection," "improvement"; id. § 1624; and a lien has been upheld against ties used in construction; 44 Ia. 71.

The same doctrine of public policy which forbids mechanics' liens on public buildings, etc., has been said to apply to railroads, so far that such a lien, if given by statute, is generally held to attach only to the entire line and not to a section of it; 2 Jones, Liens § 1619 and cases cited; but Deady, J., challenges this statement; 42 Fed. Rep. 470; s. c. 8 L. R. A. 700, where will be found a collection of cases by states on mechanics' liens on railroads; see also 101 U. S. 443. Railroad depots are not exempt; 11 Wis. 214; 10 Ohio St. 372; 37 N. H. 410.

As to mechanic's lien on vessels under state statutes see subtitle Maritime Liens, supra.

In some cases it is held that the equitable title of a purchaser of land, who has not fully acquired the title, may be subject to a statutory lien; 88 Fla. 805; 118 Pa. 684; 52 Fed. Rep. 82; 46 Kan. 24, 543; 8 S. Dak. 440; contra, 160 Mass. 48; 45 N. J. Eq. 494;

148 N. Y. 673. In such case the lien has been held to be subordinate to the right of the vendor for unpaid purchase money; 48 Neb. 183. A mechanic's lien in such case attaches only to the interest of the purchaser; 46 Kan. 24. That the lien attaches on the completion of the contract of sale was held in 53 Minn. 484.

On the foreclosure of a mortgage, the fund raised takes the place of the land and is subject to a lien; 17 Abb. Pr. 256; so also is a balance in court on the sale of a lessee's interest in land and buildings; 62 Pa. 403.

The remedy is by scire facias in some states; 14 Ark. 379; 14 Tex. 37; 23 Mo. 140; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 183; 14 How. 434; 13 Pa. 45; by petition, in others; 11 Cush. 303; 4 Wis. 431; 14 Ala. n. s. 33; 11 Ill. 519; 1 Ia. 75. When the proceeding is by scire facias, obviously it can have no more effect than belongs to that writ, which is substantially a proceeding in rem.

Questions constantly arise under the statutes giving liens to mechanics and material men as to the respective priority of their liens over those of mortgagees. Questions as to the respective priority, as between such liens and mortgage liens, must be considered with reference to the statutes. Such liens have been held entitled to priority over a previous mortgage so far as a building is concerned; 15 Ind. App. 393; 43 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 19; and also where the labor and materials were furnished upon the mortgagee's agreement that his lien should be subordinated; 49 Neb. 483; but the mere fact that the mortgagee told the contractor to go ahead with the work of building upon the mortgaged premises is not a waiver of priority; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 430. As between mortgages and subsequently filed mechanics' liens, the mortgage was held superior in 92 Ia. 732; 94 Ala. 240; 51 N. J. Eq. 605; 43 Hun 465; and the mechanic's lien was held superior in 109 N. C. 658; 152 Pa. 621; 80 Fed. Rep. 332; 153 Mass. 519; 106 Cal. 234; 58 N. J. L. 445. For collections of cases upon this question of priority see 8 Gen. Dig.; 14 L. R. A. 805.

For statutes relating to mechanics' liens see Stimson, Am. Stat. Law art. 190. See Houck; Nott; Phillips; Richey; Sergeant; Snyder, Mech. Liens.

LOGGING LIENS. In some states, persons employed in logging have a lien for services. It exists in favor of a cook and his assistant at a logging camp; 64 Minn. 420; a blacksmith employed in shoeing horses and mending tools at the camp; id.; persons contracting to cut, skid, and haul logs and to peel bark to be paid for by the thousand; 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 387; one who blasts rocks to make a passage for logs; 10 Wash. 84; one who furnishes supplies; 78 Wis. 14; a rafter of logs; 101 Mich. 287; a mill owner; 105 N. Y. 234. But mere contractors have not a lien; 77 Mich. 45; or one who furnishes a horse, harness, and sleds at a specified price per month; 90 Me. 227; or one who employs men to do the work but does not directly labor himself; 11 Wash. 304; or one cutting without right; 70 Mich. 809; or the owner of an ox hired to haul the logs; 87 Wis. 227. Such liens have been held to include not only manual labor of the lienor, but also that performed by his teams and servants, under a contract for a gross sum per month for both; 64 Minn. 420.

The amount of the lien is a question for the jury; 65 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 235; and so is the question whether a levy under such lien is excessive; id. 379; and the lien is not vitiated by an excessive levy; id.

The lien of a boom company attaches to part of a single bailment for charges on logs previously delivered, but it is confined to logs of the same mark and not a general lien upon all logs of the same owner; 64 Minn. 108; recording is not required to bind an innocent purchaser, possession being equivalent to notice; id. It may be waived either by contract or a course of dealing inconsistent with its existence, or by an extension of time for payment of charges; id.

One who cuts and rafts logs under a contract which, by reasonable construction, entitles him to retain possession until paid for his services, has a common-law lien thereon; 101 Mich. 267; but one with whom the owner of timber contracts for its cutting and delivery in his mill-pond has not; 163 Pa. 118.

The execution and performance of a contract for the sale of standing timber at so much per acre, to be cut and hauled by the purchaser who owns a sawmill, is held under the Georgia Civil Code, not to give the seller a lien on the sawmill and products; 27 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 730.

AGRICULTURAL LIENS. Among these are, a lien of laborers upon crops for their wages, which is held superior to the lien of a mortgage of the crop, executed prior to the laborer's lien; 85 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1108; 16 So. Rep. (Miss.) 678; such a lien applies in favor of the overseer of a farm; 71 Miss. 938. Of a similar character is a statutory lien, given in some states, to persons furnishing agricultural supplies; such liens are held to be superior to a conveyance of the property in payment of debt; 47 La. Ann. 742; or to the claim of a mortgage; 114 N. C. 264; or a chattel mortgage on the crop previously executed; 57 Minn. 84.

A statutory lien on crops for advances to a farmer may be secured by agreement recorded, in Florida, Virginia, North Carolina, and Alabama; it has priority in the first named state against all except laborers' liens, and in the two last named on all except a landlord's claim for rent, and in Alabama advances by landlord. An agreement merely in writing is sufficient in Tennessee, South Carolina, and Georgia; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1854.

The order of liens on crops in Louisiana is as follows: (1) labor; (2) lessor; (3) overseer; (4) pledges, in the order of record; (5) furnisher of supplies or money, and physician; Laws, 1887, § 89. In Washington, farm laborers have a lien on crops superior to the landlord, who also has a lien on crops for rent; Laws, 1896, 115.

In North Dakota a person furnishing grain for seed, or potatoes for planting, has a lien on the crop.

As to the landlord's lien for rent, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, and for special statutory provisions, see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 2034-39.

For various special liens created by statute, see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. art. 464.

LIEU LANDS. In the United States, lands given a railroad on selection in lieu of those lost from a grant by reason of having been disposed of after the grant, but before the definite location of the road. English; see 219 U. S. 387.

LIEUTENANT. This word has now a narrower meaning than it formerly had: its true meaning is a deputy, a substitute, from the French lieu (place or post) and tenant (holder). Among civil officers we have lieutenant-governors, who in certain cases perform the duties of governors (see the names of the several states), lieutenants of police, etc. Among military men, lieutenant-general was formerly the title of a commanding general, but now it signifies the degree above major-general. Lieutenant-colonel is the officer between the colonel and the major. Lieutenant, simply, signifies the officer next below a captain. In the navy, a lieutenant is the second officer, next in command to the captain of a ship. See LORD LIEUTENANT.

LIFE. "The sum of the forces by which death is resisted." Bichat.

A state in which energy of function is ever resisting decay and dissolution.

It commences, for many legal purposes, at the period of quickening, when the first motion of the fetus in utero is perceived by the mother. 1 Bla. Com. 129; Co. 3d Inst. 50. It ceases at death. See DEATH.

But physiology pronounces life as existing from the period of conception, because fetuses in utero do die prior to quickening, and then all the signs of death are found to be perfect; Dean, Med. Jur. 129, 130.

For many important purposes, however, the law concedes to physiology the fact that life commences at conception, en ventre sa mère. See FORTUS. Thus, it may receive a legacy, have a guardian assigned to it, and an estate limited to its use; 1 Bla. Com. 130. It is thus considered as alive for all beneficial purposes; 1 P. Wms. 329.

But for the transfer of civil rights the child must be born alive. The ascertainment of this, as a fact, depends upon certain signs which are always attendant upon life; the most important of these is crying. As to conditions of live birth, see BIRTH; INFANTICIDE.

Life is presumed to continue for one hundred years; 9 Mart. La. 257. As to the presumption of survivorship in case of the death of two persons, at or about the same time, see 14 Cent. L. J. 367, a full article reprinted from the Irish L. Times; DEATH.

LIFE-ANNUITY. See ANNUITY.

LIFE-ASSURANCE. See INSURANCE; POLICY; LOSS.

LIFE-ESTATE. See ESTATE FOR LIFE; TENANT FOR LIFE.

LIFE GUARDS. In England, a part of the King's body-guard. See HORSE GUARDS.

LIFE INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

LIFE-PREBAGE. See PREB.

LIFE POLICY. A policy which usually engages, that in consideration of a periodical payment of premium, the company will pay, on the death of some individual, or on his death within a limited period (as the case may be), a certain sum of money therein specified.

LIFE-RENT. In Scotch Law. A right to use and enjoy a thing during life, the substance of it being preserved. See FEE AND LIFE RENT; TERCE; CURTESY.

LIFE-RENTER. In Scotch Law. A tenant for life without waste. Bell, Dict.

LIFE TABLES. Statistical tables exhibiting the probable proportion of persons who will live to reach different ages. Cent. Dict.

Such tables are used for many purposes, such as the computation of the present value of annuities, dower rights, etc., and for the computation of damages resulting from injuries which destroy the earning capacity of a person, or those resulting from the death of a person to those who are dependent upon him.

The principal mortality tables in ordinary use are:

(1) The Carlisle Table, which takes its name from the city of Carlisle and the calculations for which were made by Joshua Milne in 1815. (2) The Northampton Table, based on statistics of that town, in England. This shows a higher rate of mortality than any other, and it has been said that it more nearly shows the mortality of the negro race in the United States than any other life table; G. & McC. Tables 187, n. 1. (3) The Farr Tables, prepared by Dr. Wm. Farr, of the English registrar general's office, from the census returns of England and Wales. A synopsis of the results of these tables may be found in 2 Ins. Cyc. 516-36. (4) Combined Experience, or actuaries' seventeen office experience tables of mortality, prepared by a committee from 62,587 risks, and published in 1843 by Jenkins Jones. This has been characterized as very accurate; Willey, Life Ins., 4th ed. 35, 78. As the calculations of this table are made upon actual life insurance risks its accuracy would have relation rather to that subject than to dower and annuities, and purposes involving merely the average expectation of sound life. (5) The American Experience tables of mortality by Sheppard Homans, an insurance actuary.

This is a legal standard in several states for valuations of life insurance policies, having been adopted in New York in 1868. (6) The Thirty Offices Experience table of mortality published in 1878: "Not yet accepted as a standard table"; G. & McC. Tables 190.

Courts can take judicial notice of the Carlisle Tables, and can use them in estimating the probable length of life, whether they were introduced in evidence or not; 151 U. S. 436. Standard life and annuity tables showing probable duration of life and present value of a life annuity are competent evidence; 91 Ga. 87; or as bearing on the question of compensation for permanent injury, or in case of death to show the deceased's expectation of life at the time of accident; 82 Minn. 125; 66 N. Y. 50; 63 Ia. 487. The Carlisle tables have been admitted; 78 id. 810; 74 Ga. 737; and also Johnson's Encyclopedia, to show these tables; 78 Ia. 509. The fact that the deceased was in poor health only affects the weight to be given them; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 955; they ought not absolutely to control the jury; 118 U. S. 545, citing approvingly judicial utterances strongly deprecating the use of them by a jury, from 49 L. J. Q. B. 237. In a recent case it was said that they are admissible in actions for personal injuries, but the court should instruct the jury that their value in a particular case depends very much on the plaintiff's state of health, habits, and social condition; 172 Pa. 205.

See GIAUQUE & McCLURE, Present Value Tables, which also contains Bowditch's Table and Chisholm's Commutation Tables; JONES, Value of Annuities and Reversionary Payments; Lawton & Griffiths, Life Tables.

LIGAN, LAGAN. Goods cast into the sea tied to a buoy, so that they may be found again by the owners. When goods are cast into the sea in storms or shipwrecks, and remain there, without coming to land, they are distinguished by the barbarous names of jetsam, flotsam, and ligan. 5 Co. 108; Hargr. St. Tr. 48; 1 Bla. Com. 292. See 38 Fed. Rep. 509.

LIGEANCE. The true and faithful obedience of a subject to his sovereign, of a citizen to his government. It signifies, also, the territory of a sovereign. See ALLEGIANCE.

LIGEANTIA ACQUISITA. Acquired allegiance. Taylor, Int. Pub. Law 217. See ALLEGIANCE.

LIGEANTIA LEGALIS. Legal allegiance. Taylor, Int. Pub. Law 217. See ALLEGIANCE.

LIGEANTIA LOCALIS. Local allegiance. Taylor, Int. Pub. Law 217. See ALLEGIANCE.

LIGHT. A right to have the access of the sun's rays to one's windows, free from any obstruction by the occupier of the adjoining land. 3 Kent's Com. 448.

LIGHT AND AIR. See ANCIENT LIGHTS; AIR. See also, 3 Eng. Rul. Cas. 1.

LIGHTERMAN. The owner or manager of a lighter. A lighterman is considered a common carrier. See LIGHTERS.

LIGHTERS. Small vessels employed in loading and unloading larger vessels. Boat: plying for hire and carrying passengers or goods. 23 L. J. M. C. 150; 3 E. & B. 889.

The owners of lighters are liable like other common carriers for hire. It is a term of the contract on the part of the carrier or lighterman, implied by law, that his vessel is tight and fit for the purpose or employments for which he offers and holds it forth to the public; it is the immediate foundation of the contract that it is so: the law presumes a promise to that effect on the part of the carrier, without actual proof; and every principle of sound policy and public convenience requires it should be so; 5 East 428; Abb. Sh. 225; Bened.

Adm. § 284.

If a vessel, to earn greater freight, gets the shipper to furnish, at a deeper anchorage, cargo in addition to that furnished at the agreed place, the cost of lightering must be borne by the vessel. Delivery to the lighter is delivery to the vessel; 48 Fed. Rep. 931. See LAUNCH; VESSEL.

LIGHTHOUSE. An act authorizing the secretary of the treasury to acquire lands for a lighthouse by condemnation is constitutional; 160 U. S. 490. See NAVIGATION RULES; EMINENT DOMAIN.

An edifice of peculiar structure, many of which are erected by commercial nations, at exposed or dangerous points along the coast, for the purpose of maintaining a light for guidance of vessels at night. They are erected in the United States by congress, and are regulated by Rev. Stat. § 913, tit. 55. Abbott.

LIGHTNING. A sudden discharge of electricity from a cloud to the earth or from the earth to a cloud or from one cloud to another, or from a body positively charged to one negatively charged. 54 Wis. 433.

Any sudden and violent discharge of electricity occurring in nature. Id.

A stroke of lightning is an act of God; 26 Me. 181; 26 L. R. A. (Wis.) 101; but one cannot be excused on that ground from the consequences of his own negligence in causing lightning to be conveyed to a building by a wire; 26 L. R. A. (Wis.) 101. See WIRES.

In a policy of insurance against loss by lightning, it is the province of the jury, not reviewable on appeal, to decide how much damage is caused by lightning and how much by other forces; 47 N. Y. S. R. 406; 54 Wis. 433. Where the insurance was against loss by fire and lightning, damages caused by wind accompanying the storm were held not within it; 15 Ins. L. J. 478; nor was damage caused by lightning without combustion covered by a clause against fire by lightning; 4 N. Y. S. 326. See 37 Me. 256. Where the damage was caused by an explosion of powder resulting from a stroke of lightning, the loss was held to be protected by a fire insurance policy which covered damage by lightning but stipulated against loss by explosion; 36 L. R. A. (Ohio) 236. See INSURANCE.

LIGHTS. Those openings in a wall which are made rather for the admission of light than to look out of. 6 J. B. Moore 47; 9 Bingh. 305. See ANCIENT LIGHTS.

Lamps carried on board vessels, under statutory regulations or otherwise, for the purpose of preventing collisions at night.

Lamps or lights placed in lighthouses, or other conspicuous positions, as aids to navigation at night. See NAVIGATION RULES. FALSE LIGHTS AND SIGNALS.

LIGNAGIUM (from the Lat. lignor, to get fuel). The right which a person has to cut or gather fuel out of the woods; sometimes it is said to signify a pecuniary payment due for the same. Cowell.

LIKE. Equal in quantity, quality, or degree, exactly corresponding. 79 N. C. 387. Like does not necessarily mean the same in all parts; 2 Cush. 145. Like offense. Sameness in all the essential parts. 147 Mass. 452.

LIKEWISE. In like manner; also; moreover; too. 17 Ind. 71. When used at the beginning of a sentence in a will the word sometimes denotes a severance of what follows from a contingency previously expressed, but the context of the will may rebut this presumption; 1 Jarm. Wills 852. See 5 De G., M. & G. 122; 24 Beav. 105.

LIMB. The word "limb" includes from the hip to the sole of the foot. 113 S. W. 474.

LIMIT. A bound, a restraint, a circumscription, a boundary. 22 N. Y. 429. See 11 C. B. x. s. 637. In a deed the words limit and appoint may operate as words of grant so as to pass a reversion; 5 Term 124.

LIMIT. (v.). To fix the extent or length; to mark the end; to set a bound. To limit an estate, means to mark out or define the period of its duration; and the words employed in deeds for this purpose are thence termed words of limitation, and the act itself is termed limiting the estate. Abbott; Brown. See LIMITATION.

LIMITATION IN LAW. A limitation in law, or an estate limited, is an estate to be held only during the continuance of the condition under which it was granted, upon the determination of which the estate vests immediately in expectancy. 2 Bla. Com. 155.

LIMITATIONS. Of Civil Remedies. In general, by the theory and early practice of the common law, a party who had any legal ground of complaint against another might call the latter to answer in court at such time as suited his convenience; 13 East 449. This privilege, however, it was soon found, might be productive of great inconvenience, and not unfrequently of great injustice. Parties might, and often did, wait till witnesses were dead or papers destroyed, and then proceeded to enforce claims to which at an earlier date a successful defence might have been made. Titles were thus rendered uncertain, the tenure of property insecure, and litigation fostered. To prevent these evils, statutes were passed limiting the time within which a party having a cause of action should appeal to the courts for redress,—hence called statutes of limitation. The doctrine of fines, of very great antiquity in the history of the common law, the purpose of which was to put an end to controversies, grew out of the efforts to obviate these evils, and frequent attempts, prior to the accession of James I., by statutes of restricted application, were made to the same end. But till the reign of that prince no general enactment applicable alike to personal and real actions had been passed.

In 1633, however, by stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 16, entitled "An Act for Limitation of Actions, and for avoiding of Suits in Law," known and celebrated ever since as the Statute of Limitations, the law upon this subject was comprehensively declared substantially as it exists at the present day in England, whence our ancestors brought it with them to this country; and it has passed, with some modifications, into the statute-books of every state in the Union except Louisiana, whose laws of limitation are essentially the prescriptions of the civil law, drawn from the Partidas, or Spanish Code.

In 1 Bla. 287, Wilmut, J., declared it to be a "noble beneficial act," which should be construed liberally; quoted in 1 Yeates 331.

The similarity between the statutes of the several states and those of England is such that the decisions of the British courts and those of this country are for the most part illustrative of all, and will be cited indiscriminately in this brief summary of the law as it now stands. Vide 5 B. & Ald. 204; 4 Johns. 817; 2 Caines, Cas. 143. One preliminary question, however, has arisen in this country, growing out of the provision of the national constitution prohibiting states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, for which there is no English precedent. Upon this point the settled doctrine is that unless the law bars a right of action already accrued without giving a reasonable time within which to bring an action, it pertains to the remedy merely, and is valid; 4 Wheat. 122; 3 Dall. 388; 11 Pet. 420; 3 Whart. 15; 2 Gall. 141; 19 Pick. 578; 2 Mas. 169. Subject to this qualification, a law may extend or reduce the time already limited. But a cause of action already barred by pre-existing statutes will not be revived by a statute extending the time; 7 Pa. 292; 25 Vt. 41; 8 Blackf. 506; 2 Sandf. Ch. 61; 18 Pick. 532; 2 Greene Ia. 181; 11 Wisc. 432; 1 Oreg. 176; though if it be not already barred, a statute extending the time will apply; 21 Ark. 95; 24 Vt. 620; 1 T. B. Monr. 424. The fact that a statute continues in force a previous period of limitation for past contracts, and provides a different period for future contracts, does not render it invalid, as lacking a uniform operation, or as being in the nature of special legislation; 52 Fed. Rep. 791.

Whatever may have been the disposition in the past, the courts are now inclined to construe these statutes liberally, so as to effectuate their intent; they are little inclined to fritter away their effect by refinements and subtleties; 1 Pet. 380; 8 Cra. 84; Ang. Lim. § 23. The statute of limitations is a statute of repose and does not rest merely on presumption of payment; 122 U. S. 231.

Courts of equity, though not within the terms of the statute, have nevertheless uniformly conformed to its spirit, and have, as a general rule, been governed by its provisions, unless special circumstances of fraud or the like require, in the interests of justice, that they should be disregarded; 12 Pet. 56; 7 Johns. Ch. 90; 9 Pick. 242; 17 Ves. 96; 10 Wheat. 152; 10 Ohio 424; 9 N. J. Eq. 425; 28 Ill. 44; 3 R. I. 237; 7 C. C. App. 303; 133 Ind. 109; 12 U. S. App. 137; 130 U. S. 43; 82 Va. 518; 111 N. Y. 214. Courts of equity will apply the statute by analogy; 1 App. D. C. 44; 36 Fed. Rep. 722; 136 U. S. 888; and in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, they are bound by the statute which governs actions at law; 149 U. S. 436; 169 id. 189. Some claims, not barred by the statute, a court of equity will not enforce because of public policy, and the difficulty of doing full justice when the transaction is obscured by lapse of time and loss of evidence. This is termed the doctrine of laches (q. v.); 84 U. S. 806; Bishp. Eq. § 260.

But in a proper case where there are no laches and where there is fraud undiscovered till the statute has become a bar, or it is the fault and wrong of the defendant that the plaintiff did not enforce his legal rights within the limited time, courts of equity will not hesitate to interfere in the interest of justice, and entertain suits long since barred at law; 4 How. 503; 11 Cl. & F. 714; 23 Ia. 487; 12 Minn. 522; Bishp. Eq. § 203; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 393; 11 Wall. 443. See 21 Neb. 413; 28 id. 479; 10 U. S. App. 519. But here, again, courts of equity will proceed with great caution; 7 How. 819; and hold the complainant to allegation and proof of his ignorance of the fraud and when and how it was discovered; 1 Curt. C. C. 390; 1 Watts 401.

And courts of admiralty are governed by substantially the same rules as courts of equity; 3 Mas. 91; 8 Sumn. 236; 2 Gall. 477; Sprague 163; 3 Salk. 227; 30 Fed. Rep. 560; 1 U. S. App. 101. And, although the statute does not apply in terms to probate courts, there seems to be no reason why it should not be applied according to the principles of equity; 1 Bradf. Surr. 1. It is so applied in Pennsylvania by the orphans' court.

State statutes of limitation do not apply to a libel in rem to enforce a maritime lien for breach of a contract of affreightment; 57 Fed. Rep. 603.

AS TO PERSONAL ACTIONS. Generally personal actions must be brought within a certain specified time—usually six years or less—from the time when the cause of action accrues, and not after; 3 Binn. 874; 8 T. B. Mon. 119; 13 La. Ann. 101; and hereupon, the question at once arises when the cause of action in each particular case accrues.

Cause of action accrues when. The rule, that the cause of action accrues when and so soon as there is a right to apply to the court for relief, by no means solves the difficulty. When does the right itself so to apply accrue? Upon this point the decisions are so numerous and so conflicting, or, perhaps more accurately speaking, so controlled by particular circumstances, that no inflexible rule can be extracted therefrom. In general, it may be said that in actions of contract the cause of action accrues when there is a breach of the contract. It is also said that whenever there is a plaintiff who can sue and a defendant who can be sued, the statute begins to run;

When a note is payable on demand, the statute begins to run from its date; 3 M. & W. 467; 9 Pick. 488; 10 N. H. 489; 5 Jones N. C. 189; 89 Me. 492; 7 Halst. 247; 50 Barb. 334; 17 Ohio 9; 8 Rich. S. C. 182; 82 W. Va. 387; 118 N. Y. 243. If payable immediately or when requested or called for, it commences to run immediately; 81 Me. 434. The deposit of securities as collateral to demand notes does not prevent the running of the statute from the date of maturity of such notes; 153 Pa. 530. The rule is the same if the note is payable "at any time within six years;" 89 Me. 492; or borrowed money is to be paid "when called on;" 1 Harr. & G. 439. But this is not true of a premium note payable in such portions and at such times as may be necessary to cover losses. There the statute only runs from the time of loss, and the assessment thereof; 40 N. Y. 820; and the statute runs in the case of an ordinary bank note only from demand and refusal; 2 Sneed 489. Until a demand is made for funds deposited in a bank the statute does not begin to run; 10 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 225; and so a demand must first be made by the owner of bank stock for dividends; 84 Ky. 565. If a note be payable in certain days after demand, sight, or notice, the statute begins to run from the demand, sight, or notice; 18 Wend. 287; 8 Dowl. & Ry. 374; 5 Halst. 114; 4 Harring. 248; 24 Ann. Rep. 605; s. c. 86 Mich. 487; demand of a note payable on demand should be made within the time limited for bringing the action on the note; else a note limited to six years might be kept open indefinitely by a failure to make a demand; 10 Pick. 120. Demand of a bill payable "after sight" or "after notice" should be within a reasonable time; 4 Mas. 880; 9 M. & W. 506. And when the note is on interest, this does not become barred by the statute till the principal, or some distinct portion of it, becomes barred; 2 Cush. 92. Demand upon a note or due bill, payable on demand, is not a condition precedent to a right of action; 11 W. N. C. (Pa.) 294. The rule, that a promissory note payable on demand with interest, is a continuing security, does not apply between holder and maker; 41 N. Y. 381; s. c. 1 Am. Rep. 401. If the note be entitled to grace, the statute runs from the last day of grace; 1 Shepl. 412; 18 La. Ann. 602. The indorsement of a promissory note past due, for a valuable consideration, is a new contract, and the statute begins to run in favor of the indorser only from the date of the indorsement; 79 Ga. 72. The statute begins to run in favor of the drawer of a check at latest after the lapse of a reasonable time for the presentment of the check; 87 Neb. 644. Where money is deposited with a person for safe custody, a right of action does not accrue until demand is made thereof; [1893] 9 Ch. 154.

Where money is payable in instalments the statute runs as to each instalment from the time of the failure to pay it; 10 Shepl. 400; 71 Pa. 206. But if the contract provides that on failure to pay one instalment the whole amount shall fall due, the statute runs as to the whole from such failure; 8 G. & D. 402.

Where money is paid by mistake, the statute begins to run from the time of payment; 9 Cow. 674; 25 Pa. 164; see 7 Misc. Rep. 444; also in case of usury; 6 G. 228; 85 Vt. 503; 98 N. C. 244 (but a shorter time is frequently limited by statute); and where money is paid for another as surety; 45 N. Y. 263; 110 Mass. 245. Where money is paid by a bank on a forged check, the right of action to recover the same accrued immediately upon such payment; 128 U. S. 26. An action to recover overpayments made on a contract to deliver logs accrues when the amount delivered was ascertained, rather than at the date of payment; 94 Mich. 223.

The limitation of a right of action for compensation for trespass in removing coal from the mine of another by an adjoining land owner, does not begin to run until the trespass is discovered or its discovery is reasonably possible; 166 Pa. 586.

Where a contract takes effect upon some condition or contingency, or the happening of some event, the statute runs from the performance of the condition; 17 Pick. 407; Ang. Lim. § 118; or the happening of the contingency or event; 3 Pa. 149; 9 Wend. 287; 23 Ct. Cls. 284; and not from the date of the contract. On an agreement to devise, the statute runs from the death of the promisor; 9 Pa. 260. When money is paid, and there is afterwards a failure of consideration, the statute runs from the failure; 14 Mass. 425; 9 Bing. 748.

Where continuous services are rendered, as by an attorney in the conduct of a suit, or by a mechanic in doing a job; 7 Allen 274; 55 Pa. 434; 36 N. Y. 255; 16 Ill. 841; 1 B. & Ad. 15; the statute begins to run from the completion of the service. On a promise of indemnity, when the promisee pays money or is damaged, the statute begins to run; 12 Metc. 180; 8 M. & W. 680; 14 Johns. 308; 3 Rawle 275; 7 Pet. 113.

As to torts quasi ex contractu, the rule is that in cases of negligence, carelessness, unskillfulness, and the like, the statute runs from the time when these happen respectively, and not from the time when damages accrue therefrom; 4 Pet. 172; 4 Ala. 495; 36 Md. 501; 61 Barb. 138; 2 Strobh. 344; 44 Ill. App. 132. Thus, where an attorney negligently invests money in a poor security, the statute runs from the investment; 2 Brod. & B. 78; so, where a party neglected to remove goods from a warehouse, whereby the plaintiff was obliged to pay damages, the statute runs from the neglect, and not from the payment of damages; 3 Johns. 137; so, where the defendant agreed to go into another state and collect some money, and on his return to pay off a certain judgment, the statute was held to run from the return and demand upon him; 3 Ired. 481. A cause of action for an act which is in itself lawful, as to the person who bases thereon an action for injury subsequently accruing, from and consequent upon the act, does not accrue until the injury is sustained; 70 Tex. 238.

The breach of a contract is the gist of the action, and not the damages resulting therefrom; 5 B. & C. 259; 1 Sandf. 98; 8 B. & Ald. 288. Thus, where the defendant had contracted to sell the plaintiff a quantity of salt, but was unable, by reason of the destruction of the salt, to deliver on demand, and prolonged negotiations for settlement till the statutory limitation had expired, and then refused, the statute was held to run from the demand, the non-delivery being a breach of the contract; 1 E. L. & Eq. 44. So, where a notary public neglects to give seasonable notice of non-payment of a note, and the bank employing him was held responsible for the failure, upon suit brought by the bank against the notary to recover the damages it had been obliged to pay, the action was held to be barred, it not being within six years of the notary's default, though within six years of the time when the bank was required to pay damages; 6 Cow. 378.

So, where an attorney makes a mistake in a writ, whereupon, after prolonged litigation, non-suit follows, but not till an action against the indorser on the note originally sued has become barred, the mistake is held to set the statute in motion; 4 Pet. 172; 4 Ala. 495. Where he collects money for a client and uses no fraud or falsehood in regard to its receipt, the statute runs from the time of its collection; 46 Ohio St. 349. When the attorney dies before the legal proceedings are terminated the statute runs from his death; 145 Pa. 531. The statute does not begin to run against an attorney's claim for services until the termination of the action in which they are rendered; 25 N. Y. S. 184.

A captain who barratrously loses his vessel is freed from his liability to the underwriter in six years after the last act in the barratrous proceeding; 1 Campb. 589. Directors of a bank liable by statute for mismanagement are discharged in six years after the insolvency of the bank is made known; 16 Mass. 68.

In some states a distinction has been taken in cases where a public officer has neglected duties imposed on him by law, and the statute is in such cases said to run only from the time when the injury is developed; 26 Conn. 324; but see 8 Shepl. 814; 97 Pa. 47; and it has been held that if a sheriff make an insufficient return, and there is in consequence a reversal of judgment, the statute runs from the return, and not from the reversal of judgment; 16 Mass. 456. So where a sheriff collects money and makes due return but fails to pay over, the statute runs from the return; 11 Ala. 879; or from the demand by the creditor; 10 Metc. 244. If he suffers an escape, it runs from the escape; 2 Mod. 212; if he takes insufficient bail, from the return of non est inventus upon execution against the principal debtor; 17 Mass. 60; 20 Me. 93; if he receive money on a scire facias, from its reception; 9 Ga. 418; if he neglects to attach sufficient property, on the return of the writ, and not from the time when the insufficiency of the property is ascertained; 27 Me. 443. The statute runs on a cause of action for wrongful attachment from the time thereof; 77 Cal. 208; 78 La. 115; 45 La. Ann. 1221. An action by a sheriff upon the bond of his deputy for a default accrues when the sheriff has paid the debt occasioned by the default; 38 W. Va. 519, 557.

The same principle applies in cases of torts pure and simple; 24 Pa. 186; 16 Pick. 241; 1 Rawle 27; 4 Ohio 331; 6 Ohio St. 276.

An action against a recorder of deeds for damages caused by a false certificate of search against incumbrances on real property, must be brought within six years from the date of the search, and not from the date of the discovery of the lien overlooked, or of the loss suffered by the plaintiff; 97 Pa. 47; 54 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 212; 95 Cal. 317.

The statute only begins to run against a surety claiming contribution when his own liability is ascertained; [1893] 2 Ch. 514.

In cases of nuisance, the statute begins to run from the injury to the right, without reference to the question of the amount of the damage, the law holding the violation of a right as some damage; 8 East 4; 13 Pick. 241; 1 Rawle 27; 10 Wend. 200; 73 Tex. 93. And so when a party having a right to use land for a specific purpose puts it to other uses, or wrongfully disposes of property rightfully in possession, the statute begins to run from the perversion; 24 Pa. 186. In trover, the statute runs from the conversion; 4 H. & J. 393; 21 Ga. 454; 15 Mass. 82; 5 B. & C. 149; in replevin, from the unlawful taking or detention. The limitation, in the statute of James, of actions for slander to two years next after the words spoken, applies only to cases where the words are actionable in themselves, and not when they become actionable by reason of special damage arising from the speaking thereof; 1 Salk. 206; 10 Wend. 167; 5 Watts 308; 32 Wkly. Law Bul. 63. The limitation extends neither to slander of title; Cro. Car. 140; nor to libel; Arch. Pl. 29. In cases of trespass, crim. con., etc., the statute runs from the time the injury was committed; 5 N. H. 814.

Adverse possession of personal property gives title in six years after the possession becomes adverse; 16 Vt. 124; 1 Brev. 111; 16 Ala. n. s. 696; 3 Metc. 187; 17 Tex. 206. But one who holds by consent of the true owner is not entitled to have the statute run in his favor until denial of the true owner's claim; 81 Ala. 188; Ang. Lim. 801, n.; 55 N. H. 61. But different adverse possessions cannot be linked together to give title; 8 Strobh. 31; 11 Humphr. 889. The statute acts upon the title to property, and, when the bar is perfect, transfers it to the adverse possessor; but in contracts for payment of money there is no such thing as adverse possession, the statute simply affects the remedy, and not the debt; 18 Ala. n. s. 243.

Computation of time. In computing the time limited, much discussion has been had in the courts whether the day when the statute begins to run is to be included or excluded, but without any satisfactory result. It is most generally held that when the computation is from an act done, the day upon which the act is done is to be included, and when it is from the date simply, then if a present interest is to commence from the date, the day of the date is included; but if merely used as a terminus from which to compute time, then the day of the date is excluded; 9 Cra. 104; 3 Term 438; 17 Pa. 48; 15 Mass. 193; 2 Cow. 605. This rule, however, of including the day upon which an act is done, is subject to so many exceptions and qualifications that it can hardly be said to be a rule, and many of the cases are wholly irreconcilable with it. It has been well said that whether the day upon which an act is done or an event happens is to be included or excluded, depends upon the circumstances and reasons of the thing, so that the intention of the parties may be effected; and such a construction should be given as will operate most to the ease of the party entitled to favor, and by which rights will be secured and forfeitures avoided; 1 Tex. 107; Ang. Lim. c. VI. Fractions of a day are not regarded, unless it becomes necessary in a question of priority; 3 Story 571; 4 Gilm. (Ill.) 499; 8 Ves. 83; 8 Den. 12; 6 Gray 816; and then only in some cases, usually in questions concerning private acts and transactions; 20 Vt. 653. See FRACTION OF A DAY; DAY; TIME.

Exceptions to general rule. If, when the right of action would otherwise accrue and the statute begin to run, there is no person who can exercise the right, the statute does not begin to run till there is such a person; 8 Cra. 84; for this would be contrary to the intent of the various statutes. Thus, if a note matures after the decease of the promisee, and prior to the issue of letters of administration, the statute runs from the date of the letters of administration unless otherwise specified in the statute; 5 B. & Ald. 904; 13 Wend. 267; 9 Leigh 79; 7 H. & Johns. 14; 4 Whart. 180; 32 Vt. 176; 15 Conn. 145; and there must be a person in being to be sued, otherwise the statute will not begin to run; 12 Wheat. 129.

But the courts will not recognize exemptions, where the statute has once begun to run; 126 Pa. 643; 16 Or. 178. So where the statute begins to run before the death of the testator or intestate, it is not interrupted by his death; 4 M. & W. 43; 8 M. & C. 453; 4 Edw. Ch. 733; 3 McLean 568; 30 W. Va. 195; 24 Neb. 670; nor by the death of the administrator; 17 Ala. N. S. 291; nor by his removal from the state; 15 Ala. N. S. 545; nor by the subsequent mental incapacity of a party; 151 U. S. 493. So an insolvent's discharge as effectually removes him from pursuit by his creditor as absence from the state; but it is not an exception within the statute, and cannot avail; 1 Whart. 106; 1 Cow. 356; 6 Gray 517. See 35 Tenn. 278. A creditor's absence makes it inconvenient for him to return and sue; but as he can so do, he must, or be barred; 17 Ves. Ch. 87; 1 Johns. 165. And it has ever been held that a statutory impediment to the assertion of title will not help the party so impeded; 2 Wheat. 25; but when a state of war exists between the governments of the debtor and creditor, the running of the statute is suspended; 22 Wall. 576; Chase, Dec. 286; 29 Ark. 226; 55 Ga. 274; 62 Mo. 140; 11 Bush 191; 18 Wall. 158; and it revives in full force on the restoration of peace. See 103 N. C. 159. The courts cannot create an exception to the operation of the statute not made by the statute itself, where the party designedly eludes the service of process; 190 U. S. 820.

There are many authorities, however, to show that if, by the interposition of courts, the necessity of the case, or the provisions of a statute, a person cannot be sued for a limited time, the running of the statute is suspended during that period. In other words, if the law interposes to prevent suit, it will see to it that he who has a right of action shall not be prejudiced thereby; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 366; 5 Ga. 66; 8 McLean 568; 12 Wheat. 129. But see 21 Pa. 230. Thus, an injunction suspends the statute; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 182; 12 Gratt. 579; 3 Stock. 847;

10 Humphr. 865; 81 N. Y. 345; 13 La. Ann. 57; 106 Mass. 847; as does the presentation of a claim against the United States to the treasury department for examination and allowance; 78 Fed. Rep. 648. And so does an assignment of an insolvent's effects, as between the estate and the creditors; 7 Metc. 435; 7 Rich. S. C. 43; 12 La. Ann. 216; though not, as has just been said, as between the debtor and his creditor; 6 Gray 517. But when the statute does not in terms exclude and limit a particular case, the court will not extend it, although the case comes within the reason of the statute; 15 Ala. 194; 2 Curt. 480; 17 Ohio St. 548; 58 Pa. 383. See 31 W. Va. 571.

By the special provisions of the statute, infants, married women, persons non compos mentis, those imprisoned, and those beyond seas, out of the state, out of the realm, or out of the country, are regarded as affected by the incapacity to sue, or, in other words, as being under disability, and have, therefore, the right of action secured to them until the expiration of the time limited, after the removal of the disability. The statute of limitations cannot be pleaded in bar to an action by a wife against a husband to recover present and future maintenance; 6 Ind. App. 377. But these personal exceptions have been strictly construed, and the party alleging the disability has been very uniformly held to bring himself exactly within the express words of the statute to entitle himself to the benefit of the exception. To bring himself within the spirit or supposed reason of the exception is not enough; 1 Cow. 356; 3 Green, N. J. 171; 2 Curt. C. C. 480; 17 Ves. Ch. 87; 4 Ben. 459. And this privilege is accorded although the person laboring under the statute disability might in fact bring suit. Thus, an infant may sue before he arrives at his majority, but he is not obliged to, and his right is saved if he does not; 3 Saund. 117. The time during which a negro was held as a slave should not be counted in determining whether an action by him is barred by the statute; 23 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 654. The disability must, however, be continuous and identical. One disability cannot be superadded to another so as to prolong the time; 37 U. S. App. 129; and if the statute once begins to run, whether before a disability exists or after it has been removed, no intervention of another and subsequent disability can stop it; 29 Pa. 495; 15 B. Mon. 30; 54 Ill. 101; 2 McCord 269; 24 Neb. 670; 87 Tenn. 172; 117 Ind. 539; 147 U. S. 647. When, however, there are two or more coexisting disabilities at the time the right of action accrues, suit need not be brought till all are removed; Plowd. 375; 20 Mo. 530; 1 Atk. Ch. 610; 1 Shepl. 397; 3 Johns. Ch. 129.

The time during which a debtor is absent residing out of the state of his own free will and accord, is to be deducted in estimating the time in which an action must be brought against him; 74 Mich. 235; 52 Kan. 706; notwithstanding that he continues to have a usual place of residence in the state where service of the summons could be made on him; 147 U. S. 647; but a foreign corporation is a person out of the state; 86 Wis. 285. See BEYOND SEAS.

The word return, as applied to an absent debtor, applies as well to foreigners, or residents out of the state coming to the state, as to citizens of the state who have gone abroad and have returned; 3 Johns. 267; 11 Pick. 36; 3 R. I. 178. And in order to set the statute in motion the return must be open, public, and such and under such circumstances as will give a party, who exercises ordinary diligence, an opportunity to bring his action; 1 Pick. 268; 8 Gill & J. 158; 15 Vt. 727; 26 Barb. 208. Such a return, though temporary, will be sufficient; 8 Cra. 174. But if the return is such and under such circumstances as to show that the party does not intend that his creditor shall take advantage of his presence, or such, in fact, that he cannot without extraordinary vigilance avail himself of it,—if it is secret, concealed, or clandestine,—it is insufficient. The absence of one of several joint-plaintiffs does not prevent the running of the statute; 4 Term 516; but the absence of one of several joint-defendants does; 29 E. L. & Eq. 271. This at least seems to be the settled law of England; but the cases in the several states of the Union are conflicting upon these points. See 1 Dutch. 219; 18 N. Y. 567; 18 B. Mon. 312; 4 Sneed 99. If a claimant beyond seas when the claim accrued returned to this country, the statute began to run and was not suspended by his departure to foreign parts; 23 Ct. Cls. 255.

Commencement of process. The question sometimes arises as to what constitutes the bringing an action or the commencement of process, and this is very uniformly held to be the delivery or transmission by mail in due course of the writ or process to the sheriff, in good faith, for service; 14 Wend. 649; 15 Mass. 859; 1 S. & R. 236; 26 Md. 479; 8 Greenl. (Mo.) 447; 1 W. Chip. 94. The date of the writ is prima facie evidence of the time of its issuance; 17 Pick. 407; 7 Me. 870; but is by no means conclusive; 2 Burr. 950; 15 Mass. 364. The suit is not "brought" or "commenced" in a federal court, to stop the running of the statute, until there is a bona fide attempt to serve the process; 80 Fed. Rep. 309.

If the writ or process seasonably issued fail of a sufficient service or return by any unavoidable accident, or by any default or neglect of the officer to whom it is committed, or is abated, or the action is otherwise avoided by the death of any party thereto, or for any matter of form, or judgment for plaintiff be arrested or reversed, the plaintiff may, either by virtue of the statutory provision or by reason of an implied exception to the general rule, commence a new action within a reasonable time; and that reasonable time is usually fixed by the statute at one year, and by the courts in the absence of statutory provision at the same period; 1 Ld. Raym. 434; 2 Pa. 882; 1 Bail. S. C. 543; 10 Wend. 278. See 78 Ga. 790. Irregularity of the mail is an inevitable accident within the meaning of the statute; 8 Me. 447. And so is a failure of service by reason of the removal of the defendant, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, from the county in which he had resided and to which the writ was seasonably sent; 12 Metc. 15. But a mistake of the attorney as to time of the sitting of the court, and consequent failure to enter, is not; 29 Me. 458. An abatement by the marriage of the female plaintiff is no abatement within the statute; it is rather a voluntary abandonment; 8 Cra. 84. And so, generally, of any act of the party or his attorney whereby the suit is abated or the action fails; 3 M'Cord 452; 29 Me. 458; 1 Mich. 252; 6 Cush. 417. The statute cannot be pleaded to an amended count when it contains only a restatement of the case as contained in the original counts; 43 Ill. App. 126. The filing of a petition will bar the running of the statute, though stricken out because it does not contain the formal allegations required, where it was subsequently amended; 66 Tex. 560. In Pennsylvania a citation to an executor to file an account is equivalent to the commencement of process.

A non suit is in some states held to be within the equity of the statute; 13 Ired. 123; 4 Ohio St. 172; 13 La. Ann. 672; see 47 Mo. App. 218; but generally otherwise; 1 S. & R. 236; 8 M'Cord 453; 8 Harr. N. J. 269; 6 Cush. 417. If there are two defendants, and by reason of a failure of service upon one an alias writ is taken out, this is no continuance, but a new action, and the statute is a bar; 6 Watts 528. So of an amending bill introducing new parties; 6 Pet. 61; 10 B. Mon. 84; 8 Me. 535. A dismissal of the action because of the clerk's omission seasonably to enter it on the docket is for matter of form, within the Massachusetts statute, and a new suit may be instituted within one year thereafter; 7 Gray 165; and so is a dismissal for want of jurisdiction, where the action is brought in the wrong county; 1 Gray 580. In Maine, however, a wrong venue is not a matter of form; 38 Me. 217. The statute is a bar to an action at law after a dismissal from chancery for want of jurisdiction; 1 Vern. 74;

10 Wend. 572; 2 Munf. 181. Upon the dismissal of an action the court cannot extend the statutory period of limitation for bringing a new action; 39 Minn. 115.

Lex fori governs. Questions under the statute are to be decided by the law of the place where the action is brought, and not by the law of the place where the contract is made or the wrong done. If the statute has run against a claim in one state, the remedy is gone, but the right is not extinguished; and therefore the right may be enforced in another state where the remedy is still open, the time limited by the statute not having expired; 15 East 439; 11 Pick. 36, 522; 7 Md. 91; 23 How. 132; 13 Gray 535. So if the statute of the place of the contract is still unexpired, yet an action brought in another place is governed by the lex fori, and may be barred; 1 Cal. 402; 5 Cl. & F. 1. But statutes giving title by adverse possession are to be distinguished from statutes of limitation. Adverse possession gives title; lapse of time bars the remedy only. And a right acquired by adverse possession in the place where the adverse possession is had is good elsewhere; 11 Wheat. 361; 9 How. 407; Story, Conf. Laws 582. In Pennsylvania, by a recent statute an action is barred whenever it is so by the law of the state where the cause of action accrued. See LEX FORI.

Public rights not affected. Statutes of limitation do not, on principles of public policy, run against the state or the United States, unless it is expressly so provided in the statute itself; 130 U. S. 263; 147 id. 508; 38 Fed. Rep. 1; but the United States is entitled to take the benefit of them; 147 U. S. 508. No laches is to be imputed to the government; 2 Mass. 312; 18 Johns. 228; 4 Mass. 528. But this principle has no application when a party seeks his private rights in the name of the state; 4 Ga. 115; but see 6 Pa. 200; 137 U. S. 378; 132 id. 239; 142 id. 510. Counties, towns, and municipal bodies not possessed of the attributes of sovereignty have no exemption; 4 Dev. 568; 22 Me. 445; 12 Ill. 38; 13 Wall. 62; 38 W. Va. 1; 41 Ark. 45; 133 Ind. 700; but see 8 Ohio 298. And it is held that municipalities are excluded from the operation of the statute, in regard to the title to land, 101 Pa. 27; 51 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 930; but it is said that municipalities may be estopped from disputing title where justice and equity so require; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 875. If, however, the sovereign becomes a party in a private enterprise, as, for instance, a stockholder in a bank, it subjects itself to the operation of the statute; 3 Pet. 30; 2 Brock. 393. See, generally, 147 U. S. 508.

Particular classes of actions. Actions of trespass, trespass quare clausum, detinue, account, trover, replevin, and upon the case (except actions for slander), and actions of debt for arrears of rent, and of debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty, or simple contract debt, are usually limited to six years. Actions for slander, libel, assault, and the like, are usually limited to a less time, generally two years. Judgments of courts not of record, as courts of justices of the peace and county commissioners' courts, are in some states, either by statute or the decisions of the highest courts, included in the category of debts founded on contract without specialty, and accordingly come within the statute; 13 Metc. 251; 2 Bail. 58; 37 Me. 29; 2 Grant. Cas. 353; 6 Barb. 583; 3 Living. 367. In others, however, they are excluded upon the ground that the statute applies only to debts founded on contracts in fact, and not to debts founded on contracts implied by law; 14 Johns. 480.

Actions of assumpsit, though not specifically named in the original statute of James I. as included within the limitation of six years, were held in England, after much discussion, to be fairly embraced in actions of "trespass"; 4 Mod. 105; 4 B. & C. 44; 4 Ad. & E. 912. The same rule has been adopted in this country; 5 Ohio 444; 3 Pet. 270; 1 Morr. la. 59. 8 Cra. 98; but see 12 M. & L. 141; and, in fact, assumpsit is expressly included in most of the statutes. And it has also been held in this country that statutes of limitation apply as well to motions made under a statute as to actions; 11 Humphr. 423. Such statutes are in aid of the common law, and furnish a general rule for cases that are analogous in their subject-matter, but for which a remedy unknown to the common law has been provided by statutes; as where compensation is sought for land taken for a railroad; 23 Pa. 371; 32 Conn. 521.

But it must be remembered that in all such cases the debt is not discharged, though the right of action to enforce it may be gone; 13 U. S. App. 57. So, where a creditor has a lien on goods for a balance due, he may hold them, though the statute has run against his debt; 8 Esp. 81; 11 Conn. 160; 26 Me. 330; 28 Ill. 44. And an acceptor may retain funds to indemnify him against his acceptances, though the acceptances may have been outstanding longer than the time limited by statute; 3 Campb. 418.

A set-off of a claim against which the statute has run cannot usually be pleaded in bar; 5 East 16; 3 Johns. 261; 5 Gratt. 360; 14 Pa. 531; though when there are cross-demands accruing at nearly the same time, and the plaintiff has saved the statute by suing out process, the defendant will be allowed to set off his demand; 2 Esp. 569; 2 Green, N. J. L. 545; and, generally, when there is any equitable matter of defence in the nature of set-off, or which might be the subject of a cross-action, growing out of the subject-matter for which the action is brought, courts will permit it to be set up although a cross-action or an action on the claim in set-off might be barred by the statute; 8 Rich. S. C. 113; 9 Ga. 396; 11 E. L. & Eq. 10; 8 B. Monr. 580; 3 Stockt. 44. A set-off is barred by the statute only when the original claim is barred; 134 Ind. 494.

Debts by specialty, as contracts under seal, judgments of courts of record (except foreign judgments, and judgments of courts out of the state, upon which the decisions are very discordant), liabilities imposed by statute, awards under seal, or where the submission is under seal, indentures reserving rent, and actions for legacies, are affected only by the general limitation of twenty years; Ang. Lim. § 77. But a mortgage, though under seal, does not take the note, not witnessed, secured thereby, with it, out of the limitation of simple contracts; 7 Wend. 94. And though liabilities imposed by statute are specialties, a liability under a by-law made by virtue of a charter is not; 6 E. L. & Eq. 309; on the ground that by becoming a member of the company enacting the by-laws, the party consents and agrees to assume the liabilities imposed thereby.

In Massachusetts, Vermont, and Maine, the statute is regulated in its application to witnessed promissory notes. In Massachusetts an action brought by the payee of a witnessed promissory note, his executor or administrator, is excepted from the limitation of simple contracts, and is only barred by the lapse of twenty years. But the indorsee of such a note must sue within six years from the time of the transfer to him; 4 Pick. 384; though he may sue after that time in the name of the payee, with his consent; 1 Gray 261; 2 Curt. C. C. 448. If there are two promisees to the note, and the signature of only one is witnessed, the note as to the other is not a witnessed note; 115 Mass. 599; 18 Shepl. 49. And the attestation of the witness must be with the knowledge and consent of the maker of the note; 8 Pick. 246; 1 Williams Vt. 28. An attested indorsement signed by the promisee, acknowledging the note to be due, is not a witnessed note; 28 Pick. 282; but the same acknowledgment for value received, with a promise to pay the note, is; 1 Metc. Mass. 21. If the note be payable to the maker's own order, witnessed and indorsed by the maker in blank, the indorsement being without attestation, an action by the first indorsee is barred in six years; 4 Metc. Mass. 319. And even if the indorsement be attested, a second indorsee or holder by delivery, not being the original payee, is barred; 13 Metc. 128.

Statute bar avoided, when. Trusts in general are not within the operation of the statute, where they are direct and exclusively within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and the question arises between the trustees and the cestui que trust; 7 Johns. Ch. 90; 23 Pa. 472; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 53; 5 R. 1. 79; 9 Pick. 212. See 31 W. Va. 810; 149 Mass. 253. And of this character are the trusts of executors, administrators, guardians, assignees of insolvents, and the like. The claim or title of such trustees is that of the cestui que trust; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 608; 2 Sch. & L. 607, 633; 4 Whart. 177; 71 Pa. 106; 1 Johns. Ch. 314; 4 Pick. 288. The relation between directors and a corporation has the elements of an express trust, to which the statute does not apply; 20 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 671. Special limitations to actions at law are made in some states in favor of executors and administrators, modifying or abrogating the rule in equity; and as these laws are made in the interest of the trust funds, it is the duty of the executor or administrator to plead the special statute which applies to him as such, and protects the estate he represents, though he is not bound to plead the general statute; 13 Mass. 203; 15 N. H. 6; 15 S. & R. 231; 2 Dessaus. 577; 4 Wash. C. C. 639.

If, however, the trustee deny the right of his cestui que trust, and claim adversely to him, and these facts come to the knowledge of the cestui que trust, the statute will begin to run from the time when the facts become known; 9 Pick. 212; 10 Pet. 223; 22 Md. 142; 52 Mo. 182; 11 Pa. 207; 32 W. Va. 184; 143 U. S. 326. See 77 Cal. 330. Long lapse of time will defeat the enforcement of a resulting trust; 32 W. Va. 14. The rule exempting trusts from the operation of the statute does not apply to a resulting trust in favor of creditors; 30 Minn. 830; 116 Ind. 78.

Principal and agent. The relation of an agent to his principal is a fiduciary one, and the statute does not begin to run so long as there is no breach of the trust or duty; 85 Ky. 322. When, however, there is such a breach, and the principal has knowledge of it, the statute will begin to run; 3 Gill & J. 389; 5 Cra. 560; 4 Jones N. C. 153; 12 Barb. 293; 32 Conn. 520. In many cases a lawful demand upon the agent to perform his duty, and neglect or refusal to comply, are necessary to constitute a breach. As when money is placed in the hands of an agent with which to purchase property, and the agent neglects to make the purchase, there must be a demand for the money before the statute will begin to run; 5 Ired. 507; 6 Cow. 878; 24 Pa. 52; so where property is placed in the hands of an agent to be sold, and he neglects to sell; 2 Gill & J. 389. If, however, the agent's conduct is such as to amount to a declaration on his part that he will not perform his duty, or if he has disabled himself from performing it, it is tantamount to a repudiation of the trust, or an adverse claim against the cestui que trust, and the same consequences follow. No demand is necessary: the right of action accrues at once upon the declaration, and the statute then begins to run; 10 Gill & J. 422.

But where a demand is necessary, it should itself be made within the limited time; otherwise an agent might be subject all his lifetime to demands, however stale; 15 Wend. 302; 17 Mass. 145; 66 Pa. 192; unless the agent, by his own act, prevents a demand; 6 Cush. 501. The rendering an untrue account by a collection or other agent would seem to be such a breach of duty as to warrant an action without demand, and would therefore set the statute in motion; 17 Mass. 145. If the custom of trade or the law makes it the clear duty of an agent to pay over money collected without a demand, then if the principal has notice, the statute begins to run from the time of collection; and when there is no such custom or law, if the agent having funds collected gives notice to his principal, the statute will begin to run after the lapse of a reasonable time within which to make the demand, though no demand be made; 4 Sandf. 590.

In equity, as has been seen, fraud prac-

fied upon the plaintiff so that the fact of his right to sue does not come to his knowledge till after the expiration of the statute of limitations, is held to open the case so that he may bring his action within the time limited, dating from the discovery of the fraud; Blaph. Eq. 208; 83 Va. 451. But herein the courts proceed with great caution, and require not only a clear case of fraudulent concealment, but the absence of negligence on the part of the party seeking to obviate the statute limitation by the replication of fraud; 7 How. 819; 13 Pa. 49; 1 Curt. C. C. 390; 3 Denio 577; 11 Ohio 194; 20 N. H. 187. See 130 U. S. 505. The concealment must be something more than silence or mere general declarations or speeches; it must appear that some trick or artifice has been employed to prevent inquiry or elude investigation, or calculated to mislead or hinder the party from obtaining information by the use of ordinary diligence; or it must appear that the facts were misrepresented to or concealed from the party by some positive act or declaration when inquiry was made; 116 Ind. 78; 145 U. S. 317. In some states, fraudulent concealment of the cause of action is made by statute a cause of exemption from its effect in courts of law as well as of equity. And the courts construe the saving clause with great strictness, and hold that means of knowledge of the concealment are equivalent to knowledge in fact; 8 Allen 130; 39 Me. 404. In the absence of statutory provision, the admissibility of the replication of fraud in courts of law has been the subject of contradictory decisions in the different states. In New York (20 Johns. 80), in Virginia (4 Leigh 474), and in North Carolina (3 Murph. 115), it is inadmissible. But in the United States courts (12 Lean 185; 130 U. S. 684), Pennsylvania (1 S. & R. 128), Indiana (4 Blackf. 85), New Hampshire (8 Fost. 20), South Carolina (6 Rich. Eq. 130), Virginia (83 Va. 451), it is held to be admissible; 5 Mas. 143; and this is the rule generally prevalent in the United States.

Running accounts. Such accounts as concern the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant were by the original statute of James I. exempted from its operation. The earlier statutes of limitation in this country contained the same exception. But it has been very generally omitted in late revised codes. Among the accounts excepted from the operation of the statute all accounts current were early held to be included; 6 Term 189; if they contained upon either side any item upon which the right of action accrued within six years, whether the accounts were between merchant and merchant or other persons. And this construction of the law, based, as is said in some cases, upon the ground that such accounts come within the equity of the exception in respect to merchants' accounts, and in others upon the ground that every new item and credit in an account given by one party to another is an admission of there being some unsettled account between them, and as an acknowledgment, sufficient to take the case out of the statute, has taken the form of legislative enactment in many states in this country, and, in the absence of such enactment, has been generally followed by the courts; 20 Johns. 576; 6 Pick. 864; 6 Me. 808; 6 Conn. 246; 4 Rand. 488; 12 Pet. 800; 11 Gill & J. 213; 4 McCord 215; 3 Harr. N. J. 286; 5 Cra. 15; 1 Md. 383; 25 Pa. 296; 30 Cal. 126.

But there must be a reciprocity of dealing between the respective parties, and the accounts must be such that there may be a fair implication that it is understood that the items of one account are to be a set-off so far as they go, against the items of the other account; 2 Sumn. 410; 40 Mo. 244; 2 Halst. 357; 4 Cra. 696; 1 Edw. C. 417; 25 Pa. 296. Where the items of account are all on one side, as between a shopkeeper and his customer, or where goods are charged and payments credited, there is no mutuality, and the statute bars the account; 4 McCord 215; 1 Sandf. 220; 17 S. & R. 847; 18 Ala. 274. See 87 Fed. Rep. 394. And where, in the case of mutual account, after a statement, the balance has been struck and agreed upon, the statute at once applies to such balance as a distinct demand; 9 Saund. 135; 6 Me. 808; 1 Davels 294; 13 Pet. 800; 7 Cra. 147; unless it was made the first item of a new mutual account; 3 Pick. 96; 8 Cl. & F. 121; but see 54 Mo. App. 548.

The statute begins to run against mutual accounts from the date of the last credit and not from the last debit; 55 Vt. 387; and if the last item on either side of a mutual account is not barred, the whole account is saved from the operation of the statute; 115 Mo. 581; 27 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 214.

A closed account is not a stated account. In order to constitute the latter, an account must have been rendered by one party, and expressly or impliedly assented to by the other; 8 Pick. 187; 6 Me. 808; 13 Pet. 800. Accounts between merchant and merchant are exempted from the operation of the statute, if current and mutual, although no item appears on either side within six years; 19 Ves. 190; 2 Saund. 124; 8 Bligh 352; 6 Pick. 864; 5 Cra. 15; 13 Pa. 310; 1 Smith (Ind.) 217. A single transaction between two merchants is not within the exception; 17 Pa. 288; nor is an account between partners; 3 R. I. 87; 75 Cal. 566; nor an account between two joint-owners of a vessel; 10 B. Monr. 112; nor an account for freight under a charter-party, although both parties are merchants; 6 Pet. 151.

Surety. The statute begins to run against a surety paying a debt only from the time of payment; 99 N. C. 559; 83 Va. 751.

As to limitation in patent cases, see PATENTS.

New promise to pay debt barred. There is another important class of exceptions, not made by the statute, but by the courts, wherein, although the statutory limitation may have expired, parties bringing themselves within the exception have always been allowed to recover. In actions of assumpsit, a new express promise to pay, or an acknowledgment of existing indebtedness made under such circumstances as to be equivalent to a new promise and within six years before the time of action brought, will take the case out of the operation of the statute, although the original cause of action accrued more than six years before that time; Poll. Contr. 625; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 445. And this proceeds upon the ground that as the statutory limitation merely bars the remedy and does not discharge the debt, there is something more than a merely moral obligation to support the promise,—to wit, a pre-existent debt, which is a sufficient consideration for the new promise; 3 Mas. 151; 3 Gill 155; 19 Ill. 169; 26 Vt. 280; Ana. Contr. 100; 9 S. & R. 128; 35 Tenn. 561. The new promise upon this sufficient consideration constitutes, in fact, a new cause of action; 4 East 399; 6 Taunt. 210; 1 Pet. 351; Hare, Contr. 259.

This was undoubtedly a liberal construction of the statute; but it was early adopted, and has maintained itself, in the face of much adverse criticism, to the present time. While, however, at an early period there was an inclination of the courts to accept the slightest and most ambiguous expressions as evidence of a new promise, the spirit and tendency of modern decisions are towards greater strictness, and seem to be fairly expressed in the learned judgment of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351. "It has often been matter of regret, in modern times, that, in the construction of the statute of limitations, the decisions had not proceeded upon principles better adapted to carry into effect the real objects of the statute; that, instead of being viewed in an unfavorable light, as an unjust and discreditable defence, it had [not] received such support as would have made it, what it was intended to be, emphatically a statute of repose. It is a wise and beneficial law, not designed merely to raise a presumption of payment of a just debt from lapse of time, but to afford security against stale demands after the true state of the transactions may have been forgotten, or be incapable of explanation, by reason of the death or removal of witnesses. It has a manifest tendency to produce speedy settlement of accounts, and to suppress those prejudices which may rise up at a distance of time and baffle every honest effort to counteract or overcome them. Parol evidence may be offered of confessions (a species of evidence which, it has been often observed, it is hard to disprove and easy to fabricate) applicable to such remote times as may leave no means to trace the nature, extent, or origin of the claim, and thus open the way to the most oppressive charges. If we proceed one step further, and admit, that loose and general expressions, from which a probable or possible inference may be deduced of the acknowledgment of a debt by a court or jury, that, as the language of some cases has been, any acknowledgment, however slight, or any statement not amounting to a denial of the debt, that any admission of the existence of an unsettled account, without any specification of amount or balance, and however indeterminate and casual, are yet sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations, and let in evidence, alwunde, to establish any debt, however large and at whatever distance of time; it is easy to perceive that the wholesome objects of the statute must be in a great measure defeated, and the statute virtually repealed."

"If the bar is sought to be removed by the proof of a new promise, that promise, as a new cause of action, ought to be proved in a clear and explicit manner, and be in its terms unequivocal and determinate; and, if any conditions are annexed, they ought to be shown to be performed."

And to the same general purport are the following cases, although it is undeniable that in the application of the rule there seems in some cases to be a looseness and liberality which hardly comport with the rule; 32 Me. 200; 14 N. H. 423; 7 Hill N. Y. 45; 131 Pa. 649; 12 Ill. 146; 4 Fla. 481; 6 Ga. 486; 79 id. 700; 9 B. Monr. 614; 10 Ark. 184; 11 Ired. 445; 8 Gratt. 110; 20 Ala. n. s. 687; 4 Zab. 437; 12 Ill. 146; 4 Gray 600; 83 Vt. 9; 5 Nev. 206; 54 Pa. 172; 11 How. 493; 8 Fost. 26; 51 Minn. 482; 159 Mas. 245; 7 Misc. Rep. 284; 86 Tex. 560; 63 Va. 518.

The promise must be made to the party in interest or his agent, in order to toll the statute; 123 Pa. 358; as an acknowledgment to a third person and not intended to be communicated to the creditor will not suffice; 6 Mackey 485.

A new promise to pay the principal only does not except the interest from the operation of the statute; 29 Pa. 189. Nor does an agreement to refer take the claim out of the statute; 1 Sneed 444; nor the insertion, by an insolvent debtor, of an outlawed claim, in a schedule of his creditors required by law; 10 Pa. 129; 7 Gray 274 (but this is not so in Louisiana; 14 La. Ann. 612); 13 Metc. 470; nor an agreement not to take advantage of the statute; 29 Me. 47; 17 Pa. 232; 8 Md. 874; 9 Leigh 891. If such an agreement were valid, it might be made part of the contract, and thus the object of the law would be defeated; 32 Me. 169. Nor will a devise of property to pay debts exempt debts upon which the statute has run prior to the testator's death; 13 Ala. 611; 4 Pa. 56; 18 Gratt. 329; 4 Sandf. 427.

Nor, in general, will any statement of a debt, made officially, in pursuance of special legal requirement, or with another purpose than to recognize it as an existing debt; 12 E. L. & Eq. 191; 9 Cush. 390; 30 Me. 426; 32 Ala. 184. Nor will a deed of assignment made by the debtor for the payment of certain debts, and of his debts generally, and a partial payment by the assignor to a creditor; 1 R. I. 81; 6 E. L. & Eq. 520; nor the entry of a debt in an unsigned schedule of the debtor's liabilities, made for his own use; 30 Me. 425; nor an undelivered mortgage to secure a debt against which the statute has run, though duly executed, acknowledged and recorded; 6 Cush. 151. But if the mortgage be delivered, it will be a sufficient acknowledgment to exempt the debt secured thereby from the operation of the statute; 4 Cush. 559; 18 Conn. 337; 14

Tex. 672. And so will the answer to a bill in chancery which expressly sets forth the existence of such a debt; 4 Sandf. 427; 3 Gill 166. An acknowledgment by a mortgagor to a stranger of the existence of the debt secured by the mortgage, without an express promise to pay the debt, will not prevent the bar of the statute; 64 Cal. 854.

If there is any thing said to repel the inference of a promise, or inconsistent therewith, the statute will not be avoided; 1 Harr. & J. 219; 23 Pa. 452; 6 Pet. 86; 5 Blackf. 486; 11 La. Ann. 712; 14 Me. 800; 4 Mo. 100; 15 Wend. 187. A promise to pay is implied from an acknowledgment of a debt as an existing debt; 159 Mass. 245. "The account is due, and I supposed it had been paid, but did not know of its being ever paid," is no new promise; 8 Cra. 72. If the debtor admits that the debt is due, but intimates his purpose to avail himself of the bar of the statute, the acknowledgment is insufficient; 2 Dev. & B. 82; 2 Browne 85; 29 Conn. 457. So if he says he will pay if he owes, but denies that he owes; 8 Me. 97; 2 Pick. 868; 70 Tex. 327. So if he states his inability to pay; 23 Pick. 291; 18 N. H. 486. So if he admits the claim to have been once due, but claims that it is paid by an account against the claimant; 8 Fairf. 72; 5 Conn. 480; 11 Conn. 160. See 84 Wis. 240; 65 Vt. 287. "I am too unwell to settle now; when I am better, I will settle your account;" held insufficient; 9 Leigh 381. So of an offer to pay a part in order to get the claim out of the hands of the creditor; 2 Bail. So. C. 283; and of an admission that the account is right; 4 Dana 505. An indorsement on a note dated the day before it would outlaw, that "the within note shall not be outlawed," written and signed by the party thereto, will take it out of the statute; 67 Mich. 248; 94 id. 411; 85 Tenn. 678. Letters which merely acknowledge an indebtedness, but do not refer to any particular account, or mention the amount of the debt, and which are not written to serve as an acknowledgment, are not sufficient; 69 Miss. 225.

If the new promise is subject to conditions or qualifications, is indefinite as to time or amount, or as to the debt referred to, or in any other way limited or contingent, the plaintiff will be held to bring himself strictly within the terms of the promise, and to show that the condition has been performed, or the contingency happened, and that he is not excluded by any limitation, qualification, or uncertainty; 11 Wheat. 809; 8 Metc. 432; 15 Johns. 511; 8 Bingh. 638; 8 Hare 299; 85 Tenn. 214. If the promise be to pay when able, the ability must be proved by the plaintiff; 4 Esp. 86; 18 N. H. 446; 9 Pa. 410; 11 Barb. 254. But see 19 Vt. 808; 80 Ill. 429; 7 Hill 45; 15 Ga. 395; 85 Tenn. 214; 70 Tex. 718. So if it be to pay as soon as convenient, the convenience must be proved; 2 Cr. & M.; or, "if E will say that I have had the timber," the condition must be complied with; 1 Pick. 870.

And if there be a promise to pay in specific articles, the plaintiff must show that he offered to accept them; 8 Johns. 318. The vote of a town to appoint a committee to "settle the dispute" was held to be a conditional promise, requiring, to give it force as against the statute, proof that the committee reported something due; 11 Mass. 452. If the original promise be conditional, and the new promise absolute, the latter will not alter the former; 3 Wash. C. C. 404. But where the promise by A was to pay if the debtor could not prove that B had paid it, it was held that the onus was upon A to prove that B had paid it; 11 Ired. 445. The offer must be accepted altogether or rejected altogether. The liability of the defendant is to be tried by the test he has himself prescribed; 4 Leigh 603; 10 Johns. 85; 1 Gill & J. 497.

It must appear clearly that the promise is made with reference to the particular demand in suit; 6 Pet. 86; 6 Ga. 21; 1 Kay 650; 11 Ired. 86; though a general admission would seem to be sufficient, unless the defendant show that there were other demands between the parties; 4 Gray 606; 8 Gill 82; 19 Pa. 888; 23 Conn. 458. If the admission be broad enough to cover the debt in suit, according to some authorities, the plaintiff can prove the amount really due alunde. But the authorities are not at one on this point; 12 C. & P. 104; 6 N. H. 367; 23 Pick. 291; 27 Me. 433; 1 Pet. 351; 9 Leigh 381; 2 Dev. & B. 390; 23 Pa. 418.

Part payment of a debt is evidence of a new promise to pay the remainder; 2 Dougl. 552; 19 Vt. 28; 6 Barb. 583; 23 Or. 108. See 65 Hun 625. It is, however, but prima facie evidence, and may be rebutted by other evidence; 28 Vt. 642; 27 Me. 870; 4 Mich. 508; L. R. 7 Q. B. 493; 13 Wall. 254; 53 N. Y. 442; 83 Miss. 41; 5 Ark. 638; 7 Ind. App. 417. The payment must be voluntary and made with the intent that it should be applied upon the debt; 60 Vt. 453. Payment of the interest has the same effect as payment of part of the principal; 8 Bingh. 809; 7 Blackf. 537; 17 Cal. 574; 14 Pick. 887; 60 Vt. 566. And the giving a note for part of a debt; 2 Metc. 168; 40 Kan. 1; or for accrued interest, is payment; 13 Wend. 267; 6 Metc. 553; and so is a second mortgage given as payment of interest on the first mortgage; 75 Mich. 167; and so is the credit of interest in an account stated; 6 Johns. 287; and the delivery of goods on account; 4 Ad. & E. 71; 30 Me. 253; 11 How. 493. But the payment of a dividend by the assignee of an insolvent debtor is no new promise to pay the remainder; 7 Gray 387; 6 E. L. & Eq. 520; and it has been held by respectable authorities that new part payment is no new promise, but that in order to take the case out of the statute, the payment must be made on account of a sum admitted to be due, accompanied with a promise to pay the remainder; 6 M. & W. 824; 6 E. L. & Eq. 520; 20 Miss. 663; 7 Gray 274. Payments of part of the sum sued for do not take the case out of the statute, when the evidence does not show that at the time of such payment, the party knew that he owed the sum in suit and the payments were apparently made on account of bills that accrued after the accrual of the debt in suit; 141 N. Y. 489. And a payment intended to cover the whole amount due is ineffectual as part payment to defeat the operation of the statute; 5 Misc. Rep. 213.

Part payment by a surety in the presence of his principal, and without dissent, is payment by the principal; 2 Fost. 219; but part payment by the surety after the statute has barred the debt, is not a new promise to pay the other part; 18 B. Monr. 643. A payment by the maker of a note cannot be relied on to take the note out of the statute as to the surety; 43 Ill. App. 801. A general payment on account of a debt for which several notes were given, without direction as to the application of the payment, may be applied by the creditor to either of the notes, so as to take the note to which the payment is applied out of the statute; but the payment cannot be apportioned to the several notes with the same effect; 19 Vt. 28; 81 E. L. & Eq. 55; 1 Gray 630. With respect to promissory notes and bonds, the general proof of part payment or of interest is the indorsement thereon; 1 Ad. & E. 102; 9 Pick. 42; 42 Barb. 18; 17 Johns. 182. But it must be made bona fide, and with the privity of the debtor; 2 Campb. 821; 7 Wend. 408; 45 Mass. 678; 4 Leigh 519.

The payment may be made to an agent, or even a stranger not authorized to receive it, but erroneously supposed to be authorized. It is as much an admission of the debt as if made to the principal himself; 1 Bingh. 480; 10 B. & C. 122. And so with reference to acknowledgments or new promises; 4 Pick. 110; 11 Me. 152; 21 Barb. 351; 86 Iowa 576; 19 Ill. 189. And the weight of authority is in favor of the rule that part payment of a witnessed note or bond will avoid the statute; 80 Me. 164; 9 B. Monr. 438; 12 Mo. 94; 18 Ark. 621. Whether the new promise or payment, if made after the debt is barred by the statute, will remove the bar, is also a mooted point, the weight of authority perhaps being in favor of the negative; 14 Pick. 887; 10 Ala. n. s. 959; 18 Miss. 564; 2 Comst. 523; 2 Kern. 635; 13 La. Ann. 353, 635; 14 Ark. 199. In Ohio it is so, by statute; 17 Ohio 9. For the affirmative, see 18 Vt. 440; 20 Me. 176; 5 Ired. 341; 2 Tex. 501; 8 Humphr. 656; 47 Pa. 383; 6 Barb. 588.

It was long held that an acknowledgment or part payment by one of several joint contractors would take the claim out of the statute as to the other joint contractors; Steph. Ev. § 17; 2 Greenl. Ev. 438; 9 H. Bla. 340; and such is the law in some parts of the Union; 4 Pick. 382; 25 Vt. 560; 19 Conn. 87; 1 R. I. 88; 8 Munf. 240; 1 M. Cord 541; 7 Ired. 518; 80 Me. 810; 45 Miss. 367; 18 N. Y. 559. See 85 Wis. 328. But in other courts the contrary rule prevails; 1 Pet. 351; 6 N. H. 124; 7 Yerg. 534; 1 M. Mullin 297; 13 Md. 223; 17 S. & R. 136; 41 Ala. 232. See 69 Md. 499.

An acknowledgment or part payment made by an agent acting within the scope of his authority is, upon the familiar maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, an acknowledgment or part payment by the principal; see Tayl. Ev. 606; and hence if a partner has been appointed specially to settle the affairs of a dissolved partnership, his acknowledgment or part payment by virtue of his authority as such agent will take the claim out of the statute; 6 Johns. 287; 1 Pet. 351; 30 Me. 347; 8 S. & R. 845; as will part payment by a partner without special authority; 168 Mass. 814. A written acknowledgment to take a barred demand out of the statute must be made to the creditor or his agent, and it must be made with knowledge of his agency; 60 Mo. App. 194. And the wife may be such agent as to a claim for goods sold to her during the absence of her husband; 8 Bing. 119; but a wife during coverture, not made specially or by implication of law an agent, cannot make a new promise effectual to take a claim to which she was a party dum sola out of the statute; 1 B. & C. 248; 24 Vt. 89; 12 E. L. & Eq. 898; notwithstanding the coverture be removed before the expiration of six years after the alleged promise; 2 Pa. 450.

Nor is the husband an agent for the wife for such a purpose; 15 Vt. 471; but he is an agent for the wife, payee of a note given to her dum sola, to whom a new promise or part payment may be made; 6 Q. B. 987; nor is the widow of the maker of notes, although she made payments before the cause of action was barred; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 438. So a new promise to an executor or administrator is sufficient; 8 Mass. 184; 17 Johns. 330; 7 Comst. 179; and the weight of authority seems to be in favor of the binding force of a promise or part payment made by an executor or administrator; 12 Cush. 324; 12 B. Monr. 403; 9 Ala. 503; 17 Ga. 96; 9 E. L. & Eq. 80; 10 Md. 242; 4 B. Monr. 36; particularly if the promise be express; 15 Johns. 8; 15 Me. 880; 86 N. J. L. 44. But see contrary; 7 Ind. 442; 9 Md. 817; 14 Tex. 813; 35 Pa. 259; 11 Sm. & M. 9; 7 Conn. 172; see 12 Wheat. 565. A promise by the life tenant to pay taxes may be relied upon as against a remainderman, to remove the bar of the statute; 77 Md. 582.

To put an end to all litigation in England as to the effect of a new promise or acknowledgment, it was enacted by stat. 9 Geo. IV. c. 14, commonly known as Lord Tenterden's Act, that the new promise or acknowledgment by words only, in order to be effectual to take a case out of the statute of limitations, should be in writing, signed by the party chargeable thereby; and this statute has been substantially adopted by most of the states in this country. This statute affects merely the mode of proof. The same effect is to be given to the words reduced to writing as would, before the passage of the statute, have been given to them when proved by oral testimony; 7 Bingh. 163. See 76 Ga. 371. If part payment is alleged, "words only," admitting the fact of payment, though not in writing, are admissible to strengthen the proof of the fact of payment; 3 Gale & D. 59. See Ang. Lim. § 396.

In construing these statutes it has been held that the return, under citation, by an administrator of the maker of a note, showing the note as one of his intestate's debts, is in writing within the meaning of this statute; 13 Sim. 17; and so is the entry by an insolvent debtor of the debt in his schedule of liabilities; 13 Metc. 470. It was held in the last case that the mere entry was not in itself a sufficient acknowledgment, but being in writing, within the meaning of the statute, it might be used with other written evidence to prove a new promise. But the making one note and tendering it in payment of another is not a new promise in writing; 8 Cush. 353; not even if the note be delivered, if it be re-delivered to the maker for the purpose of restoring matters between the parties to the state they were in before the note was given; 1 Metc. 394. An entry in a ledger of a balance due the owner's wife, made by the husband or under his direction, is such an admission that the amount is due as will raise an implied promise to pay the same and will bar the statute; 47 Ill. App. 20; but see 140 N. Y. 150.

A and B had an unsettled account. In 1845, A signed the following: "It is agreed that B, in his general account, shall give credit to A for £10, for books delivered in 1834." Held, no acknowledgment in writing, so as to give B a right to an account against A's estate more than six years before A's death; 35 E. L. & Eq. 195. The writing must be signed by the party himself. The signature of the husband's name by the wife, though at his request, is not a signing by the party to be charged; 2 Bingh. N. C. 778. Nor is the signature by a clerk sufficient; 8 Scott 147. Nor is a promise in the handwriting of the defendant sufficient; it must be signed by him; 13 Ad. & E. 493. And a request by the defendant to the plaintiff to get certain moneys due the defendant from third parties, does not charge the party making the request, because it is not apparent that the defendant intended to render himself personally liable; 8 Ad. & E. 221; 5 C. & P. 209. Since this statute, mutual accounts will not be taken out of the operation of the statute by any item on either side, unless the item be the subject of a new promise in writing; 2 Cr. M. & R. 45; 116 Mass. 529. The effect of part payment is left by the statute as before; 10 B. & C. 122. And the fact of part payment, it is now held, contrary to some earlier cases, may be proved by unsigned written evidence; 4 E. L. & Eq. 514; or by oral testimony; 9 Metc. 482.

AS TO REAL PROPERTY AND RIGHTS. The general if not universal limitation of the right to bring an action or to make entry, is to twenty or twenty-one years after the right to enter or to bring the action accrues, i. e. to twenty or twenty-one years after the cause of action accrues. As the rights and interests of different parties in real property are various, and attach at different periods, and successively, it follows that there may be a right of entry in a particular person, accruing after the expiration of antecedent rights at a period from the beginning of the adverse possession, much exceeding twenty or twenty-one years.

Thus, if an estate be limited to one in tail, and the tenant in tail be barred of his remedy by the statute, yet, as the statute only affects the remedy, and the right or estate still exists, the right of entry in the remainder man does not accrue until the failure of the issue of the tenant in tail, which may not happen for many years. The estate still existing in the tenant in tail or his issue supports and keeps alive the remainder man's right of action till the expiration of twenty years after his right of entry accrues; 1 Burr. 60; 3 Binn. 874; 5 Bro. P. C. 689; 15 Mass. 471.

The laches of the owner of a prior right in an estate cannot prejudice the owner of a subsequently accruing right in the same estate; 4 Johns. 800; 8 Cruise, Dig. 408; 3 Stark. Ev. 887. And where there exist two distinct rights of entry in the same person, he may claim under either. He is not obliged to enter under his earlier right; 1 Pick. 818; 5 C. & P. 568; 29 Ga. 353; 2 Gill & J. 178.

Where it is necessary to prove that an actual entry has been made upon the land within a certain time before bringing suit, such entry must be proved to have been made upon the land in question; 3 Me. 316; Doug. 477; 4 Cra. 387; 11 Gill & J. 289; unless prevented by force or fraud, when a bona fide attempt is equivalent; 4 Johns. 389. If the land lie in two counties, there must be an entry in each county; though if the land be all in one county an entry upon part, with a declaration of claim to the whole, is sufficient; Co. Litt. 419; 3 Johns. Cas. 115. The intention to claim the land is essential to the sufficiency of the entry; and whether this intention has existed is to be left in each case to the jury; 9 Watts 567; 4 Wash. C. C. 387; 21 Ga. 113; 27 Ala. 884. An entry may be made by the guardian for his ward, by the remainder man or reversioner for the tenant, and the tenant for the reversioner or remainder man, being parties having privity of estate; 9 Co. 106; 2 Pa. 180. So a cestui que trust may enter for his trustee; 1 Ld. Raym. 716; and an agent for his principal; 11 Pa. 212; even without original authority, if the act be adopted and ratified; 9 Pa. 40. And the entry of one joint-tenant, coparcener, or tenant in common will inure to the benefit of the other; 10 Watts 296.

Adverse possession for the necessary statutory period gives title against the true owner; but it must be open, uninterrupted, and with intent to claim against the true owner. The possession must be an actual occupation, so open that the true owner ought to know it and must be presumed to know it, and in such manner and under such circumstances as amount to an invasion of his rights, thereby giving him cause of action; 11 Gill & J. 371; 5 Cow. 219; 2 Pa. 438; 9 Cush. 476; 5 Pet. 438; 4 Wheat. 230; 149 Mass. 201; in Pennsylvania this rule has been announced with special distinctness. "The owner of land," says the supreme court in 1 Watts 341, "can only be barred by such possession as has been actual, continued, visible, notorious, distinct, and hostile or adverse." See 95 Mich. 410; 97 Ala. 588; 144 U. S. 533; 69 Tex. 375; 39 Kan. 706; 84 Ky. 124; 23 Neb. 75.

Title by adverse possession for a period such as is required by statute to bar an action is a fee simple title, and is as effective as any otherwise acquired; 7 Mackey 1. See 144 U. S. 638.

A possession not actual, but constructive, not exclusive, but in participation with the owner or others, falls short of that kind of adverse possession which deprives the true owner of his title; 150 U. S. 597.

Adverse possession must be open, so that the owner may know it or might know of it. Many acts of occupation would be unequivocal, such as fencing the land or erecting a house on it; 7 Wheat. 59; 5 Pet. 402; 42 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 915; actual improvement and cultivation of the soil; 1 Johns. 156; building on land and putting a fence around it; 6 Pick. 172; digging stones and cutting timber from time to time; 14 East 332; 6 S. & R. 21; driving piles into the soil covered by a mill-pond, and thereon erecting a building; 6 Mass. 229; cutting roads into a swamp, and cutting trees and making shingles therefrom; 1 Ired. 56; and setting fish-traps in a non-navigable stream, building dams across it, and using it every year during the entire fishing-season for the purpose of catching fish; 1 Ired. 535. But entering upon unclosed flats, when covered by the tide, and sailing over them with a boat or vessel for the ordinary purposes of navigation, is not an adverse possession; 1 Cush. 395; though the filling up the flats, and building a wharf there, and using the same, would be if the use were exclusive; 1 Cush. 313; 10 Bosw. 249; nor is the entering upon a lot and marking its boundaries by splitting the trees; 14 N. H. 101; nor the getting rails and other timber for a few weeks each year from timber-land; 4 Jones 296; nor the overflowing of land by the stoppage of a stream; 4 Dev. 158; nor the survey, allotment, and conveyance of a piece of land, and the recording of the deed; unless there is open occupation; 22 Me. 29. As a rule the nature of the acts necessary to constitute adverse possession varies with the region and character of the ground. If the latter is uncultivated and the region sparsely populated, much less unequivocal acts are necessary on the part of the adverse holder.

It must be continuous for the whole period. If one trespasser enters and leaves, and then another trespasser, a stranger to the former and without purchase from or respect to him, enters, the possession is not continuous; 84 Pa. 88; 17 How. 601; 4 Md. 143; 30 Mo. 99; 20 Pick. 465; 10 Johns. 475; 71 Tex. 438; 38 Minn. 122. But a slight connection of the latter with the former trespasser, as by a purchase by parol contract, will be sufficient to give the possession continuity; 6 Pa. 355; 1 Meigs 613; 81 Me. 533; 23 Ohio St. 42; 1 Term 448. And so will a purchase at a sale or execution; 5 Pa. 126; 24 How. 284. To give continuity to the possession by successive occupants, there must be privity of estate; 5 Metc. Mass. 15; Ang. Lim. § 414; and such a privity that each possession may be referred to one and the same entry; as that of a tenant to his landlord, or of the heir of a disseisor to his ancestor; 1 Rice 10. It is not essential that one and the same person shall have been all the while the adverse holder, if the latter succeeds to the asserted rights of the preceding holders or occupants as grantee or transferee; 85 Ala. 504.

An administrator's possession may be connected with that of his intestate; 11 Humphr. 457; and that of a tenant holding under the ancestor, with that of the heir; Cheeves 200. In some states, however, it is held that whether the possession be held uniformly under one title, or at different times under different titles, can make no difference, provided the claim of title is always adverse; as in Connecticut; 3 Day 289; and in Kentucky; 1 A. K. Marsh 4.

The possession must be adverse. If it be permissive; 3 Jac. & W. 1; or by mistake; 8 Watts 230; or unintentional; 11 Mass. 296; or confessedly in subordination to another's right; 5 B. & Ald. 223; 9 Wheat. 241; 4 Wend. 539; 6 Pa. 210; 9 Metc. 418; 8 Shepl. 240; 2 Ad. & E. 520; it does not avail to bar the statute. The possession of a life tenant and those claiming under him, or subject to his control, is not adverse to those entitled in remainder; 37 W. Va. 631. If the occupation is such and by such a person that it may be for the true owner, it will be presumed to be for him, unless it be shown that the adverse claimant gave notice that he held adversely and not in subordination; 1 Batt. Ch. 873; 5 Burr. 2804. And this notice must be clear and unequivocal. If the act of the tenant or adverse claimant may be a trespass as well as a disseisin, the true owner may elect which he will consider it, regardless of the wishes of the trespasser, who cannot be allowed to qualify his own wrong; 1 Burr. 60; 3 Pick. 675; 12 Mass. 325; 4 Mas. 339. So that if the adverse claimant sets up his trespasses as amounting to adverse possession, the owner may reply they are no disseisin, but trespasses only; while, on the other hand, the true owner may elect, if he pleases, for the sake of his remedy, to treat them as a disseisin; 19 Me. 333; 8 N. H. 67. This is called a disseisin by election, in distinction from a disseisin in fact, — a distinction which was taken for the benefit of the owner of the land. Whenever the act done of itself necessarily works an actual disseisin, it is a disseisin in fact; as, when a tenant for years or at will conveys in fee. On the other hand, those acts which are susceptible of being made a disseisin by election are no disseisin till the election of the owner makes them so; 1 Johns. Cas. 86.

Evidence of adverse possession must be strictly construed and every presumption is in favor of the true owner; 73 Wis. 463. The statute does not begin to run in favor of the possession of public land until the title passes from the United States; 97 Mo. 524; 50 Ark. 141; there is no adverse possession against the state; 84 Va. 701.

The claim by adverse possession must have some definite boundaries; 1 Metc. Mass. 528; 10 Johns. 447; 10 S. & R. 834; 4 Vt. 153; 8 H. & S. 18. There ought to be something to indicate to what extent the adverse possessor claims. A sufficient inclosure will establish the limits, without actual continued residence on the land; 8 S. & R. 291; 14 Johns. 405; 3 H. & M.H. 595; 10 Mass. 93; 4 Wheat. 213. But it must be an actual, visible, and substantial inclosure; 7 N. H. 436; 2 Aik. 864; 4 Bibb 455. An inclosure on three sides, by a trespasser as against the real owner, is not enough; 8 Ma. 289; 5 Md. 256; nor is an unsubstantial brush fence; 10 N. H. 897; 39 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 747; nor one formed by the lapping of fallen trees; 3 Metc. Mass. 125; 2 Johns. 230. Natural barriers may be a sufficient enclosure; 75 Cal. 584. And where the claim is by possession only, without any color or pretence of title, it cannot extend beyond the actual limits of the inclosure; 8 H. & M.H. 821; 5 Conn. 305; 28 Vt. 142; 6 Ind. 278. And this must be fixed, not roving from part to part; 11 Pet. 58. Possession and occupancy of land not enclosed by a fence may be adverse; 71 Mich. 891.

Extension of the inclosure within the time limited will not give title to the part included in the extension; 2 H. & J. 391; 8 Ill. 238. Where, however, the claim rests upon color of title as well as possession, the possession will be regarded as coextensive with the powers described in the title-deed; 11 Pet. 41; 3 Mas. 880; 8 Ired. 578; 2 Ill. 181; 13 Johns. 406; 5 Dana 232; 4 Mass. 416; 23 Cal. 481; unless the acts or declarations of the occupant restrict it. But the constructive possession of land arising from color of title cannot be extended to that part of it whereof there is no actual adverse possession; 28 Pa. 124; 16 B. Monr. 472; 7 Watts 442; nor will a subsequent conflicting possession, whether under color of title or not, be extended by construction beyond the limits of the actual adverse possession for the purpose of defeating a prior constructive possession; 6 Cow. 677; 11 Vt. 531. Nor can there be any constructive adverse possession against the owner when there has been no actual possession which he could treat as a trespass and bring suit for; 3 Rich. 101. A trespasser who afterwards obtains color of title can claim constructively only from the time when the title was obtained; 16 Johns. 298. If one by mistake enclose the land of another, and claim it as his own to certain fixed monuments or boundaries, his actual and uninterrupted possession as owner for the statutory period will work a disseisin, and his title will be perfect; 25 Neb. 764; 75 Cal. 610; 87 Tenn. 575.

This doctrine of constructive possession, however, applies only to land taken possession of for the ordinary purpose of cultivation and use, and not to a case where a few acres are taken possession of in an uncultivated township for the mere purpose of thereby gaining title to the entire township; 22 Vt. 888; 1 Cow. 286; 6 B. Monr. 468; 14 Vt. 400.

In fine, with a little relaxation of strictness in the case of wild, remote, and uncultivated lands, the sort of possession necessary to acquire title is adverse, open, public, and notorious, and not clandestine and secret; possession, exclusive, uninterrupted, definite as to boundaries, and fixed as to its locality.

Color of title is anything in writing, however defective, connected with the title, which serves to define the extent of the claim; 2 Cal. 183; 21 How. 498; 30 Ill. 279; 34 Wis. 435; 16 N. H. 874; 19 Ga. 8; 17 Or. 532; and it may exist even without writing, if the facts and circumstances show clearly the character and extent of the claim; 17 Ill. 496; Ang. Lim. § 404.

It exists wherever there is a reasonable doubt regarding the validity of an apparent title, whether such doubt arises from the circumstances under which the land is held, the identity of the land conveyed, or the construction of the instrument under which the party in possession claims title; 148 U. S. 301.

A fraudulent deed, if accepted in good faith, gives color of title; 8 Pet. 244; so does a defective deed; 4 H. & M.H. 222; 6 Wisc. 527; unless defective in defining the limits of the land; 1 Cow. 276; so does an improperly executed deed, if the grantor believes he has title thereby; 6 Metc. 837; so does a sheriff's deed; 7 B. Monr. 236; 22 Ga. 56; 7 Hill 476; and a deed from a collector of taxes; 4 Ired. 164; 24 Ill. 577; 143 id. 265; 37 Neb. 853; 7 Wash. 617; 132 U. S. 239; unless defective on its face; 29 Wisc. 256; 87 Mo. 356; but see 77 Cal. 485; and a deed from an attorney who has no authority to convey; 2 Murph. 14; 28 N. Y. 9; and a deed founded on a voidable decree in chancery; 1 Meigs 207; and a deed, by one tenant in common, of the whole estate, to a third person; 4 D. & B. 54; 2 Head 674; and a deed by an infant; 4 D. & B. 289; And a deed made by a husband and wife of the wife's interest in a former husband's estate; 132 Ind. 546.

So possession, in good faith, under a void grant from the state, gives color of title; 4 Ga. 115. And if A purchases under an execution against B, takes a deed, and on the same day conveys to B, though the purchase and conveyance be at the request of B, and no money is paid, B has a colorable title; 4 D. & B. 201; 7 Humphr. 367. A will gives color of title; but if it has but one subscribing witness, and has never been proved, it does not; 5 Ired. 711. Nor does the sale by an administrator of the land of his solvent intestate, under a license of the probate court, unless accompanied by a deed from the administrator; 34 N. H. 544; 13 Md. 105. Nor does the sale of property by an intestate to his son, of which the possession is held by the wife, who is administratrix, while the son lives in the family, as against the intestate's creditors; 80 Miss. 472. A person taking possession under a judicial sale has color of title, though the judicial proceedings were void; 184 Ind. 288; 87 W. Va. 215.

If there is no written title, then the possession must be under a bona fide claim to a title existing in another; 8 Watts 72. Thus, if under an agreement for the sale of land the consideration be paid and the purchaser enter, he has color of title; 5 Metc. Mass. 173; 10 Post. 581; 87 Miss. 188; 86 Ala. 308; 2 Strobb. 24; 12 Tex. 195; 17 Ga. 600; though if the consideration be not paid, or be paid only in part, he has not; 2 Bail. 59; 11 Ohio 455; 20 Ga. 811; 2 Dutch. 351; because the fair inference in such case is that the purchaser is in by consent of the grantor, and holds subordinately to him until the payment of the full consideration. There is, in fact, a mutual understanding, and a mutual confidence, amounting to an implied trust; 9 Wheat. 241; 12 Mass. 825; 1 Wash. C. C. 207; 1 Spear 291.

In New York, a parol gift of land is said not to give color of title; 1 Johns. Cas. 86; but it is at least doubtful if that is the law of New York; 6 Cow. 677; see also 5 id. 346; 8 id. 589; 9 id. 580. In a later case it is said that to avoid a deed given by one out of possession, the party in possession must hold adversely, "claiming under a title" and not "under a claim of title"; 89 Barb. 513. In some other states, a parol gift is held to give color of title if accompanied by actual entry and possession. It manifests, equally with a sale, the intent of the donee to enter, and not as tenant; and it equally proves an admission on the part of the donor that the possession is so taken; 13 Conn. 237; 2 B. Monr. 283; 39 Conn. 98; 52 Mo. 106; 87 Miss. 188; 15 Ark. 1; 4 Allen 425; 82 N. J. L. 289; but see, contra, 24 Ga. 494. The element of good faith, and the actual belief on the part of the claimant that he has title, give the claimant by color of title his advantage over the mere trespasser, who, as we have seen, is restricted carefully to his actual occupation; and it may be said, generally, that whenever the facts and circumstances show that one in possession, in good faith and in the belief that he has title, holds for himself and to the exclusion of all others; his possession must be adverse, and according to his assumed title, whatever may be his relations in point of interest or priority, to others; 5 Pet. 440; 1 Paine 467; 11 Pet. 41. When a man enters under such a claim of title, his entry on a part is an entry on the whole; but if he claims no such title he has no seisin by his entry but by the ouster of him who was seised, which can only be by the actual and exclusive occupation of the land; 4 Mass. 416. See Wood. Lim. § 259.

In cases of mixed possession, or a possession at the same time by two or more persons, each under a separate colorable title, the seisin is in him who has the better or prior title; 4 Wheat. 213; 20 How. 235; 8 Wend. 149; for, though there may be a concurrent possession, there cannot be a concurrent seisin; and, one only being seised, the possession must be adjudged to be in him, because he has the better right; 10 Mass. 151; 3 S. & R. 509; 1 D. & B. 5. Of course, in such a case, if one has color of title, and the other is a mere trespasser or intruder, the possession is in him who has color of title; 2 Harr. & J. 112; 4 S. & R. 463; 5 Du. 272. The possession of the true owner must prevail over the claim by constructive possession by one who holds under mere color of title; 69 Tex. 846. No length of possession of one partner of real estate paid for with partnership funds and conveyed to him, bars the other partners; 185 U. S. 621.

But, with all the liberality shown by the courts in giving color of title, it has been denied that a grant from a foreign government confers it, on the ground that the possession under such a title was rather a question between governments than individuals; 3 H. & M.H. 621. Thus, the courts of New York have refused to recognize claims under a grant of the French government in Canada, made prior to the treaty between Great Britain and France in 1763; 4 Johns. 163; 12 id. 305; as conferring color of title. But the soundness of the exception has since been questioned in the same court; 8 Cow. 589; and the grant of another state has been expressly held to give color of title in Pennsylvania, even as against one claiming under her own grant; 2 Watts 37. For political reasons, it has been held that a grant from the Indians gives no color of title; 8 Wheat. 571; nor does a grant by an Indian in contravention of a statute; 41 Fed. Rep. 705; but a sheriff's deed for land in the Southern Confederacy was held to give color of title; 10 Fed. Rep. 531. See COLOR OF TITLE.

One joint-tenant, tenant in common, or coparcener cannot dismise another but by actual ouster, as the seisin and possession of one are the seisin and possession of all, and inure to the benefit of all; 2 Salk. 422; 7 Wheat. 59; 12 Metc. 357; 11 Gratt. 505; 3 S. & R. 881; 4 Day 473; 116 Ind. 103; 16 Or. 173; actual ouster implies exclusion or expulsion. No force is necessary; but there must be a denial of the right of the cotenant; 5 Burr. 2604; 9 Cow. 580; 22 Tex. 663; 1 Me. 89; 12 Wend. 404; and, like a grant, after long lapse of time it may be presumed; 1 East 566; 3 Metc. 101; 29 Wisc. 226; and inferred from acts of an unequivocal character importing a denial; 8 Watts 77; 1 Me. 89; 8 A. K. Marsh. 77; 97 Mo. 426; 16 Or. 173; 87 Minn. 358; 62 Va. 759; 98 N. C. 307; 78 Ga. 142; 74 Iowa 859; but the possession of the grantee of one tenant in common is adverse to all; 13 B. Monr. 436; 4 Paige 178.

The possession of the tenant is likewise the possession of his landlord, and cannot be adverse unless he distinctly renounce his landlord's title; 2 Campb. 11; 2 Binn. 468; 10 N. Y. 9; 8 Pet. 43; 6 Watts 500; 7 Mont. 286; 84 Ala. 588; id. 206; 113 N. Y. 269; 40 La. Ann. 638; 70 Tex. 647.

Mere non-payment of rent during the time limited, there having been no demand, does not prejudice the landlord's right to enter and demand it, even though the lease contains a clause giving the right of re-entry in case of non-payment of rent; 5 Cow. 138; 7 East 299; see 110 N. Y. 537; and payment of rent is conclusive evidence that the occupation of the party paying was permissive and not adverse; 8 B. & C. 185; 19 L. J. N. s. Q. B. 336. The defendant in execution after a sale is a quasi tenant at will to the purchaser; and his possession is not therefore adverse; 1 Johns. Cas. 153; 3 Mass. 198. And a mere holding over after the expiration of a lease does not change the character of the possession; 2 Gill & J. 173; nor does the assignment of the lease, or a sub-letting. The assignee and sub-lessees are still tenants, so far as the title by adverse possession is concerned; 4 S. & R. 467; 8 Pet. 48; 6 Cow. 731.

If the tenant convey the premises, as we have before seen, the landlord may treat the grantee as a dispossessor by election; but the grantee cannot set up the act as the basis of a title by adverse possession; 5 Cow. 128; unless in the case where the relation of landlord and tenant subsists by operation of law; as where one makes a grant and by the omission of the word "heirs" an estate for life only passes. In such case, after the death of the tenant for life an adverse possession may commence; 7 Cow. 838. So in case the tenant has attained to a third person and the landlord has assented to the attornment; 6 Cow. 138; 4 How. 289; 10 Sm. & M. 440; 4 Gilman. 586. But a mere parol disclaimer, by the lessor, of the existence of the relationship, and of all right in the premises, is not equivalent to an attornment. To admit such disclaimer would lead to fraud and perjury, and is in direct violation of the principles of the statute of frauds; 7 Johns. 186; 5 Cow. 74; but see 18 S. & R. 183.

The possession of one's agent is, within the purview of the statute of limitation, the possession of his principal; 37 Neb. 368. See 112 Mo. 527; 147 U. S. 508.

The possession of the mortgagor is not adverse to the mortgagee (the relation being in many respects analogous to that of landlord and tenant); 3 Pet. 43; 4 Cra. 415; 11 Mass. 125; 30 Miss. 49; 27 Pa. 504; Dougl. 275; see 112 Mo. 527; not even if the possession be under an absolute deed, if intended as a mortgage; 19 How. 289. The relation of mortgagor and mortgagee is very peculiar and en sui generis. It is sometimes like a tenancy for years; Cro. Jac. 659; sometimes like a tenancy at will; Dougl. 275; and sometimes like a tenancy on sufferance; 1 Salk. 245; but, whatever it may be like, it is always presumed to be by permission of the mortgagee until the contrary be shown. The assignee of the mortgagor, with notice, is in the same predicament as the mortgagor; but if he purchase without notice, and particularly if the mortgage be forfeited at the date of his purchase, his possession will be adverse; 19 Vt. 526; 6 B. Mon. 479; 2 Sandf. 636; 34 Mo. 285; 32 Miss. 312; 19 How. 289.

But, although the possession of the mortgagor be not adverse so as to give title under the statute against the mortgagee, the courts have nevertheless practically abrogated this rule, by holding that where the mortgagor has held during the statutory limit, and has meantime paid no interest nor otherwise recognized the rights of the mortgagee, this raises a presumption that the debt has been paid, and is a good defence in an action to foreclose; 12 Johns. 242; 9 Wheat. 497; 8 Metc. 87. And the reasons for so holding seem to be equally cogent with those upon which rests the well-settled rule that, with certain exceptions, the mortgagee's possession for the time limited bars the mortgagor's right to redeem; 2 J. & W. 434; 6 E. L. & Eq. 355; 1 Johns. Ch. 385; 9 Wheat. 489; 8 Harr. & M'H. 328; 2 Sumn. 401; 18 Ala. 246; 20 Me. 269.

The exceptions to this rule are—first, where an account has been settled within the limited time; 2 Vern. 877; 5 Bro. C. C. 187; 5 Johns. Ch. 523; second, where within that time the mortgagee, by words spoken or written, or by deed, has clearly and unequivocally recognized the fact that he held as mortgagee; 2 Bro. 397; 18 Sm. & Stu. 847; 1 Johns. Ch. 594; 10 Wheat. 152; 8 Sumn. 160; by which recognition a subsequent purchaser, with actual or constructive notice of the mortgage, is barred; 7 Paige Ch. 465; third, where no time is fixed for payment, as in the case of a mortgage where the mortgagee is by agreement to enter and hold till he is paid out of the rents and profits; 1 Vt. 418; fourth, where the mortgagor continues in possession of the whole or of any part of the premises; Sel. Cas. Ch. 55; 1 Johns. Ch. 594; 1 Neb. 842; and, fifth, where there is fraud on the part of the mortgagee, or at the time of the inception of the mortgage he has taken advantage of the necessities of the mortgagor; 1 Johns. Cas. 402, 595; 3 Cruise 161.

The trustee of real estate, under an express trust, as well as of personal, as we have seen, holds for his cestui que trust, and the latter is not barred of his right unless it be denied and repudiated by the trustee; in which case the statute will begin to run from the denial or repudiation; 5 How. 238; 3 Gray 1; 2 McLean 376; 32 W. Va. 184; 126 Ill. 58. In cases of implied, constructive, and resulting trusts, the rule is also the same as with reference to personal property. The statute is a bar even in cases where the conduct of the trustee was originally fraudulent; 5 Johns. Ch. 184; 17 Ves. 151; 2 Bro. C. C. 438.

Where a trustee who holds the legal title to the trust property, permits his right to bring an ejectment for a certain part thereof to become barred, the beneficiary is also barred; 118 Mo. 158.

The lapse of time does not bar a defense resting upon an equitable title and possession; 38 Fed. Rep. 65; and staleness of demand cannot be urged against a right to relief in equity where plaintiff has been in continuous possession of the land; 99 N. C. 436.

The same general rules as regards persons under disabilities apply in cases of real estate as have already been described as applicable to personality at the time the right descends or the cause of action accrues, and prevent the running of the statute, till their removal; but only such as existed at that time. When the statute once begins to run, no subsequent disability can stop it; 1 How. 37; 4 Mass. 182; 16 Johns. 518; 1 Wheat. 292; 2 Binn. 374; 126 Pa. 643; and there is no distinction in this respect between voluntary and involuntary disabilities; 4 Term 301; 3 Brev. 286. The disability of one joint-tenant, tenant in common, or co-parcener does not inure to the benefit of the other tenants; 3 Johns. 262, 263; 2 Taunt. 441; 10 Ohio 11; 10 Ga. 218; 5 Humphr. 117; 4 Strobb. Eq. 187; 13 S. & R. 850.

It is impracticable here to give a compend, or even an analysis, of the different statutes of the several states. Nor, indeed, would such an analysis be of much service because of the frequent revision, changes, and modifications. The state statutes are substantially the same, differing only in details, and all are derived directly or indirectly from the English statutes.

The English Statutes of Limitations, 31 James I. c. 16 and 3 Geo. IV. c. 14, and a synopsis of that of 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 27, are printed in the last preceding edition of this work but are now necessarily omitted. A collection of the American and English statutes may be found in Wood, Limitations 2d ed. App'x.

Of Criminal Proceedings. The time within which indictments may be found, or other proceedings commenced, for crimes and offences varies considerably in the different jurisdictions. In general, in all jurisdictions, the length of time is adjusted in some proportion to the gravity of the offence. Indictments for murder, in most, if not all, of the states, may be found at any time during the life of the criminal after the death of the victim. Proceedings for less offences are to be commenced within periods varying from ten years to sixty days. See Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 816.

Although an offence on the face of the indictment is barred, yet the prosecution may prove, without averring it in the indictionment, that the defendant, having fled the state, was without the state. But the better practice is to aver in the indictment the facts relied upon to toll the statute; 23 W. N. C. Fa. 464 (S. C. of Pa.).

Of Estates. A description either by express words or by intendment of law of the continuance of time for which the property is to be enjoyed, marking the period at which the time of enjoyment is to end. Prest. Est. 25.

The definition or circumscription, in any conveyance, of the interest which the grantee is intended to take.

The term is used by different writers in different senses. Thus, it is used by Coke to denote the express definition of an estate by the words of its creation, so that it cannot endure for any longer time than till the contingency happens upon which the estate is to fail; Co. Litt. 23 b. In Sanders on Uses, 68, the term is used, however, in a broader and more general sense, as given in the second definition above. And, indeed, the same writers do not always confine themselves to one use of the term; see Fearnce, Cont. Rem. Butler's note n, 9th ed. 10; 1 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 364, 537. For the distinctions between limitations and remainders, see CONDITIONAL LIMITATIONS; CONTINGENT REMAINDER.

The express confinement and limitation of an estate by the words of its creation, so that it cannot endure for any longer time than till the contingency happens upon which the estate is to fail.

Instruments. A limitation in an instrument is a provision that restricts the interest or property one may have in the subject-matter of such instrument. A. & E. Encyc.

Consult, generally, Angell; Ballantine; Banning; Blanshard; Gibbons; Darby and Bonsanquet; Price; Wood; Wilkinson, on Limitations; Flintoff; Washburn, on Real Property; Barbour; Bishop; Wharton, on Criminal Law.

Of Actions. The restriction, by statute, of the right of action to certain periods of time, beyond which, except in certain specified cases, it will not be allowed. The statutes fixing such periods or limits are termed statutes of limitation.

LIMITED ADMINISTRATION.

An administration of a temporary character, granted for a particular period, or a special or a particular purpose. 1 Wms., Ex., 8th ed. 466.

It is distinguished from an ordinary administration which is not granted subject to such limitations or conditions. Such, for instance, is an administration durante minore ætate, which becomes necessary when an infant has been appointed sole executor, or the person upon whom the right to administration devolves is an infant, in which case administration is granted to some other proper person for a limited period; viz., until the infant attains the full age of twenty-one years, and is capable of taking the burden of the administration upon himself. Abbott.

LIMITED COMPANY. A company in which the liability of each shareholder is limited by the number of shares he has taken, so that he cannot be called on to contribute beyond the amount of his shares. See 1 Lindl. Part. 888; Mozl. & W. Dict.; JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

LIMITED DIVORCE. A divorce for a limited time; a separation from bed and board.

LIMITED LIABILITY. A principle of modern statutory law whereby those interested in a partnership or joint stock company are held liable only to the extent of their own interest in the business. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY; PARTNERSHIP.

The phrase is also used in a less technical and more colloquial sense as applied to restrictions of the liability of certain classes of common carriers, such as steamship, express, or telegraph companies, either by statute or contract.

LIMITED OWNER. A tenant for life, in tail, or by the curtesy. The Limited Owner's Residences Acts, 38 & 34 Vict. c. 56 and 34 & 35 Vict. c. 84, enable the tenant for life of a settled estate to charge the estate with the expense of building a mansion house. Whart. 147.

As to its duration, ownership may be (1) absolute or unlimited (dominium perpetuum), as in the case of an estate in fee simple, or (2) limited (d. temporale), i. e., liable to determine at a certain time or on the happening of a given event, as in the case of a lease or tenant for life. R. & L. Dict.

LIMITED PARTNER. See SPECIAL PARTNER.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIP. A form of partnership created by statute in many of the United States, wherein the liability of certain special partners, who contribute a specific amount of capital, is limited to the amount so contributed, while the general partners are jointly and severally responsible as in ordinary partnership. All the partners are liable as general partners, unless the statutes upon the subject are strictly, or as some cases say, substantially complied with; 5 Allen 91; 39 Barb. 283; 3 Cal. 342; 67 Pa. 330; 62 N. Y. 513; 28 Abb. N. C. 89. See 151 Pa. 79; 1 Lindl. Partn. 383, n., 2d Am. ed. (Ewell) 201, n.; Pars. Part. 424.

One who aids and assists in the organization of a limited partnership cannot thereafter hold the members liable as general partners, upon the ground that such organization was defective; 147 Pa. 111. See PARTNERSHIP.

LIMITING THE ESTATE. See LIMIT.

LINCOLN'S INN. See INNS OF COURT.

LINE. In Descents. The series of persons who have descended from a common ancestor, placed one under the other, in the order of their birth. It connects successively all the relations by blood to each other. See CONSANGUINITY; DEGREE.

The line is either direct or collateral. The direct line is composed of all the persons who are descended from each other. If, in the direct line, any one person is assumed as the propositus, in order to count from him upwards and downwards, the line will be divided into two parts, the ascending and descending lines. The ascending line is that which, counting from the propositus, ascends to his ancestors, to his father, grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. The descending line is that which, counting from the same person, descends to his children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, etc. The preceding table is an example.

The collateral line, considered by itself and in relation to the common ancestor, is a direct line; it becomes collateral when placed alongside of another line below the common ancestor, in whom both lines unite. For example:—

These two lines are independent of each other; they have no connection except by their union in the person of the common ancestor. This reunion is what forms the relation among the persons composing the two lines.

A line is also paternal or maternal. In the examination of a person's ascending line, the line ascends first to his father, next to his paternal grandfather, his paternal great-grandfather, etc., so on from father to father; this is called the paternal line. Another line will be found to ascend from the same person to his mother, his maternal grandmother, and so from mother to mother; this is the maternal line. These lines, however, do not take in all the ascendants; there are many others who must be imagined. The number of ascendants is double at each degree, as is shown by the following diagram:—

See 2 Bla. Com. 200, b.; Pothier, Des Successions, c. 1, art. 3, § 2; ASCENDANTS; CONSANGUINITY.

In Real Property Law. The division between two tracts or parcels of land. Limit; border; boundary.

When a line is mentioned in a deed as ending at a particular monument (q. v.), it is to be extended in the direction called for, without regard to distance, till it reaches the boundary; 1 Tayl. 110, 303; 2 Hawks 219. See 106 Mo. 231; 109 N. C. 417. And a marked line is to be adhered to although it depart from the course; 7 Wheat. 7; 4 T. B. Monr. 29; 2 Bibb 261. A crooked line is just as much a line as a straight one; 7 Halst. 308. Ordinarily, if a boundary runs to or by the line of an object, the exterior limit of the object is intended; 141 Mass. 56.

Where a number of persons settle simultaneously or at short intervals in the same neighborhood, and their tracts, if extended in certain directions, would overlap each other, the settlers sometimes by agreement determine upon dividing lines, which are called consentible lines. These lines, when fairly agreed upon, have been sanctioned by the courts; and such agreements are conclusive upon all persons claiming under the parties to them, with notice, but not upon bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, actual or constructive; 8 S. & R. 323; 17 id. 57; 9 W. & S. 66. See PARALLEL LINES.

Lines fixed by compact between nations are binding on their citizens and subjects; 11 Pet. 209; 1 Ves. Sen. 450; 1 Atk. 2; 2 id. 592; 1 Ch. Cas. 85; 1 P. Wms. 728; 3 S. & R. 331. See BOUNDARIES.

Measures. A line is a lineal measure, containing the one-twelfth part of an inch.

LINE OF BOUNDARY. See BOUNDARY.

LINE OF DUTY. Where a statute provides for a pension for disability or death from wound or injury received, casualty occurring, or disease contracted in the line of duty, "the performance of duty must have relation, or causation, or consociation, mediate or immediate, to the wound, injury, casualty, or disease." Opinion of Atty. Gen. Cushing, 2 Dec. Dept. Int. on Pensions 401, where the meaning of the phrase and the whole subject are very fully discussed.

LINEA RECTA (Lat.). The perpendicular line; the direct line. The line of ascent, through father, grandfather, etc., and of descent, through son, grandson, etc. Co. Litt. 10, 158; Bract. fol. 67; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 1, § 11. This is represented in a diagram by a vertical line.

Where a person springs from another immediately, or mediately through a third person, they are said to be in the direct line (linea recta), and are called ascendants and descendants. Mackeldy, Civ. Law § 129.

LINEA TRANSVERSALIS (Lat.). A line crossing the perpendicular lines. See COLLATERAL KINSMAN.

LINEAGE. Race; progeny; family, ascending or descending.

LINEAL. In a direct line. Lineal descent would be as from father or grandfather to son or grandson. 6 Pet. 112.

LINEAL CONSANGUINITY. That kind of consanguinity which subsists between persons, of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other.

LINEAL WARRANTY. See WARRANTY.

LINEN. A thread or cloth made of flax or hemp. 88 Fed. Rep. 93. See 1 Blatch. 501. In an insurance policy where one insures his stock in trade, household furniture, linen, wearing apparel, and plate, linen in the policy is confined to household linen or linen used by way of apparel; 8 Camp. 422. In a bequest the clause "all my clothes and linen" passes body linen only; 8 Bro. Ch. 311. A bequest of "some of my best linen" was held void for uncertainty; 2 P. Wms. 387.

LINES AND CORNERS. In deeds and surveys. Boundary-lines and their angles with each other. 17 Miss. 459; 21 Ala. 66; 10 Gratt. 445; 16 Ga. 141.

LINK. A single constituent part of a continuous and connected series, as a casual or logical sequence; as a link in a chain of evidence. Stand. Dict.

LIQUIDATE. To pay; to settle, to adjust and gradually extinguish all indebtedness. See 8 Wheat. 322.

LIQUIDATED ACCOUNT. One the amount of which is agreed upon by the parties, or fixed by operation of law. 23 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 924; 15 Ga. 321; 43 Conn. 469; 20 id. 562.

LIQUIDATED DAMAGES. In Practice. Damages the amount of which has been determined by anticipatory agreement between the parties.

Damages for a specific sum stipulated or agreed upon as part of a contract, as the amount to be paid to a party who alleges and proves a breach of it.

Where there is an agreement between parties for the doing or not doing particular acts, the parties may, if they please, estimate beforehand the damages to result from a breach of the agreement, and prescribe in the agreement itself the sum to be paid by either by way of damages for such breach. See 1 H. Bla. 232; 2 B. & P. 335, 350; 2 Bro. P. C. 431; 4 Burr. 2235; 2 Term 32. The civil law appears to recognize such stipulations; Inst. 3, 16, 7; Toul-lier l. 3, n. 909; La. Civ. Code Art. 1938, n. 5; Code Civile 1152, 1153.

Such a stipulation on the subject of damages differs from a penalty in this, that the parties are helden by it: whereas a penalty is regarded as a forfeiture, from which the defaulting party can be relieved.

It is settled both at law and in equity that the courts will not go behind an agreement for liquidated damages, but that a penalty is only security for the sum due or damages actually sustained; 1 Sedg. Dam. § 894. The word penalty in this contradistinction is not used according to its exact definition, but has acquired a settled technical meaning; id. note.

The sum named in an agreement as damages to be paid in case of a breach will, in general, be considered as liquidated damages, or as a penalty, according to the intent of the parties; and the mere use of the words "penalty" or "liquidated damages" will not be decisive of the question, if on the whole the instrument discloses a different intent; 6 B. & C. 216; 6 Ired. 186; 79 Me. 32; 2 Ala. n. s. 425; 8 Mo. 467; 69 N. Y. 45; 4 H. & N. 511; 47 Kan. 126; 47 Ill. App. 133; 76 Ala. 418; 86 Ill. 107; 64 Ia. 308; 53 Md. 261; 53 N. H. 336; 45 N. J. L. 335. See 68 Law T. 837; 123 N. Y. 200. It has been said, however, that if the parties use the word "penalty," it will control the interpretation of the contract; 3 B. & P. 630; 13 Wheat. 13; 88 N. Y. 75; 13 N. H. 275; but in 16 N. Y. 469, the sum named was stated to be "liquidated damages," but was held to be a penalty. Whether the sum mentioned in the agreement to be paid for a breach is to be treated as a penalty or as liquidated damages is a question of law, to be determined by the court upon a consideration of the whole instrument; 7 C. B. 716. The construction must be the same in law and equity; 5 H. L. C. 105. The tendency of the court is to regard the sum named as a penalty rather than liquidated damages; 5 Metc. Mass. 57; 2 B. & P. 346; 97 Mass. 445; yet courts seek to ascertain the intent and are governed by it; id. As to the distinction, see also 6 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 470; 80 Am. Rep. 28.

Such a stipulation in an agreement will be considered as a penalty, in the following cases:—

Where the parties in the agreement have expressly declared it or described it as a "penalty," and no other intent is clearly to be deduced from the instrument; 2 B. & P. 340, 350, 680; 7 Wheat. 14; 1 M'ull. 106; 2 Ala. n. s. 425; 1 Pick. 451; 8 Johns. Cas. 297; 24 Vt. 97; 164 Mass. 457.

Where it is doubtful from the language of the instrument whether the stipulation was intended as a penalty or as liquidated damages; 8 C. & P. 240; 6 Humph. 186; 5 Sandf. 192; 24 Vt. 97; 16 Ill. 475.

Where the agreement was evidently made for the attainment of another object or purpose, to which the stipulation is wholly collateral; 11 Mass. 488; 1 Bro. C. C. 418; 11 App. Div. N. Y. 878.

Where the agreement imposes several distinct duties, or obligations of different degrees of importance, and yet the same sum is named as damages for a breach of either indifferently; 6 Bingh. 141; 7 Scott 864; 5 Sandf. 192; 21 Ore. 194; 77 Ill. 452; 41 Minn. 522; 40 Wis. 503. But see 7 Johns. 75; 15 4d. 300; 9 N. Y. 551; 77 Ill. 452; 7 Nev. 329; L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 731; and see 19 Centr. L. J. 262, 802; where many authorities are collected.

Where the agreement is not under seal, and the damages are capable of being certainly known and estimated; 2 B. & Ald. 704; 6 B. & C. 216; 4 Dall. 150; 5 Cow. 144; 33 Neb. 126. See 95 Ill. 190; 80 U. S. 471.

Where the instrument provides that a larger sum shall be paid upon default to pay a lesser sum in the manner prescribed; 5 Sandf. 192, 640; 16 Ill. 400; 47 id. 41; 14 Ark. 329; 2 B. & P. 346. This case is said to be considered as settling the doctrine of liquidated damages in England; 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 998; and it is cited approvingly in 6 Ves. 815, and the doctrine applied in 6 Bingh. 141, 147. In the latter case, Tindal, C. J., said, "that a very large sum should become immediately payable in consequence of the non-payment of a very small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty, appears to be a contradiction in terms; the case being precisely that in which courts of equity have always relieved, and against which courts of law have in modern times endeavored to relieve by directing juries to assess the real damages sustained by the breach of the agreement." See also 12 U. C. C. P. 9; 1 Bond 819.

Where the stipulation is made in respect of a matter certain in value, as the payment of a debt or liquidated money demand, and the sum fixed upon is greater than the debt or demand; L. R. 3 Ch. 1022. If a debt be secured by a stipulation that in case of its not being paid at the appointed time, a larger sum shall become payable, the stipulation for the larger sum is in the nature of a penalty; L. R. 4 H. L. 1; Leake, Contr. 3d ed. 939.

Where a sum named is evidently to evade usury laws or statutory prohibitions, it will be treated as a penalty; 10 Mich. 188; 26 Ga. 403; but see 85 Ill. 324.

Where, by a clause in a building contract, the builder, in default of the completion of the work at a certain time, agreed to pay the owner of the property a stipulated sum for every day the building was delayed after that time, it was held to be a penalty and not an agreement to pay liquidated damages; 113 Mo. 359; but see 55 N. J. L. 132; 57 Ark. 168.

The plaintiff as well as the defendant may show that a stipulated sum is to be considered a penalty and not liquidated damages, and he may prove the actual damages even if greater than the penalty; 60 N. Y. 408.

The stipulation will be sustained as liquidated damages in the following cases:—

Where the agreement is of such a nature that the damages are uncertain, and are not capable of being ascertained by any satisfactory and known rule; 13 M. & W. 702; 1 Ex. 685; 8 Mass. 223; 87 id. 304; 101 id. 384; 12 Barb. 137, 368; 14 Ark. 315; 2 Ohio St. 519; L. R. 15 Eq. 36; 85 Ala. 552; 91 Tenn. 154; Add. Contr. 277; 36 Wis. 277; 14 Mo. 250; 76 Ill. 157; 13 N. H. 351; 147 Pa. 416.

Where, under the contract, a deposit is made of a sum to be forfeited in case of default, it will be considered liquidated damages; 21 Ch. Div. 243; 99 Pa. 560; 70 Tex. 442; but this was held to be so only if the deposit was a part performance and not as security; 122 N. Y. 397.

Under contracts not to carry on a particular business within specified limits of time and place, a sum named to be paid on default is liquidated damages; 79 Pa. 836; 100 Ind. 468; 97 Mass. 445; 49 Vt. 392; 40 Ch. Div. 112; 69 Ga. 764; 110 Cal. 674; but not where the contract describes it as a "penalty"; 164 Mass. 584.

Where, in contracts for government work, provision was made for the retention of percentages, to be forfeited on non-completion, it was treated as a provision for liquidated damages; 80 Ct. Cl. 81; and so were such provisions in a building contract; 13 Wash. 384; and in one for refitting a barge $50 for each day's delay, designated in the contract a "fine," where the fair rental value of the boat was $40 per day; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 968; and generally under contracts for the payment of such daily sum upon failure of completion; 168 Mass. 10; 87 Tex. 440; 56 Ark. 405; 28 Ont. 195; 55 N. J. L. 132; but a similar provision in a contract for railroad ties was held a penalty; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 339; and see 29 Neb. 385.

Where, from the tenor of the agreement or from the nature of the case, it appears that the parties have ascertained the amount of damages by fair calculation and adjustment; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1818; 2 Greenl. Ev. 259; 1 Bingh. 302; 7 Conn. 291; 11 N. H. 234; 6 Blackf. 206; 13 Wend. 507; 10 Mass. 459; 2 Ala. n. s. 425; 14 Me. 250; 49 Mo. 406.

Where a bond was given in the penal sum of $10,000 upon condition not to practice as a physician and in case of breach, to pay $500 for every month in which he practised, the $10,000 was held to be a penalty and the $500 stipulated damages; 4 Wend. 468. See 21 N. J. L. 468.

See, as to the distinguishing tests of liquidated damages and penalty, 5 Sandf. 192.

The following has been suggested as a general rule governing the whole subject: "Whenever the damages were evidently the subject of calculation and adjustment between the parties and a certain sum was agreed upon and intended as compensation, and is in fact reasonable in amount, it will be allowed by the court as liquidated damages." 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 405. To establish a liquidation of damages there must concur all the necessary elements of a valid contract, assent of parties, consideration and performance of the condition, if any; 87 N. J. L. 23. The intent of the parties must be clear, but it must appear from the contract; 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 406. The question of penalty or liquidated damages is a matter of law for the court; 1 Tayl. Ev. Chamb. ed. § 40; 7 C. B. 713. The liquidation must be reasonable; 40 Mich. 517; 18 Abb. n. s. 427; 12 Bush 249; 106 Pa. 237; hence the contract is not conclusive so far as that it would be permitted to violate this principle; 5 Mich. 123.

The penal sum in a bond is usually a penalty, but if a sum be agreed upon in the condition of a bond to be payable upon a breach, the question may arise whether it is liquidated damages or a penalty, and it will be subject to the same principles of construction as in any other forms of contract; Leake, Contr. 3d ed. 988, 1091; 2 Ves. Sen. 530. See 5 H. L. C. 105.

Where the language used is explicit, the extravagance of the sum named as liquidated damages will not be considered; 5 Sandf. 192; 11 Rich. 550. See 145 Pa. 606; 5 Sandf. 192; 75 Pa. 157; 70 Tex. 442; [1892] 1 Q. B. 127.

Some discussion has arisen as to whether the question of liquidated damages is involved in alternative contracts to do a certain thing or pay a certain sum. In such cases what is known as the rule of least beneficial alternative is applied and damages are given upon the theory that the defendant, if he performed, would have chosen the least onerous obligation; L. R. 8 C. P. 475; but in such a case it has been held that a defendant, having failed to exercise his option, must pay the sum as stipulated damages; 24 Wend. 244; 26 id. 680; 58 Md. 261; 7 Metc. 583. But see 47 Kan. 146 and note to it, 13 L. R. A. 671.

See, generally, 12 Am. L. Rev. 287; 1 Am. Dec. 331; Sedgw. Dam. ch. XII.; 13 L. R. A. 671, note; Sutherland; Mayne, Damages; 13 Myer, Fed. Dec. 744; 18 Cent. L. J. 143; 4 Silvern. Sup. Ct. N. Y. 579.

LIQUIDATED DEBT. A debt is such when it is certain what is due and how much is due. 20 Ga. 561.

LIQUIDATED DEMAND. A demand the amount of which has been ascertained or settled by agreement of the parties, or otherwise. 20 Ga. 58.

LIQUIDATION. A fixed and determinate valuation of things which before were uncertain.

LIQUOR. See INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

LIQUOR LAWS. Laws regulating, prohibiting, or taxing the sale of intoxicating liquors. See NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

LIRA. The name of a foreign coin.

In all computations at the custom-house, the lira of Sardinia shall be estimated at eighteen cents and six mills; Act of March 22, 1846; the lira of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and the lira of Tuscany at sixteen cents; Act of March 22, 1846.

LIS. A controversy; an action at law.

LIS ALIBI PENDENS. A suit pending elsewhere. Where proceedings are pending in one court between plaintiff and defendant in respect to a given matter, it has been used as a ground for preventing the plaintiff from entering proceedings in another court against the same defendant and for the same cause of action. See AUTER ACTION PENDANT.

LIS MOTA (Lat.). A controversy begun, i. e. on the point at issue, and prior to commencement of judicial proceedings.

The arising of that state of facts on which the claim is founded. 6 C. & P. 552.

Such a controversy is taken to arise on the advent of the state of facts on which the claim rests; and after such controversy has arisen (post litem motam) no declarations of deceased members of the family as to matters of pedigree are admissible; Steph. Ev. § 81; Tayl. Ev. 534; 6 C. & P. 560; 4 Campb. 417; 2 Russ. & M. 181; Greenl. Ev. § 131; 4 M. & S. 497; 1 Pet. 337; 26 Barb. 177.

There is no lis mota till a dispute has arisen; it is not enough that a right of action has arisen or a cause of action accrued; 2 Sw. & Tr. 170. The dispute need not be between the same parties; 15 Q. B. D. 114.

LIS PENDENS (Lat.). A pending suit. Suing out a writ and making attachment (on mesne process) constitute a lis pendens at common law. 21 N. H. 570.

The doctrine of lis pendens, as usually understood, is the control which a court has over the property involved in a suit, during the continuance of the proceedings, and until its final judgment has been rendered therein.

"The established rule is that a lis pendens, duly prosecuted and not collusive, is notice to a purchaser so as to effect and bind his interest by the decree; and the lis pendens begins from the service of the subpoena after the bill is filed." 1 Johns. Ch. 566. This was said to be the "fundamental proposition" of the doctrine; 97 U. S. 106.

The purpose of the rule is to keep the subject-matter of the litigation within the power of the court until the judgment or decree shall be entered; otherwise by successive alienations pending the litigation, its judgment or decree could be rendered abortive and thus make it impossible for the court to execute its judgment or decree; 17 Or. 499. The rule will be applied even in a case where it is a physical impossibility that the purchaser could have known of the existence of the suit; 2 Rand. Va. 98. It was formulated in Lord Bacon's twelfth ordinance. There were earlier cases, the first being reported in Cro. Eliz. 677. See Bennett, Lis Pendens.

An alienee, during the pendency of a suit, is bound by the proceedings therein subsequent to the alienation, though before he became a party; 4 Beav. 40; 5 Mich. 456; 23 Barb. 166; 27 Pa. 418; 7 Blackf. 242.

Purchasers during the pendency of a suit are bound by the decree in the suit without being made parties; 4 Russ. 372; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 375; Story, Eq. Pl. § 851 a; 32 Ala. n. s. 451; 11 Mo. 519; 96 id. 271; 30 Miss. 27; 13 La. An. 776; 6 Barb. 133; 27 Pa. 418; 16 Ill. 225; 9 B. Monr. 220; 11 Ind. 448; see 130 U. S. 565; 78 Cal. 152; and will not be protected because they paid value and had no actual notice of the suit; 35 Conn. 250; 6 Ia. 258; 86 Ky. 240; 181 Ind. 455. A purchaser pendente lite cannot litigate, over again in an original independent suit, the matters determined in a suit to which his vendor was a party; 131 U. S. 352; a purchaser is only chargeable with notice when the purchase is from a party to the suit; 121 Pa. 130.

So also is the doctrine applied to a purchaser during a suit to avoid a conveyance as fraudulent; 6 T. B. Monr. 373; 6 B. Monr. 18.

A citizen of the United States residing in a different state from that in which the suit is pending, is bound by the rule regarding purchasers pendente lite; 9 Pet. 98; and actual notice of the pendency of the suit is not necessary; 9 Dana 372. See 12 Cent. L. J. 101. It is said that the doctrine has no force or operation beyond the boundaries of the state where the suit is pending; 96 Mo. 149; but this does not, of course apply to a case where the court has jurisdiction of the res and of the party. The doctrine cannot be made applicable by state laws or decisions to negotiable instruments so as to affect persons not residing and not being within the state; 119 U. S. 660.

Lis pendens by a mortgagor under a prior unrecorded mortgage is notice to a second mortgagee; 9 Ala. n. s. 921. But see 2 Rand. 98. One taking a mortgage on property while a proceeding to foreclose a vendor's lien thereon is pending, is bound by a decree in such proceedings as if a party thereto, and has no right of redemption other than that given by statute; 96 Ala. 421.

The rule does not apply where a title imperfect before suit brought, is perfected during its pendency; 4 Cow. 667; 14 Ohio 323.

The doctrine of lis pendens has been said to be an equitable doctrine only; 28 Conn. 598; but when one comes into possession of the subject of litigation, during proceedings in ejectment, he will be bound by the judgment, though not a party, and may be ejected under the judgment against his grantor; Wade, Notice; 1 McLean 87; 9 Cow. 233.

In law, the same effect is produced by the rule that each purchaser takes the title of his vendor only; 11 Md. 519; 27 Pa. 418; 6 Barb. 183; 80 Miss. 27; 5 Mich. 456. This doctrine was originally confined to controversies over real estate; 22 Ala. 760; 80 Mo. 463; 2 Johns. Ch. 444; but a purchaser of securities pendente lite has been decreed to surrender them upon receiving the sum he had paid for them; 1 Desaus. 167; and the principle has been extended to a bond and mortgage, assigned by a trustee, pending a suit by the cestui que trust; 2 Johns. Ch. 441. It is now applied, in some cases to personal property; Freeman, Judg. § 194; as stocks; 20 Johns. 554; 48 Barb. 649, reversed in 48 N. Y. 585. See 67 N. Y. 617; furniture; 2 Edw. Ch. 31; steamboats; 15 Mo. App. 351; choses in action, such as a bond and mortgage; 2 Johns. Ch. 441, approved in 97 U. S. 106. Some cases hold that it does not apply to personality; 60 La. 168; 22 Ala. 760. The question is said to be unsettled as to cash and movable personalty; 2 Johns. Ch. 441; 97 U. S. 96. It does not apply to negotiable instruments; 97 U. S. 96; 119 id. 680; 100 id. 589; 147 id. 59; 23 Ala. 760; 38 Ga. 18; including municipal bonds; 97 U. S. 96; 111 id. 536; 119 id. 692; 54 Fed. Rep. 759; but see 87 Pa. 353 as to the latter. "Rights to real property and personal chattels, within the jurisdiction of the court, and subject to its power, may be affected by lis pendens, but not those acquired by the transfer of negotiable securities, or by the sale of articles in market overt in the usual course of trade;" 119 U. S. 693.

In divorce there is no lis pendens before decree as to the property included in the marriage settlement; 7 P. D. 228.

The doctrine does not apply to negotiable paper; 50 Fed. Rep. 135; a bona fide holder of which is not subject to it, even if purchased during the pendency of a suit in which its issue was finally declared invalid; 54 Fed. Rep. 759.

The proceedings must relate directly to the specific property in question; 1 Strobb. Eq. 180; 7 Blackf. 242; 7 Md. 537; Story, Eq. 13th ed. § 405; 1 Hill. Vend. 411; and the rule applies to no other suits; 1 McCord Ch. 252.

Lis pendens is said to be general notice to all the world; see Story, Eq. Jur. § 405; Ambler, 676; 2 P. Wms. 282; 9 Atk. 343; 1 Vern. 286; 8 Hayw. 147; 1 Johns. Ch. 556 (a leading case); but it has been said that it is not correct to speak of it as a part of the doctrine of notice; the purchaser pendente lite is affected, not by notice, but because the law does not allow litigating parties to give to others, pending the litigation, rights to the property in dispute so as to prejudice the opposite party. Per Cranworth, C., in De G. & J. 566. The doctrine rests upon public policy, not notice; 2 Rand. 93; 10 W. N. C. (Pa). 389; Beach, Eq. Jur. § 374; Bisph. Eq. 274; 1 Johns. Ch. 566.

Filing a judgment creditor's bill constitutes a lis pendens; 4 Edw. Ch. 29. A petition by heirs to sell real estate is not a lis pendens; 14 B. Monr. 164. Generally, suit is not pending till service of process; 57 Mo. 882; 14 Pet. 323; 1 Sandf. 781; Wade, Notice 152; but see 80 Tex. 494; 10 Ark. 479; 64 Mo. 519. Where service is by advertising, lis pendens does not attach till the completion of the advertising; 4 Kan. 382. Only unreasonable and unusual negligence in the prosecution of a suit will take away its character as a lis pendens; 18 B. Monr. 230; 11 id. 297; 10 Ky. Law. R. 750; but it is held that there must be an active prosecution to keep it alive; 1 Vern. 286; 1 Russ. & M. 617; 30 Mo. 432; 9 Paige 512; 21 La. 421. But as long as the court retains jurisdiction, the doctrine applies; Benn. Lis Pend. 172.

The court must have jurisdiction over the property involved; Benn. Lis Pend. 153; and the property must be sufficiently described to establish its identity; id.; and the party who holds the title must be before the court as a party; id. 162. But this would not be required in proceedings to enforce a lien on property within the jurisdiction of the court.

Filing the bill and serving a subpoena creates a lis pendens in equity; Thiedm. Eq. Jur. § 95; 1 Vern. 318; 7 Beav. 444; 27 Mo. 500; 4 Sneed 672; 26 Miss. 397; 9 Paige Ch. 512; 22 Ala. n. s. 743; 7 Blackf. 242; 130 U. S. 565; 2 Rand. Va. 93; see 155 Pa. 10; which the final decree terminates; 1 Vern. 318. Amendment of the bill after demurrer has been sustained thereto relates back to the filing of the bill, so far as the doctrine of lis pendens is concerned; 61 Fed. Rep. 481. In the civil law, an action is not said to be pending till it reaches the stage of contestatio litis.

In equity, the lis pendens relates to the service of the subpoena, and not to the day on which it was issued; 30 W. Va. 687; 130 U. S. 565.

A voluntary assignment during the pendency of a suit does not affect the rights of other parties, if not disclosed, except so far as the alienation may disable the party from performing the decree of the court; Story, Eq. Pl. § 351; 15 Tex. 495; 22 Barb. 666; as in the case of mortgage by a tenant in common of his undivided interest, and subsequent partition; 2 Sandf. Ch. 88.

An involuntary assignment by a plaintiff, as under the bankrupt or insolvent laws, renders the suit so defective that it cannot be prosecuted if the defendant objects; 7 Paige Ch. 287; 4 Ves. 387; 9 Wend. 649; 1 Hare 621; Story, Eq. Pl. § 349. Not if made under the bankrupt law of 1841; 27 Barb. 252.

The same may be said of a voluntary assignment of all his interest by a sole complainant; 5 Hare 223; Story, Eq. Pl. § 349.

A debtor need not pay to either party pendente lite; 1 Paige 400.

The doctrine of lis pendens is modified in many of the states of the United States, and by statutes requiring records of the attachment to preliminary proceedings to be made, and constituting such records notice. See stat. 2 and 3 Vict. c. 11, § 7; and statutes of the various states.

The phrase is sometimes incorrectly used as a substitute for auter action pend. (q. v.). See 1 La. An. 46; 21 N. H. 570.

"It is part of our fast decaying real property system; it belongs to the palmy days of conveyancing." 11 Law. Quart. Rev. 6.

LIST. A table of cases arranged for trial or argument; as, the trial list, the argument list.

A list may consist of a single item; 14 N. H. 85. See 88 Ky. 162. Where a notice is required to be directed to a person at his abode as described in a list of voters, it must be at the place therein mentioned, even if erroneous; L. R. 9 C. P. 288. The subscription list of a newspaper is property only as connected with the newspaper plant and not separate from it; 2 Watts 111. See 1 Pars. 270; 5 W. & S. 521. See CIVIL LIST.

LISTERS. This word is used in some of the states to designate the persons appointed to make lists of taxable. See Vt. Rev. Stat.

LITE PENDENTE. Pending suit.

LITERA BULLATA. A letter, brief, or charter sealed with a bullo. (q. v.)

LITERA. Letters. A term which in old English law was applied to instruments in writing, public and private.

LITERA MORTUUM. Dead letters; fulfilling words of a statute. Bacon, Works IV. 189.

LITERA PATENTES. Letters patent. Literally, open letters.

LITERA PROCURATORIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Letters procuratory. A written authority, or power of attorney (litera attorney), given to a procurator. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Utr.; Bracton, fol. 40-43.

LITERAL. According to the language; following the exact words. Literal construction of a document, adheres closely to the words, making no difference for extrinsic circumstances.

LITERAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. A contract the whole of the evidence of which is reduced to writing, and binds the party who subscribed it, although he has received no consideration. Lecl. Elem. § 887.

LITERAL PROOF. In Civil Law. Written evidence.

LITERARY OR SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION. A fraternity held not to be a literary or scientific institution within the meaning of a statute exempting such institutions from taxation. 108 Me. 320.

LITERARY PROPERTY. The general term which describes the interest of an author in his works, or of those who claim under him, whether before or after publication, or before or after a copyright has been secured. 9 Am. L. Reg. 44; 4 Du. N. Y. 379; 11 How. Pr. 49; Curtis, Copyr.; 2 Bla. Com. 405; 4 Viner Abr. 278; Bacon Abr. Prorogation (F. 5); 2 Kent 906; 1 Belt Suppl. Ves. Jr. 880; 2 id. 489; Nickl. Lit. A person has a property in his literary productions, and by the common law, as long as they are kept within his possession, he has the same right of exclusive enjoyment of them as of any other species of personal property; 75 Ill. 475. See 4 H. L. C. 962; 50 How. Pr. 194. See COPYRIGHT; MANUSCRIPT.

LITERIS OBLIGATIO. In Roman Law. An obligation created by an entry made in one of the books kept by the head of a Roman family, called the codex accepti et expensi. The creditor made an entry to the effect that a certain sum had been paid by him to the debtor, and the debtor made a corresponding entry indicating such a payment to him by the creditor; but it was sufficient if the creditor's entry was made by direction of the debtor, in which case an entry by the debtor was unnecessary. The effect was to constitute an obligation under which the debtor was liable, whether the money was actually paid or not. He was said to be bound literis, i. e. by the writing in the codex as such. The entry itself created the obligation to pay. It was immaterial whether it was based upon an obligation to pay existing in fact.

The item in the codex was called the nomen, and this species of contract might either create an obligation or transform one, i. e. operate as a novation, in which case it was called nomen transcriptum. The literis obligatio was distinguished from the nomen transcriptum, another species of entry in the codex accepti et expensi. This has been termed a mere cash item. It was an entry of a concrete or existing ground of obligation, in which case the obligation continued to be based on the loan or deposit, or whatever might be its original character, and was not converted into literis obligatio in the time of the empire the literal contract fell into disuse.

The three classes of books kept by the paterfamilias were, (1) the liber patrimonii, or libellus familiae, in which were kept inventories of the property, and liber testamentarii, which was a list of capital sums set out as interest; (2) the codex rationum, which was the regular account book in which were entered receipts and expenses; (3) the codex accepti et expensi, designed not merely to afford evidence of, but also to affect, changes in the state of a person's property.

Gaius, Inst. III. §§ 180-21, describes the literis obligatio as being made in two ways: (1) A re in personam, where the obligation was entered in the form of a debt under the name of the original purchaser or debtor; (2) A persona in personam, where a debt already standing under one nomen was transferred by novation from that one to another. Some writers lay great stress upon the fact that the obligation in re in personam was first entered as a memorandum in a day book or waste book (adversaria epheueris), but it has been truly remarked that this fact, although indisputable, has no legal importance; and this is apparent from the nature of the two transactions.

There is some difference in the statement of these obligations by different authors, but that which is here given is the result of the more recent investigations, having been established by Voigt, Abhandl. der Koen. Saechs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, vol. 10, 335.

See Bohm, Inst. Rom. L. § 66 and note 1, where reference may be found to the authors on the subject.

LITHOGRAPH. A print from a drawing on stone. Chromo lithographs are dutiable as printed matter and not as manufactures of paper. See 97 U. S. 386; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 12, s. 14.

LITIGANT. One engaged in a suit.

LITIGATION. A contest, authorized by law, in a court of justice, for the purpose of enforcing a right.

In order to prevent injustice, courts of equity formerly restrained a party from further litigation, by a writ of injunction: for example, after two verdicts on trials at bar, in favor of the plaintiff, a perpetual injunction was decreed; Stra. 404. And not only between two individuals will a court of equity grant this relief, as in the above case of several ejectments, but also, when one general legal right, as a right of fishery, is claimed against several distinct persons, in which case there would be no end of bringing actions, since each action would only bind the particular right in question between the plaintiff and defendant in such action, without deciding the general right claimed; 2 Atk. 484; 2 Ves. 587. See EXPENSE OF LITIGATION.

LITIGIOSITY. In Scotch Law. The pendency of a suit: it is an implied prohibition of alienation, to the disappointment of an action, or of diligence, the direct object of which is to obtain possession, or to acquire the property of a particular subject. The effect of it is analogous to that of inhibition. 2 Bell, Com., 5th ed. 152.

LITIGIOUS. That which is the subject of a suit or action; that which is contested in a court of justice. In another sense, litigious signifies a disposition to sue; a fondness for litigation. See VEXATIOUS ACTIONS ACT.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A church is said to be litigious, when two rival presentations are offered to the bishop upon the same avoidance of the living. Moz. & W.; 8 Steph. Com. 417.

LITIGIOUS RIGHTS. In French Law. Those which are or may be contested either in whole or in part, whether an action has been commenced, or when there is reason to apprehend one. Pothier, Vente, n. 584; 9 Mart. La. 183; Troplong, De la Vente, n. 984 & 1003; Eva. Civ. Code, art. 2623; id. 8522, n. 23. See CONTENTIOUS JURISDICTION.

LITIS ESTIMATIO. The measure of damages (q. v.).

LITIS CONTESTATIO. In Civil Law. The process by which a suit is contested by the opposing statements of the respective parties, to attain an issue; the issue itself.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The issue of an action; the general answer of the defendant denying matter charged against him in a libel. Hallifax, Civ. L. b. 8, c. 11, No. 9.

LITIS DOMINIUM. In Civil Law. Direction of a suit. A fiction of law authorizing the appointment of an attorney, by which appointment he was supposed to become dominus litis.

LITISPENDENCIA. In Spanish Law. Litispendency. The condition of a suit pending in a court of justice.

In order to render this condition valid, it is necessary that the judge be competent to take cognizance of the cause; that the defendant has been duly cited to appear, and fully informed, in due time and form, of the nature of the demand, or that, if he has not, it has been through his own fault or fraud.

The litispendencia produces two effects: the legal impossibility of alienating the property in dispute during the pendency of the suit; the accumulation of all the proceedings in the cause, in the tribunal where the suit is pending, whether the same be had before the same judge or other judges or notaries. This cumulation may be required in any stage of the cause, and forms a valid exception to the further proceeding, until the cumulation is effected. Escriche, Dict.

LITRE. A French measure of capacity. It is of the size of a cubic decimetre, or the cube of one-tenth part of a metre. It is equal to 61.037 cubic inches, or a little more than a quart. See MEASURE.

LITTORAL (littus). Belonging to shore; as of sea and great lakes. Webster. Corresponding to riparian proprietors on a stream or small pond are littoral proprietors on a sea or lake. But riparian is also used coextensively with littoral. 7 Cush. 94. See 17 How. 426.

LITURA. In Civil Law. An obliteration or blot in a will or other instrument.

LITUS. In Old European Law. A person who surrendered himself into another's power; a kind of servant.

LITUS MARIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Shore; beach. Qua fluctus eludet. Cic. Top. o. 7. Qua fluctus adluit. Quint. lib. 5, c. ult. Quousque maximus fluctus a mari pervenit. Celsus; said to have been first so defined by Cicero in an award as arbitrator. L. 92, D. de verb. signif. Qua maximus fluctus excreuat. L. 112, D. cod. tit. Qua tenuis hibernus fluctus maximus excurrit. Inst. lib. 2, de rer. divis. et qual. § 3. That is to say, as far as the largest winter wave runs up. Vocab. Jur. Utr.

At Common Law. The shore between common high-water mark and low-water mark. Hale, de Jure Maris, cc. 4, 5, 6; 8 Kent 427; 2 Hill. R. P. 90.

Shore is also used of a river. 5 Wheat. 385; 20 Wend. 149. See 19 How. 881; 28 Me. 180; 14 Pa. 171. See SHORE.

LIVE. "Live animals" has been held to include singing birds. 7 Blatchf. 285. "Live stock" has been held not to include live fowls. 5 Blatchf. 530.

LIVE AND RESIDE. Where, in the gift of a house, there was a condition that the donee should "live and reside" therein, it was held that the word "live" added nothing to its point. T. & R. 530.

LIVELIHOOD. Means of subsistence or maintaining life; means of living. 8 Atk. 399; 1 Yeates 432. See 16 East 147; 5 L. J. Ex. 263.

LIVERY. In English Law. The delivery of possession of lands to those tenants who hold of the king in capite or by knight's service.

The name of a writ which lay for the heir of age to obtain possession of the seisin of his lands at the king's hands; abolished by stat. 12 Car. II. c. 24. Fitzh. N. B. 155; 2 Bla. Com. 68.

The distinguishing dress worn by the servants of a gentleman or nobleman, or by the members of a particular guild. "Livery or clothing." Say. 274. By stat. 1 Rich. II. c. 7, and 16 Rich. II. c. 4, none but the servants of a lord, and continually dwelling in his house, or those above the rank of yeomen, should wear the lord's Privilege of a particular company or guild. The members of such company are called liverymen. Whart. Lex.

LIVERY IN CHIVALRY. In Feudal Law. The delivery of the property of a ward in chivalry out of the guardian's hands, upon the heir's attaining the required age. 2 Bla. Com. 63.

LIVERY OFFICE. In Old English Law. An office for the delivery of lands.

LIVERY OF SEISIN. In Estates. A delivery of possession of lands, tenements, and hereditaments unto one entitled to the same. This was a ceremony used in the common law for the conveyance of real estate; and livery was in deed, which was performed by the feoffor and the feoffee going upon the land and the latter receiving it from the former; or in law, where the same was not made on the land, but in sight of it; 3 Bla. Com. 315.

In America livery of seisin is unnecessary, it having been dispensed with either by express law or by usage. The delivery and recording of the deed have the same effect; 1 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. *14, 84. In Maryland, until more recent times, it seems that a deed could not operate as a feoffment without livery of seisin; but under the Rev. Code of 1878, art. 44, § 6, neither livery of seisin nor indenting is necessary; 5 H. & J. 158. See 4 Kent 381; 1 Mo. 553; 1 Pet. 508; 1 Bay 107; 5 H. & J. 158; 11 Me. 318; 8 Cr. 236; Dane, Abr.; Bingham. Act. and Dec. 96; SEISIN.

LIVERY STABLE. A place where horses are groomed, fed, and hired, and where vehicles are let. 30 La. Ann. 1005.

A liveryman who lets a horse does not warrant that it is free from defects which he does not know of, and could not have discovered by the exercise of due care; and where a person is injured through such defects, the liveryman is not liable; 157 Mass. 558.

Under the contract of bailment he is required to exercise ordinary care over the property entrusted to him. He is liable for the negligence of his servants in the performance of any duty in regard to the care and custody of the property, within the general scope of his own employment; 79 Me. 490. See LIEN.

LIVERY-STABLE KEEPER. See LIVERYMAN.

LIVERYMAN. In England. A member of such of the City Companies as are Livery Companies. Byrne.

In the United States. A livery-stable keeper. In the law of carriers, a company engaged in the livery business does not hold itself out to serve any and all persons, but operates only under a special contract, and deals with such persons only as it chooses, and is in no sense a common carrier. 2 Michie, Carriers, 1488; 148 Mo. App. 621. A livery-stable keeper, who lets a conveyance for a special journey, and furnishes a driver therefor, is merely a private carrier for hire, and is bound only to exercise that degree of care and skill in the selection of a vehicle, team, and driver which a prudent man would bestow in such a matter, and is not liable for injuries caused to a person in the vehicle, occasioned by negligent driving. Id.; 114 Tenn. 521.

LIVES. See JOINT LIVES.

LIVING CHILD. A term, it is said, less broad than "issue living." 153 Mass. 527.

LIVING WITH ME. In a bequest to a servant the phrase "living with me" does not mean living in the testator's house but living in his service. 22 L. J. Ch. 155.

LIVRE TOURNOIS. In Common Law. A coin used in France before the revolution. It is to be computed in the ad valorem duty on goods, etc., at eighteen and a half cents. Act of March 2, 1798, § 61, 1 Story, Laws 629. See FOREIGN COINS.

LLOYDS. An association in the city of London, the members of which underwrite each other's policies. 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 138, n.

The name is derived from Lloyd's coffee house, the great resort for sea-going men and those doing business with them in the time of William III. and Anne. The affairs of the association are managed by a committee called Lloyd's Committee, who appoint agents in all the principal ports of the world, whose business it is to forward all such maritime news as may be of importance in guiding the judgment of the underwriters. These accounts, which arrive almost hourly from some part of the world, are at once posted up, and are called Lloyd's Shipping Lists. They are subsequently copied into three books, called Lloyd's Book. Lloyd's shipping list, stating the time of a vessel's sailing, is prima facie evidence of what it contains; 11 M. & W. 116; 25 Neb. 339; 67 Ga. 397; 80 Mass. 361; 31 Ark. 573; 134 Ill. 573; 21 Md. 550; 11 Beav. 238. See Mox. & W.; Arm. Ins. See LLOYD'S INSURANCE.

LLOYD'S BONDS. See BOND.

LLOYD'S INSURANCE. A system of insurance similar to the English Lloyds, which is carried on in the United States by unincorporated associations of individuals. It originated in connection with marine risks, but has now been extended to other kinds of insurance. The principal features of the system are, that each individual assumes a liability for a specific amount; that attorneys or managers are appointed by a power of attorney authorizing them to be sued; that suits are brought against such attorneys or managers; and that each underwriter is bound by the fundamental agreement to accept the result of such suit. Such action may be maintained against the attorneys in fact; 17 App. Div. N. Y. 38; and the agreement is not repugnant to public policy; 20 Misc. Rep. 297; it is valid to prevent the institution of separate suits where the attorney is an underwriter; 19 id. 239. One who signs such policy as attorney for the underwriters is a "trustee of an express trust," within New York Code Civ. Proc. § 449; 19 Misc. Rep. 239. Proofs of loss are properly served at the office of the association on one acting as its attorney, even if irregularly appointed; 21 Misc. Rep. 235. The provision for simultaneous contribution and making the liability several, not joint, does not prevent the collection of the full proportion from each where only a portion are served; 76 Fed. Rep. 1000.

Such associations have been held subject to prosecution for unlawfully exercising a public franchise; 19 Misc. Rep. 248; 51 Ohio St. 163, where the forms of organization, power of attorney, and policy may be referred to. They are not companies; 163 Pa. 287; 118 Mo. 388; 92 Ga. 8; and unincorporated persons may be prohibited from being insurers; 164 Pa. 306; 118 id. 249, three judges dissenting.

LOAD-LINE. The depth to which a ship is loaded so as to sink in salt water.

Every owner of a British ship before entering his ship outwards from any port of the United Kingdom shall mark, in white or yellow on a dark ground, a circular disc, twelve inches in diameter, with a horizontal line six inches from the top, through its centre, and the centre of this disc is to indicate the maximum load-line in salt water, to which the owner intends to load the ship for that voyage; Mox. & W. Coasters under eighty tons burden, fishing ships, and yachts are excepted.

LOADMANAGE. See LODEMANAGE.

LOAN. A bailment without reward. A bailment of an article for use or consumption without reward. The thing so bailed.

A loan, in general, implies that a thing is lent without reward; but, in some cases, a loan may be for a reward: as, the loan of money. 7 Pet. 109.

It would be an inquiry too purely speculative, whether this use of the term loan originated in the times when taking interest was considered usury and improper.

the bailment of money which was to be returned in kind. The supposition would furnish a reasonable explanation of the exception to the general rule that loan includes properly only those bailments where no reward is given or received by the bailee.

Within the statutory and constitutional prohibition against the loaning of public funds, with or without interest, a general deposit of such funds by a public officer subject to check is not a loan; 68 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 165. See BUILDING ASSOCIATIONS; USURY.

LOAN OR FORBEARANCE. When one allows a debtor for a consideration to prepay a debt, it is not a "loan or forbearance" of money. The privilege of prepaying a debt is as much the subject of sale as any other chattel, and a creditor has as much right to sell or discount negotiable paper to the payer as to any other person and the discount or proceeds of the sale should not for that reason be considered usury. 159 Ky. 680, 167 S. W. 898.

LOAN CERTIFICATES. See CLEARING HOUSE.

LOAN FOR CONSUMPTION. A contract by which the owner of a personal chattel, called the lender, delivers it to the bailee, called the borrower to be returned in kind.

For example, if a person borrows a bushel of wheat, and at the end of a month returns to the lender a bushel of equal value. This class of loans is commonly considered under the head of bailments; but it lacks the one essential element of bailment, that of a return of the property; it is more strictly a barter or an exchange: the property passes to the borrower; 4 N. Y. 76; 6 id. 433; 4 Ohio St. 98; 3 Mas. 478; 1 Blackf. 333; Story, Bailm. § 439. Those cases, sometimes called centum (the corresponding civil law term), such as where corn is delivered to a miller to be ground into wheat, are either cases of hiring of labor and service, as where the miller grinds and returns the identical wheat ground into flour, retaining a portion for his services, or constitute a mere exchange, as where he mixes the wheat with his own, undertaking to furnish an equivalent in corn. It amounts to a contract of sale, payment being stipulated for in a specified article instead of money. See IN GENERAL; IN KIND; MUTUUM.

LOAN FOR EXCHANGE. A contract by which one delivers personal property to another, and the latter agrees to return to the lender a similar thing, without reward for its use. Cal. Civ. Code § 1802.

LOAN SOCIETIES. In English Law. A kind of club formed for the purpose of advancing money on loan to the industrial classes. They are authorized and regulated by 3 & 4 Vict. ch. 110, and 21 Vict. ch. 19.

LOAN FOR USE (called, also, commodatum). A bailment of an article to be used by the borrower without paying for the use. 2 Kent 573.

An agreement by which a person delivers a thing to another, to use it according to its natural destination, or according to the agreement, under the obligation on the part of the borrower, to return it after he shall have done using it. La. Civ. Code (1899) Art. 2893.

Loan for use (called commodatum in the civil law) differs from a loan for consumption (called mutuum in the civil law) in this, that the commodatum must be specifically returned, the mutuum is to be returned in kind. In the case of a commodatum, the property in the thing remains in the lender; in a mutuum, the property passes to the borrower.

The loan, like other bailments, must be of some thing of a personal nature; Story, Bailm. § 233; it must be gratuitous; 2 Ld. Raym. 918; for the use of the borrower, and this as the principal object of the bailment; Story, Bailm. § 233; 13 Vt. 161; and must be lent to be specifically returned at the determination of the bailment; Story, Bailm. § 238.

The general law of contracts governs as to the capacities of the parties and the character of the use; Story, Bailm. §§ 50, 163, 202, 260. He who has a special property may loan the thing, and this even to the general owner, and the possession of the general owner still be that of a borrower; 1 Atk. 235; 8 Term 199; 3 Taunt. 268.

The borrower may use the thing himself, but may not, in general, allow others to use it; 1 Mod. 210; 4 Sandf. 8; during the time and for the purposes and to the extent contemplated by the parties; 5 Mass. 104; 1 Const. S. C. 121; 2 Bingham. N. C. 468. He is bound to use extraordinary diligence; 8 Bingham. N. C. 468; 14 Ill. 84; 4 Sandf. 8; Story, Bailm. § 237; is responsible for accidents, though inevitable, which injure the property during any excess of use; 5 Mass. 104; 16 Ga. 25; see 34 Neb. 436; must bear the ordinary expenses of the thing; Jones, Bailm. 67; and restore it at the time and place and in the manner contemplated by the contract; 16 Ga. 25; 12 Tex. 378; Story, Bailm. § 99; including, also, all accessories; 16 Ga. 25; 2 Kent 568. As to the place of delivery, see 9 Barb. 189; 1 Me. 120; 1 N. H. 295; 1 Conn. 255; 16 Mass. 458. He must, as a general rule, return it to the lender; 7 Cow. 278; 1 B. & Ad. 450; 11 Mass. 211.

The lender may terminate the loan at his pleasure; 9 East 49; 8 Johns. 432; 16 Ga. 25; is perhaps liable for expenses adding a permanent benefit; Story, Bailm. § 274. The lender still retains his property as against third persons, and, for some purposes, his possession; 11 Johns. 285; 18 id. 141, 561; 5 Mass. 303; 1 B. & Ad. 59; 2 Cr. M. & R. 659. As to whether the property is transferred by a recovery of judgment for its value, see 26 E. L. & Eq. 328; 5 Me. 147; 1 Pick. 62. See, generally, Edwards; Jones; Story, Bailments; Kent, Lect. 46. BAILMENT.

LOBBYIST. One who makes it a business to procure the passage of bills pending before a legislative body.

One "who makes it a business to 'see' members and procure, by persuasion, importunity, or the use of inducements, the passing of bills, public as well as private, which involve gain to the promoters." 1 Bryce, Am. Com. 156.

A contract for the employment of personal influence or solicitation to procure the passage of a public or private law is void; 21 Barb. 361; 16 How. 314; 34 Vt. 274; 15 Ore. 390; as contrary to sound morals and tending to inefficiency in the public service; 93 Wis. 398; if by its terms or by necessary implication, it stipulates for, or tends to, corrupt action or personal solicitations; 69 U. S. 45; 86 Ind. 238; 86 N. Y. 235; 40 id. 543; 127 id. 870; 18 Ohio St. 469; 149 Pa. 375. And if the contract is broad enough to cover services of any kind, either secret or open, honest or dishonest, the law pronounces a ban upon the contract itself; 2 McArthur. 268. It is not required that it tends to corruption. If its effect is to mislead, it is decisive against the claimant. It may not corrupt all, but if it corrupt or tend to corrupt some, or if it deceive or tend to deceive some, that is sufficient to stamp its character with the seal of reprobation before a judicial tribunal; 5 W. & B. 315; 7 id. 152; 59 Pa. 19; 100 id. 561. But it has been held that though the contract contemplates the use of personal solicitation, yet if no personal influence is brought to bear upon the members, and no dishonest, secret, or unfair means employed, to accomplish the object, it is not illegal; 98 Cal. 543.

Where the agreement is for compensation contingent upon success, it suggests the use of sinister and corrupt means for the accomplishment of the desired end. The law meets the suggestion of evil and strikes down the contract from its inception; 69 U. S. 45; 98 Ind. 238; and see 60

Minn. 26. But if the contract does not by its terms or by necessary implication contain anything illegal or tend to any violation of sound morals, the fatal element should not, through an overzealous desire to fortify against the deplorable effects of lobbying contracts, be injected into it by mere suspicion and conjecture that the party intended to do an illegal act or a legal act by illegal means. Presumptions in human affairs are in favor of innocence rather than of guilt, and this rule applies in testing a contract; 93 Wis. 398. In the last two cases, brought by the same plaintiff, the contracts were somewhat similar; but in the first the decision was based mainly on what was done under and before the contract was entered into, whilst that of the latter was upon the construction of the contract.

A contract for services as an attorney before a legislative body is valid; 22 Kan. 692; and where it contains an agreement to labor faithfully before such body to effect the desired end, it is not necessarily illegal; 34 Vt. 275. It is allowable to employ counsel to appear before a legislative committee or the legislature itself to advocate or oppose a measure in which the individual has an interest; 86 N. Y. 241, followed in 52 How. Pr. 144; and an agent may be authorized by the legislature to prosecute claims on behalf of the state which require the procurement of legislation, for a contingent fee; 164 Mass. 341. Services which are intended to reach only the reason of those sought to be influenced rest on the same principles of ethics as professional services and are no more exceptionable. They include drafting the petition which sets forth the claim, attending to the taking of testimony, collecting facts, preparing arguments and submitting them orally or in writing to a committee, and other services of a like character; but such services are separated by a broad line of demarcation from personal solicitation, and though compensation can be recovered for them when they stand alone, yet when they are blended and confused with those which are forbidden, the whole is a unit and indivisible, and that which is bad destroys the good; 21 Wall. 441.

In Massachusetts by statute lawyers or agents endeavoring to secure the passage of a bill must file written authority from their principal; in California, lobbying, openly practised, is declared by the constitution a felony, and in Georgia, a crime.

LOCAL. Relating to place. A particular place.

LOCAL ACTION. In Practice. An action the cause of which could have arisen in some particular county only.

All local actions must be brought in the county where the cause of action arose.

In general, all actions are local which seek the recovery of real property; 2 W. Bla. 1070; 4 Term 504; 7 id. 589; 81 Tex. 882; whether founded upon contract or not; or damages for injury to such property, as waste, under the statute of Gloucester, trespass quare clausum fregit, trespass or case for injuries affecting things real, as for nuisances to houses or lands, disturbance of rights of way or of common, obstruction or diversion of ancient watercourses; 1 Chitty, Pl. 371; Gould, Pl. § 105; 180 Ind. 187; but not if there was a contract between the parties on which to ground an action; 15 Mass. 364; 1 Day Conn. 368.

Many actions arising out of injuries to local rights are local: as, quare impedit; 1 Chitty, Pl. 241. The action of replevin is also local; 1 Wms. Saund. 347, n. 1; Gould, Pl. § 111. See Gould; Chitty, Pleading; Comyns, Dig. Action; TRANSITORY ACTION.

LOCAL ALLEGIANCE. The allegiance due to a government from an alien while within its limits. 1 Bla. Com. 870; 2 Kent 63, 64.

LOCAL COURTS. Courts limited to a particular territory or district. The term frequently signifies the state courts in opposition to the United States courts. See COMMUNAL COURTS; FRANCHISE COURTS; FEUDAL COURTS; MANORIAL COURTS.

LOCAL FREIGHT. Freight shipped from either terminus to a way station, or vice versa, or from one way station to another,—that is over a part of a railroad only. 61 Ala. 570.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT. The government of a particular locality; the governmental authority of a municipal corporation over its individual affairs by virtue of power delegated to it by the general government.

The expression has more definite meaning in England, where important statutes exist, known as the local government acts regulating the administration of local affairs by the people concerned, than it has yet acquired in America. Abbott.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

A department of State in Great Britain created in 1871 to concentrate in one department of the government the supervision of the laws relating to public health, the relief of the poor, and local government. The president is usually a member of the cabinet and has a staff of permanent assistants. The lord president of the council, all the secretaries of state, the lord privy seal, and the chancellor of the exchequer are ex officio members. It has the power of making regulations which have the effect of statutes. It has complete control in poor law matters; very important powers relating to the pollution of streams; the adulteration of food, etc.; vaccination; the supervision of loans by local authorities and auditing their accounts. Local authorities may ask its advice; it may investigate as to the outbreak of diseases; and must report especially as to all bills relating to public matters. See 7 Encyc. of the Laws of England.

LOCAL IMPROVEMENT. An improvement made in a particular locality, by which the real property adjoining or near such locality is specifically benefited. (22 Minn. 494). The phrase is most commonly used to designate a class of street improvements in cities, such as grading, paving, etc. R. & L. Diet.

LOCAL LAW. Primarily, a law that in fact if not in form is directed only to a specific spot. 227 U. S. 56. See STATUTE.

LOCAL LEGISLATION. "Local" or special legislation applies exclusively to special or particular places, or special or particular persons, and is distinguished from a statute intending to be general in its operation, and that relating to classes of persons or subjects. 39 S. W. 50.

LOCAL OPTION. A term often used to designate a right granted by legislative enactments to the inhabitants of particular districts, to determine by ballot whether or not licenses shall be issued for the sale of intoxicating liquors within such districts.

An act of this character passed in Delaware, in 1847, was declared unconstitutional as an attempted delegation of the power to make laws, confided to the legislature; 4 Harr. 479; so, also, in Indiana and Iowa; 4 Ind. 342; 42 Ind. 547; 5 Ia. 495. This kind of legislation has been supported, however, as falling within the class of police regulations; 108 Mass. 27. In Pennsylvania, Agnew, J., in a leading opinion on this subject, says, the true distinction is this: "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law; but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend;" 72 Pa. 491. At this time the weight of authority is in favor of the constitutionality of local option laws; 86 N. J. L. 790; 42 Conn. 804; 42 Md. 71; 96 Mo. 44; 111 id. 538; 91 Mich. 504. See 12 Cent. L. J. 123; 13 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 133; Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 145. See DELEGATION; LIQUOR LAWS; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

LOCAL PREJUDICE. Prejudice or influence warranting the removal of a cause from a state court to a federal court. 81 Fed. Rep. 53. See REMOVAL; VENUE.

LOCAL STATUTES. See STATUTE.

LOCAL VENUE. In Pleading. A venue which must be laid in a particular county.

LOCATED VEIN. See LODE.

LOCALITY. In Scotch Law. This name is given to a life rent created in marriage contracts in favor of the wife, instead of leaving her to her legal life rent of terce. 1 Bell, Com. 55. See JOINTURE.

LOCATAIRE. In French Law. A lessee, tenant, or renter.

LOCATARIUS. A deposites.

LOCATE. To ascertain the place in which something belongs, as to locate the calls in a deed or survey; to determine the place to which something shall be assigned; to fix or establish the situation of anything. Abbott.

LOCATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. Letting for hire. Calvinus, Lex.; Voc. Jur. Utr. The term is also used by text-writers upon the law of bailment at common law. 2 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. 121. In Scotch law it is translated location. Bell, Dict.

LOCATIO CONDUCTIO REI. See HIRE.

LOCATIO CUSTODIÆ. In Civil Law. The receiving of goods on deposit for reward.

LOCATIO OPERIS FACIENDI (Lat.). In Civil Law. Hire of services to be performed. See HIRE.

LOCATIO OPERIS MERCUM VENDENDARUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The carriage of goods for hire.

LOCATION. At Common Law. The act of selecting and designating lands which the person making the location is authorized by law to select.

It is applied among surveyors who are authorized by public authority to lay out lands by a particular warrant. The act of selecting the land designated in the warrant and surveying it is called its location. In Pennsylvania, it is an application made by any person for land, in the office of the secretary of the late land office of Pennsylvania, and entered in the books of said office, numbered and sent to the surveyor-general's office. Act June 25, 1781, § 2. It is often applied to denote the act of selecting and marking out the line upon which a railroad, canal, or highway is to be constructed.

In Mining Law. A parcel of land appropriated according to certain established rules, such as placing on the ground, in a conspicuous position, a notice setting forth the name of the locator, the fact that it is thus taken or located, with the requisite description of the extent and boundaries of the parcel according to the local custom. 104 U. S. 649. See also U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2324.

A location cannot be validated by subsequent discovery; a prior discovery is necessary; 7 Mont. 449. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

In Scotch Law. See LOCATIO; BAILMENT; HIRE.

LOCATIVE CALLS. Calls or requirements of a deed, etc., for certain landmarks, describing certain means by which the land to be located can be identified.

Reference to physical objects in entries and deeds, by which the land to be located is exactly described. 2 Bibb 145; 3 id. 414.

Special, as distinguished from general, calls or descriptions; 3 Bibb 414; 2 Wheat. 211; 10 id. 463; 7 Pet. 171; 18 Wend. 157; 10 Gratt. 445; Jones, Law 469; 16 Ga. 141; 5 Ind. 302; 15 Mo. 80.

LOCATOR. In Civil Law. He who leases or lets a thing for hire to another. His duties are, first, to deliver to the hirer the thing hired, that he may use it; second, to guarantee to the hirer the free enjoyment of it; third, to keep the thing hired in good order in such manner that the hirer may enjoy it; fourth, to warrant that the thing hired has not such defects as to destroy its use. Pothier, Contr. de Louage, n. 53.

One who locates, or surveys lands. The claim of a "locator" is peculiar to Kentucky, and is for a portion of the land located in compensation for his services; 4 Pet. 446. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

LOOK-UP HOUSE. A place used temporarily as a prison.

LOCO PARENTIS. See IN LOCO PARENTIS.

LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE. An engine which moves cars by its own forward and backward motion. 84 N. Y. 314. An ordinance regulating the speed of cars includes a locomotive engine; 150 Ill. 587.

LOCUM TENENS. Holding the place. A deputy. See LIEUTENANT.

LOCUS CONTRACTUS. See LEX LOCI.

LOCUS CRIMINIS. The locality or place of a crime.

LOCUS DELICTI. The place where the tort, offence, or injury has been committed.

LOCUS PARTITUS. In Old English Law. A division made between two towns or counties to make trial where the land or place in question lies. Fleta, l. 4, c. xv.

LOCUS POENITENTIÆ (Lat.) a place of repentance. The opportunity of withdrawing from a projected contract, before the parties are finally bound; or of abandoning the intention of committing a crime, before it has been completed. 2 Bro. C. C. 569. Until an offer is accepted by the offeree the party making it may withdraw it at any time. So of a bid at auction. "An auction is not inaptly called locus poenitentiae." 3 Term 148. See ATTEMPT; CONTRACT; REFUSAL.

LOCUS IN QUO (Lat.) the place in which. In Pleading. The place where anything is alleged to have been done. 1 Salk. 94.

LOCUS REI SITÆ. See LEX REI SITÆ.

LOCUS SIGILLI (Lat.) The place of the seal.

In many of the states, instead of sealing deeds, writs, and other papers or documents requiring it, a scroll is made, in which the letters L. S. are printed or written, which is an abbreviation of Locus sigilli. This, in some of the states, has all the efficacy of a seal, but in others it has no such effect. See SCROLL; SEAL.

LOCUS STANDI (a place of standing). A right of appearance in a court of justice or before a legislative body, on a given question. A right to be heard.

It is commonly used in England in reference to parliamentary practice and usually as to the passage of private bills. There is a series of reports called Locus Standi Reports in the Court of Referees. See May, Parl. Rep. 761; 9 Jurid. Rev. 47, 206; REFEREES.

LODE. A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock located within defined boundaries within the general mass of the mountain. 1 McCrary 480.

A body of mineral or mineral-bearing rock in the general mass, so far as it may continue unbroken and without interruption, whatever the boundaries may be. 143 U. S. 394; 116 id. 629.

Veins or lodes as used in the statutes mean lines or aggregations of metal embedded in quartz or other rock in piece; 128 U. S. 679.

"It is difficult to give any definition of the term, as understood and used in the acts of congress, which will not be subject to criticism. A fissure in the earth's crust, an opening in its rocks, a strata made by some force of nature, in which a mineral is deposited, was said to be essential to a lode in the judgment of geologists. But to the practical miner, the fissure and its walls are only of importance as indicating the boundaries within which he may look for and reasonably expect to find the ore he seeks. A continuous body of mineralized rock lying within any other well defined boundaries on the earth's surface and under it, would equally constitute in his eyes a lode. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the term as used in the acts of congress is applicable to any zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rock." 116 U. S. 529, citing 4 Sawy. 802.

By act of congress the owner of a mineral vein or lode is entitled not only to that which is covered by the surface lines of his established claim, as those lines are extended vertically, but also to the right to possess and enjoy that lode or vein by following it when it passes outside of those vertical lines laterally; 116 U. S. 529; but this right is dependent upon its being the same vein as that within those limits; and for its exercise, it must appear that the vein outside is identical with and a continuation of the one within these lines; id. See 73 Cal. 169; 53 Fed. Rep. 106; LANDS, PUBLIC.

A "known vein or lode" refers to a vein or lode whose existence is known, as contradistinguished from one which has been appropriated by location. It is not to be taken as synonymous with "located vein." 143 U. S. 400; 127 U. S. 353.

LODE MANAGE. The hire of a pilot, for conducting a ship from one place to another. Cowel.

The Lodesmen had a monopoly of pilotage in the Cinque Ports (q. v.). Their society was controlled by the court of lodemenage, which was transferred to the trinity house in 1853. See Lyons, Cinque Ports.

LODGE. To make, prefer, as to lodge a complaint or information; to deposit or file with.

In a statute containing the words "not earlier than 60 days after said application is lodged" with the judge of said court," the word "lodged" is construed as received. 99 Ky. 229, 35 S. W. 629.

LODGER. One who inhabits a portion of a house of which another has the general possession and custody.

It is difficult to state exactly the distinctions between a lodger, a guest, and a boarder. A person may be a guest at an inn without being a lodger; 1 Salk. 888; 9 Pick. 280; 25 Wend. 653, 242; 16 Ala. n. s. 606; 8 Blackf. 535; 14 Barb. 193; 6 C. B. 132. And boarder includes one who regularly takes his meals with, and forms in some degree a part of, the householder's family; 25 E. L. & Eq. 76. A lodger does not take meals in the house as lodger; but the duration of the inhabitation is of no importance as determining his character. The difficulty in this respect is in deciding whether a person is an under-tenant, entitled to notice to quit, or merely a lodger, and not entitled to such notice. See Woodf. L. & T., 2d ed. 132, 177; 7 M. & G. 87; BOARDER; GUEST; INN; INNKEEPER.

LODGING HOUSE ACTS. Various acts for the well ordering of common lodging houses, beginning in 1851 with the stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 28.

An act for the regulation and licensing of public lodging houses is a legitimate exercise of the police power; 180 Pa. 47.

LODS ET RENTES. A fine payable to the seigneur upon every sale of lands within his seigniority. 1 Low. C. 59.

Any transfer of lands for a consideration gives rise to the claim; 1 Low. C. 79; as, the creation of a rente viagère (life-rent); 1 Low. C. 84; a transfer under baul emphyteutique; 1 Low. C. 395; a promise to sell, accompanied by transfer of possession; 9 Low. C. 272. It does not arise on a transfer by a father to his son subject to a payment by the son of a life-rent to the father, and of the father's debts; 8 Low. C. 84, 324; nor where property is required for public uses; 1 Low. C. 91.

LOG-BOOK. A ship's journal. It contains a minute account of the ship's course, with a short history of every occurrence during the voyage. 1 Marsh. Ins. 408.

The part of the log-book relating to transactions in the harbor is termed the harbor log; that relating to what happens at sea, the sea log. Young, Naut. Dic.

When a log-book is required by law to be kept, it is an official register so far as regards the transactions required by law to be entered in it, but no further. Abbott, Shipp., 13th ed. 984; 1 Sumn. 373; 4 Mas. 544; 1 Doda. 9; 3 Hagg. Eccl. 159; Gilp. 147.

All vessels making foreign voyages from the United States, or of the burden of seventy-five tons or more, from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa, must have an official log-book; Rev. Stat. § 4290; in which must be entered:—Every offence committed by a member of the crew for which it is intended to prosecute or to enforce a forfeiture; every offence for which punishment is inflicted on board, and the punishment inflicted; a statement of the character, conduct, and qualifications of each member of the crew, or a statement that the master declines to give such particulars; every case of illness or of injury to any member of the crew, the nature thereof, and the medical treatment; every death on board and the cause thereof; every birth, with the sex of the infant, and the name of the parents; every marriage, with the names and ages of the parties; the name of any seaman who ceases to be a member of the crew, and the place, time, manner, and cause thereof; a statement of the wages due any seaman or apprentice who dies during the voyage and the gross amount of all deductions to be made; the sale of the effects of the deceased seaman, including a statement of each article sold and the sum received for it. Id. §§ 4290-4292.

In suits for seamen's wages, the log-book is to be produced if required, or otherwise the plaintiff may state its contents. The neglect of a seaman to render himself on board, and his absence without leave, are also to be entered on the log-book in certain cases, or the sailor's fault will not forfeit his wages. Acts 20 July, 1790, §§ 2, 5, & 6; 7 June, 1872; 27 Feb. 1877.

In collision actions log-books are not evidence for the ship in which they are kept, though they are against them; L. R. 1 P. C. 878; though the master and mate were both dead; 10 P. D. 31.

For the English law on the subject, see Merch. Shipp. Act 1894; Maude & Poll. Merch. Shipp.

It is the duty of the mate to keep the log-book. Dana, Seaman's Friend 145, 300.

Every entry shall be signed by the master and mate or some other one of the crew, and shall be made as soon as possible after the occurrence to which it relates. For keeping the log in an improper manner the master is punishable by fine; U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 4291, 4292.

LOG ROLLING. Mutual compacts between members of a legislature by which one assists the passage of a bill in which he has no interest in consideration of like assistance from the interested member.

As to constitutional provisions concerning such practices, see HODGE PODGE ACT; STATUTES.

Embracing in one bill distinct matters, none of which, perhaps, could singly obtain the assent of the legislature, and procuring its passage by a combination of the minorities in favor of the separate measures. Anderson; 80 Ala. 369.

LOGICAL IMPOSSIBILITY. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

LOGS. The stems or trunks of trees cut into convenient lengths for the purpose of being afterwards manufactured into lumber of various kinds. 52 Wis. 398.

When logs are driven in a navigable stream in an ordinarily skilful and prudent manner, the owner is not liable for damages sustained by a riparian owner; 67 Wis. 569.

Such logs floating down a stream may be moored to the shore for a reasonable length of time for the purpose of making them into rafts, or for breaking up the rafts, or to enable the owner to sell them; 23 Minn. 430; 3 Ore. 445; 50 Cal. 129; 51 Me. 264. But they may not be so stored as to prevent another from entering with a drive of logs from a tributary; 78 Me. 329; nor may they be run upon adjacent lands on causewater to overflow, to the injury of the riparian proprietor; 14 Ore. 319; 81 Ala. 284; or obstruct a landing place on a navigable river; 145 Mass. 261; and where a boom obstructs navigation or interferes with the use of a dock built in aid of navigation it is a nuisance; 66 Wis. 476.

Boom companies are not insurers of the logs collected by their booms, nor are they liable for logs which escape by inevitable accident; 109 Pa. 57; except where they fail to exercise due care; 90 Me. 125. Where logs drift from a raft broken by a storm without fault of the owner, he is not obliged to recapture and remove them, when by so doing he must resort to extraordinary methods and unreasonable expense, in order to escape liability caused by a subsequent storm, although he has not abandoned them; 49 La. Ann. 1184. See LIEN; RIVERS; NAVIGABLE WATERS; RIPARIAN RIGHTS; TIMBER; BOOM COMPANIES.

LONDON COURT OF BANKRUPTCY. See COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

LONDON AND MIDDLESEX SITTINGS. The vis prius sittings held at Westminster or in the Guildhall of London for the trial of causes arising for the most part in London or Middlesex. 3 Steph. Com. 514. See TERM. GUILDHALL SITTINGS.

LONG PARLIAMENT. The parliament which met November, 1640, under Charles I., and was dissolved (informally) by Cromwell on the 10th of April, 1653. The same name is also given to the parliament which met in 1661 and was dissolved Dec. 30, 1678. The latter is sometimes called, by way of distinction, the "Long Parliament of Charles II." Moz. & W.

LONG QUINTO, THE. An expression used to denote part II. of the Year-book which gives reports of cases in 5 Edw. IV. Wallace, Reporters.

LONG AND SHORT HAUL. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

LONG VACATION. The recess of the English courts from August 12th to October 24th. See TERM.

LONG YEARLINGS. In stockmen's parlance, cattle entering their second year, and before completing it, are called "long yearlings." 115 Ky. 461, 74 S. W. 185.

LONGEVITY PAY. Extra compensation for longevity in actual service in the army or navy. 18 Ct. Cl. 111.

Its introduction was intended (1) to induce men to enter the service and remain in it for life; (2) to remove the depressing influence of long years of service in one grade without increase of pay; (3) to compensate for increased professional knowledge and efficiency of officers by increasing their pay in advance of promotion. Id.

The act relating to longevity pay deals with credit for length of service and the additional pay which arises therefrom, and not with the matter of regular salary, and it has no reference to benefits derived from promotion to different grades, but is confined to the lowest grade having graduated pay; 129 U. S. 249; 161 id. 862, 866.

Service as midshipman at a naval academy is service as an officer in the navy as respects longevity pay; 125 U. S. 646; 128 id. 234; 124 id. 809; so is that of a cadet at West Point; 113 U. S. 1; a private in the marine corps who was one of the members of the marine band is entitled to the benefit of the act; 124 U. S. 801; and officers retired from active service; 124 U. S. 391. It is not necessary that one should have entered the service more than once; 128 U. S. 196; but service in a volunteer regiment will not be included in computing the time of service of an officer; 157 U. S. 381.

In a suit for longevity pay, a sum previously paid the claimant for such pay to which he was not entitled, may be deducted from the sum found to be due him; 151 U. S. 386.

LOOK-OUT. A person upon board a vessel, stationed in a favorable position to see, and near enough to the helmsman to communicate with him, and exclusively employed in watching the movements of other vessels. 12 How. 462. See COLLISION; VESSELS; NAVIGATION RULES.

On Railroads. The "lookout" that is contemplated by the law means a "look-out" that will enable the party keeping it, to discover, in the exercise of reasonable care, the presence of persons on the track in time to give them warning of the danger and to prevent injury to them, by the application of the brake or the other means at hand 151 Ky. 750, 152 S. W. 947.

LOQUELA (Lat.). In Practice. An imprecation, loquela sine die, a respite in law to an indefinite time. Formerly by loquela was meant the allegations of fact mutually made on either side, now denominated the pleadings. Steph. Pl. Andr. ed. § 81.

LORD. In English Law. A person of whom land is held by another as his tenant. Hereditary peers and lords of parliament not hereditary peers. It is not at the present time a title of honor in itself, but an appellation of some particular titles of honor or dignities. By custom it extends to the sons of dukes and marquises and the eldest sons of earls. It is also bestowed on certain official persons in respect of their offices, as mayors of cities, the lord chancellor, judges of the high court, etc. Ency. Laws of Engl.

The relation between the lord and the tenant is called tenure (q. v.) and the right or interest which the lord has in the services of his tenant is called a lordship or seignory (q. v.). Byrne.

The word is derived from the Saxon hlaf, a loaf of bread, and ford, to give, because such great men kept extraordinary houses, and fed all the poor; for which reason they were called givers of bread (hlaford). Wharton.

LORD ADVOCATE. See ADVOCATE.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN. An officer in the sovereign's household, whose chief duties now consist in attending upon and attending the sovereign at his coronation; in the care of the ancient palace of Westminster, the charge of and furnishing Westminster hall and the houses of parliament on state occasions, and attendance upon peers and bishops at their creation or doing of homage. 2 Enc. of Laws of Engl. 428.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD. In Old English Law. He who had the oversight and government of all officers belonging to the king's chamber, except the bed-chamber which was under the groom of the stole (q. v.), and also of the wardrobe. Jacob.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE COMMON PLEAS. The title of the chief judge of the court of common pleas. Now obsolete. See LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND. The title of the lord chief justice of the queen's bench, formerly a popular title and first fully recognized by the judicature act, 1873. He is ex officio a judge of the court of appeal, and president of the high court, in the absence of the lord chancellor. He has all the statutory powers of the lord chief justice of the common pleas and the lord chief baron. He alone is entitled to wear on state occasions the collar of SS.

LORD GREAT CHAMBERLAIN. An hereditary office in England dating from the year 1133, the duties of which consist of certain ceremonial attendances at a coronation, of the care of the Houses of Parliament, and of introducing peers and bishops on their first taking their seats in the Lords. Byrne.

LORD IN GROSS. He who is lord, not by reason of any manor, but as the king in respect of his crown, etc. Whart.

LORD JUSTICE OF APPEAL. See LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK. In Scotch Law. The second judicial officer in Scotland.

LORD KEEPER. Keeper of the Great Seal, originally another name for the Lord Chancellor (q. v.). After Henry II's reign the offices were sometimes divided: now there cannot be a Lord Chancellor and Lord Keeper at the same time, for by the statute 5 Eliz. c. 18, they are declared to be the same office. Down to 1760 the Great Seal was sometimes held by a Lord Keeper instead of by a Lord Chancellor; but since that date there has been no Lord Keeper. Byrne. See CANCELLARIUS.

LORD LIEUTENANT. In English Law. Lords lieutenants of counties were first appointed about the reign of Henry VIII. as standing representatives of the crown to keep the counties in military order. They succeeded to the duties of sheriffs and justices of the peace. Till 1871 the militia was under the command of the lord lieutenant. They still retain duties for the preservation of peace. They are appointed by the queen, and may appoint deputy-lieutenants. Enc. Laws of Engl. They exist in the counties of England and Wales.

It is also the title of the chief representative of the crown in Ireland.

Their connection with the military forces of the crown was revived by the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1917, which gave the lord lieutenant the option of becoming president of the county association formed under that act for the purpose of administering the military forces of the crown (other than the regulars and their reserves) within the county. Subject to the approval of the crown, they nominate persons for the lowest rank of officer in the county territorial units. They have also the power of recommending persons for the commission of the peace; and the crown usually, though not invariably, gives effect to their recommendations. The appointment to the office is made by the crown, under the Militia Act, 1882, s. 29. The lord lieutenant, with the consent of the crown, appoints as deputy lieutenants twenty persons having places of residence within the county, or within seven miles thereof, who are "shown to the satisfaction of a Secretary of State to have rendered worthy service as a member of, or in a civil capacity in connection with, His Majesty's naval, military or air forces," or such number, being less than twenty, as there may be of such persons. He may, with the consent of the crown, appoint one of such deputy lieutenants to act for him as vice-lieutenant during his absence, sickness, or other inability to act.

Recruits for the Territorial Army may be attested by any lord lieutenant or deputy lieutenant.

There are separate lords lieutenant for each of the ridings of Yorkshire; and there is also a separate lord lieutenant for the district known as the town and county of Haverfordwest, which is part of Pembroke-shire.

In the city of London the Lord Mayor, although not entitled the Lord Lieutenant, is ex officio the head of the city lieutenancy, and recommends to the Crown the names of persons to fill vacancies therein. Byrne.

LORD MAYOR. The chief officer of the city of London and some other cities.

The origin of the appellation of lord, which the mayor of London enjoys, is attributed to the fourth charter of Edward III., which conferred on that officer the honor of having maces, the same as royal, carried before him by the sergeants. Abbott; Pull. Laws and Cust. Lond.

LORD MAYOR'S COURT. In English Law. One of the chief courts of special and local jurisdiction in London. It is a court of the queen, held before the lord mayor and aldermen. In this court, the recorder, or, in his absence, the common sergeant, presides as judge; 3 Steph. Com., 11th ed. §16, n.; 2 Brett, Com. 782.

LORD PRIVY SEAL. See KEEPER OF THE PRIVY SEAL.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. See PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL.

LORD STEWARD. The chief officer of a department of the queen's household. See COURT OF THE LORD HIGH STEWARD.

LORD STEWARD OF THE KING'S HOUSEHOLD. This is an office quite distinct from that of the Lord High Steward. (See COURT OF THE LORD HIGH STEWARD.) He originally presided over the now abolished Court of the Lord Steward of the King's Household and was, in theory, one of the two judges of the Palace Court; he still appoints the Coroner of the King's Household; but his main function from the beginning was, and still is, to supervise the servants and the arrangements of the Royal Household, as regards all matters not entrusted to the Master of the House, or the Lord Chamberlain, or not relating to the Chapels Royal. The office is not hereditary: it is always held by a peer, who is always a member of the political party which is in office for the time being. Byrne.

LORD TREASURER. The full title of this officer was the Lord High Treasurer and Treasurer of the Exchequer. As Lord High Treasurer, he was appointed by receiving a white staff from the king; as Treasurer of the Exchequer, he was appointed by letters patent. The office, which dates from the earliest Norman period, was never hereditary. It was in early times always held by some one person; in 1612 it was put in commission; from then until 1714 it was sometimes held personally and was sometimes in commission; and since 1714 it has always been in commission. The Commissioners constitute the Treasury Board, which never meets now, but which used to meet, in gradually diminishing numbers, until the middle of the last century. It now consists of the First Lord of the Treasury (usually either the Prime Minister or the Leader of the House of Commons) who exercises as regards finance only what may be termed an appellate jurisdiction, the Chancellor of the Exchequer (who is for all practical purposes the Lord Treasurer), a couple of Junior Lords, a Patronage Secretary, and a Financial Secretary, all of whom are members of Parliament. Byrne.

LORD WARDEN OF CINQUE PORTS. See CINQUE PORTS.

LORDS OF APPEAL. Peers of the house of lords of whom at least three must be present to constitute a sitting of the house for judicial business.

LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY. Two persons who have held high judicial office, appointed to aid the house of lords in the hearing of appeals. They rank as barons for life but vote in the house of lords during the tenure of their office. App. Jur. Act, 1876, s. 6.

Persons appointed by the queen of England for the purpose of aiding the House of Lords in the hearing and determination of appeals. They must have held some high judicial office for two years, or have been practicing barristers or advocates for at least fifteen years. R. & L. Dict.

LORDS APPELLANT. The five peers who superseded Richard II. in his government, and whom he superseded after a brief control of the government.

Richard II.'s eighteen commissioners (twelve peers and six commoners) took their place, as an embryo privy council acting with full powers, during the parliamentary recess. R. & L. Dict.; Brown.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS. The persons charged with the duties of a high public office which has been put into commission in lieu of being devolved upon an individual officer.

Thus there is in lieu of the lord treasurer and lord high admiral of former times, the lords commissioners of the treasury, and the lords commissioners of the admiralty; and whenever the Great Seal is put into commission, the persons charged with it are called commissioners or lords commissioners of the Great Seal. Abbott; M. & W.

LORD'S DAY. Sunday. Co. Litt. 135. See MAXIMA, Dies Dominica.

LORDS MARSHERS. Those noble men who lived on the marches of Wales or Scotland; who in times past had their laws and power of life and death, like petty kings. Abolished by 27 Henry VIII. c. 26, and 6 Edw. VI. c. 10.

LORDS ORDAINERS. Lords appointed in 1313 for the control of the sovereign and court party for the general reform of the country. Brown.

LORDS OF PARLIAMENT. See PARLIAMENT.

LORDS OF REGALITY. In Scotch Law. Persons to whom rights of civil and criminal jurisdiction were given by the crown. Bell, Dict.

LORDS SPIRITUAL. See PARLIAMENT.

LORDS TEMPORAL. See PARLIAMENT.

LORDSHIP. Dominion, manor, domain; also a title of honor given to a nobleman. Also given to judges and other persons in authority.

LOSS. When used in a statute with reference to a loss of goods by common carriers, loss means injury or damage to the goods, as well as their destruction or disappearance. 71 Ga. 40; 88 id. 805.

In Insurance. The destruction of or damage to the insured subject by the perils insured against, according to the express provisions and construction of the contract.

These accidents, or misfortunes, or perils, as they are usually denominated, are all distinctly enumerated in the policy. And no loss, however great or unforeseen, can be a loss within the policy unless it be the direct and immediate consequence of one or more of these perils. Marsh. Ins. 1, c. 12.

Loss under a life policy is the death of the subject by a cause the risk of which is not expressly excepted in the policy, and where the loss is not fraudulent, as where one assured, who insures the life of another for his own benefit, procures the death.

Loss in insurance against fire must, under the usual form of policy, be by the partial or total destruction or damage of the thing insured by fire.

In maritime insurance, in which loss by fire is one of the risks usually included, the loss insured against may be absolutely or constructively total, or a partial or general average loss, or a particular average. See AVERAGE.

In other forms of insurance what constitutes a loss is determined by the risks or perils insured against as specified in the policy. As to the various kinds of which see the sub-titles of INSURANCE.

A partial loss is any loss or damage short of, or not amounting to, a total loss; for if it be not the latter it must be the former. See 4 Mass. 374; 6 id. 102, 122, 317; 12 id. 170, 238; 8 Johns. 237; 10 id. 487; 5 Binn. 595; 2 S. & R. 553.

Partial losses are sometimes denominated average losses, because they are often in the nature of those losses which are the subject of average contributions; and they are distinguished into general and particular averages. See AVERAGE.

A total loss is such destruction of, or damage to, the thing insured that it is of little or no value to the owner.

Total losses, in maritime insurance, are absolutely such when the entire thing perishes or becomes of no value. Constructively, a loss may become total where the value remaining is of such a small amount that the whole may be surrendered. See 2 Phill. Ins. ch. xvii.; 2 Johns. 286; Beach, Ins. § 916; 66 Tex. 103; 44 La. Ann. 714; ABANDONMENT.

It is under marine policies that questions of constructive total loss most frequently arise. Such loss may be by capture or seizure by unlawful violence, as piracy; Arn. Ins., 6th ed. § 51; 1 Phil. Ins. § 1106; 2 E. L. & E. 85; or damage to ship or goods over half of the value at the time and place of loss; 1 Curt. C. C. 148; 9 Cush. 415; 5 Den. 342; 19 Ala. N. S. 108; or loss of the voyage; 4 Me. 431; 24 Miss. 461; 19 N. Y. 272; 1 Mart. La. 221; though the ship or goods may survive in specie, but so as not to be fit for use in the same character for the same service or purpose; 2 Caines, Cas. 324; Valin, tom. 2, tit. Ass. a. 46; or by jettison; 1 Caines 196; or by necessity to save on account of the action and effect of the peril insured against; 5 Gray 154; 1 Cra. 202; or by loss of insured freight consequent on the loss of cargo or ship; 18 Johns. 208.

There may be a claim for a total loss in addition to a partial loss; 17 How. 585. A total loss of the ship is not necessarily such of cargo; 3 Binn. 287; nor is submersion necessarily a total loss; 7 East 38; nor is temporary delay of the voyage; 5 B. & Ald. 597.

A constructive total loss, and an abandonment thereupon of the ship, is a constructive total loss of freight; and a constructive total loss and abandonment of cargo has a like effect as to commissions or profits thereon; and the validity of the abandonment will depend upon the actual facts at the time of the abandonment, as the same may subsequently prove to have been; 2 Phillips, Ins. § 1630; 3 Johns. Cas. 93. See ABANDONMENT.

An insured cannot recover for a total loss of a vessel, in the absence of proof of abandonment and of notice of the same on the insurer; 40 La. Ann. 553.

In determining the proportion which the cost of repairing a vessel must bear to its value, so as to justify its abandonment to the insurers as a constructive total loss, its value as stated in the policy controls, and not its actual value immediately before the accident; 25 N. Y. S. 414.

Under a fire insurance policy it is not necessary to show that all the material of the building was destroyed, to sustain a finding of total loss, and where it is such a loss, a provision of the policy limiting the amount to less than the sum written is invalid; 44 Neb. 549; 90 Tex. 170. The loss has been held to be total where the building was so injured as to lose its identity; 29 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 93; 93 Wis. 520; or so that it was unsafe and was condemned by the municipal authorities; 47 La. Ann. 1563. But where the roof and interior woodwork of a building were destroyed, leaving the walls standing, it was a question for the jury whether it was a total loss within the meaning of the policy; 85 Hun 250.

The insurance company is liable for goods stolen while being removed to avoid impending loss by fire though the policy reads, "nor shall the company be liable for loss by theft," which evidently applies to theft from show windows. 6 Bush. (Ky.) 639.

PROOFS OF LOSS. It is a usual condition in all policies in insurance that immediate notice of loss shall be given by the insured, and generally some time is named within which the proofs of loss shall be given in writing to the company. Compliance with such is a condition precedent, and notice, or waiver of it, must be shown; 48 Kan. 239; 40 Neb. 700; 60 Mo. App. 673; though there is a mortgage clause; 99 Ga. 65; but where there is such clause, a mortgagee is not required to make proofs; 5 Kan. App. 137.

Failure to make proof is not excused by refusal of the company to furnish blanks; 8 Ohio Cir. Ct. 620. A statement mailed within the time is rendered to the company; 189 Ill. 298; and notice duly addressed, stamped, and mailed is presumed to have been received, if not denied; 3 Ind. App. 332. Where a statute requires notice "accompanied by an affidavit" of the circumstances, they need not be attached together or delivered at the same moment; 84 Ia. 93. Notice is conclusively shown when the company sends an adjuster; 151 Pa. 607; or telegraphs an adjuster to give it attention; 48 Mo. App. 65. A new proof of loss made long afterwards under promise of settlement if the claim was reduced, was mere surplage and did not affect the rights of the insured; 137 N. Y. 389; and where the policy required duplicate bills, vouchers, etc., it was only necessary to show reasonable effort to obtain them; 182 Pa. 357. An itemized estimate of the cost of rebuilding is sufficient compliance with a requirement of a verified certificate of the value of the building destroyed; 65 Fed. Rep. 292; contra, 96 Ia. 224. A false statement in the affidavit of loss, made by mistake, will not vitiate a policy which provides that it shall be void in case of any false swearing by the insured in relation to the insurance; 107 Mich. 833; and formal defects or irregularities which cannot be obviated will not prevent recovery; 26 Ins. L. J. 605.

Formal or preliminary proofs may be waived by parol; 40 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 670. A waiver of proofs results from a denial of all liability; 16 Ind. App. 160; 10 App. D. C. 277; 16 Wash. 135; or a denial on other grounds; 97 Tenn. 1; 69 Mo. App. 126; 13 App. Div. N. Y. 444; as from the defence that the policy was never in force; 49 Neb. 811; or the omission to object to the form; 153 Pa. 398; but they are not waived by careful investigation; 42 U. S. App. 81; s. c. 74 Fed. Rep. 507; or by reason of an irresistible conclusion that the company had determined to defend the suit, resulting from assertions made during the negotiations; id.; or by an offer of compromise; 42 W. Va. 426; or by a refusal after insufficient proofs are furnished to consider the loss unless a specified claim should be eliminated; 57 Kan. 576; or by the mere denial of liability on the ground that the property destroyed was not covered; 90 Me. 385; 151 Pa. 607; 93 U. S. 572; 83 N. Y. 103; or mere silence; 86 Ala. 558; or a promise by local agents, without authority to adjust, that the loss would be paid; 77 Ia. 378. The act relied on to establish a waiver must occur within the time fixed by the policy; 58 Mo. App. 225. The insured does not lose the benefit of a waiver by making proofs, and he may plead both compliance and the waiver; 98 Ia. 221. The proofs should ordinarily be made by the insured, but where he is not in a position to make them in person, they may be made by an agent; 106 Ill. 400; or mortgagee to whom the policy is made payable; 56 Hun 399; or the company's adjuster; 131 Ind. 572; 85 Wis. 229; and they may be in the name of a firm; 122 N. Y. 545. Where the policy requires proofs "as soon as possible," what is reasonable time is a mixed question of law and fact; 110 Pa. 530; 70 Ia. 704.

ARBITRATION. A common provision in policies for all kinds of insurance is one for compulsory arbitration in case of difference between the parties as to the amount of loss. Such a provision has been held void as ousting the court of its jurisdiction; 21 Misc. Rep. 124; contra, 112 Ala. 318; 50 N. J. L. 453. An award is not required as a condition precedent to a right of action, but a refusal for a demand of appraisal may be set up as a bar; 16 Wash. 292, in which rehearing was denied; 47 Pac. Rep. 885; but it has been held a condition precedent; 69 Mo. App. 232; 71 Tex. 5; but not unless requested in writing; 96 Ia. 70; and it is inoperative where no arbitrators are agreed upon; 57 Kan. 95; and is not applicable to a case of total loss; 50 Hun 172; or to the portion of the insured property totally destroyed; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 39; or where the insurer denies liability; 120 N. C. 302; or in case of total loss under valued policy acts; 74 Wis. 67; 36 Neb. 461; 61 Mo. App. 572. Formal notice of the proceedings of appraisers is not necessary to a party who has knowledge of them; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 218. A valuation by the company's adjuster and builders selected by the insured is an appraisal within the policy, without previous effort to agree upon the loss; 36 U. S. App. 327; s. c. 71 Fed. Rep. 120.

Appraisers cannot determine the construction of the policy; 17 App. Div. N. Y. 87; and the award may be set aside where it is grossly below the actual loss; 12 Tex. Civ. App. 572; but not for a mere mistake, not appearing on its face; 12 App. Div. N. Y. 218; and it need not state the manner of arriving at the result; id.

Consult Phillips; Arnold; May, Insurance; Pars. Mar. Law; TOTAL LOSS.

LOST CORNER. See BOUNDARY.

LOST INSTRUMENT. A document or paper which has been so mislaid that it cannot be found after diligent search.

Suits to establish lost instruments are within the jurisdiction of equity, but the proof as to the contents must be clear and satisfactory; 35 Fla. 212; and such a suit will not be entertained to establish the lost instrument merely as a piece of written evidence to sustain an action of tort; 66 Fed. Rep. 799.

This equitable jurisdiction extends to ordering the issue of bonds to replace those lost, where the loss or destruction was without fault of the party seeking relief; and it can be done without derogating from positive agreement or violating equal or superior equities in other parties. Such relief has been given in case of bonds stolen and hidden in the ground at the evacuation of Petersburg by the Confederate forces; 45 Md. 102; and for bonds stolen from the vault of a bank; 27 N. J. Eq. 408.

A copy of a deed by joint makers cannot be established without proof of execution by all; 96 Ga. 197; and wherever it is sought to establish title to real property under a lost unrecorded deed, the rules as to the amount of evidence required is very strict; 89 Me. 462.

Formerly in such cases a resort to equity was compelled by the want of any remedy at law, resulting from the necessity of making perfect; 1 Ch. Cas. 77; but after perfect was dispensed with, the courts of law acquired concurrent jurisdiction and the loss of a paper would not prevent recovery; 1 Ves. 341; 7 id. 19; 3 V. & B. 54. Nevertheless a court of equity still has jurisdiction to establish a lost deed; 142 U. S. 417.

The fact that interest on a bond is payable upon "presentation and delivery of the coupon" will not prevent recovery on a lost coupon; 21 Misc. Rep. 439. Where a note is lost pending an action while in the hands of the justice, indemnity is not required; 43 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 904; and an allegation of loss after maturity of a note sued on, dispenses with the necessity of tender of indemnity; 141 Ind. 322. An action may be brought on a lost official bond; 57 Ill. App. 674. In an action for the breach of a lost contract, where the fact of its existence is controverted, it is a question for the jury; 24 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 241.

It is held that an action will lie upon a lost negotiable instrument; 10 Ad. & E. 616; 2 Spear. 1. 193. The weight of authority seems to be that an action would not lie on a lost negotiable note; 1 Exch. 167; 9 id. 604; 21 Gratt. 556; 46 N. C. 78; 17 Me. 9; 20 D. C. 191 (distinguishing id. 26, where the action was maintained on a note accidentally lost after being in evidence in that court); contra, 2 Bay 495; 18 Ga. 65; 1 R. I. 401; 3 Yeates 442, but see comments on these cases, 16 L. R. A. 305, n. In some courts the suit has been permitted upon giving indemnity; 34 Conn. 546; 4 Martin La. N. S. 4; 16 Pick. 315.

In some states and in England it is provided by statute that an action may be maintained on a lost negotiable instrument. Under such statutes it is held that they may be maintained without showing the absolute destruction of the instrument; 52 Ind. App. 210; but judgment cannot be recovered without indemnity; 60 Mo. App. 671; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 248.

Where the remedy at law is denied in the case of a lost negotiable instrument and there is no statute, relief must be sought by a bill in equity to compel payment after tender of indemnity; 7 B. & C. 90; 35 Neb. 693; Pars. N. & B. 262. The loss of a bond is no objection to its payment by the company which issued it, upon indemnity; 40 Vt. 390. The title of the true owner of a lost certificate of stock may be asserted against a subsequent owner even though he be a bona fide purchaser; 148 N. Y. 441.

The contents of a lost deed, will, agreement, etc., may be proved by secondary evidence after proof of its existence; 150 Pa. 538; and that diligent search has been made and that it cannot be found; Tayl. Ev. 402; 147 Pa. 447; the party's own evidence is sufficient for this purpose; 1

Atk. 446; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 349; or that of any one who knows the facts; 90 Ga. 731. See WILL.

Even a will proved to be lost may be admitted to probate upon secondary evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 84, 509, 575; 1 P. & D. 154; s. C. 17 Eng. Rep. 45, note; but this case has been characterized as going to the "verge of the law"; 11 App. Cas. 474. The fact of the loss must be proved by the clearest evidence; 8 Metc. 487; 2 Add. Eccl. 223; 6 Wend. 173; 1 Hagg. Eccl. 115. Where it has been in the custody of the testator and is not found at his death, it is presumed to have been destroyed, animo revocandi; 17 Moak's Engl. Rep. 511; 6 Wend. 173; 11 Biss. 265; especially where the testator knew of the loss while alive and did not produce it; 140 Pa. 242. Its absence is said to be prima facie evidence of cancellation; 1 Bay 457; but where no revocation is proved or presumed, declarations, written or oral, made by a testator, both before and after the execution of the will, are admissible as secondary evidence; id.; Steph. Ev. § 29; Beach, Wills § 73; 97 Mich. 49; Schoul. Wills § 402. And see 28 W. Va. 113, for an extended historical discussion of the subject. It is also said that chancery, on a bill suitably filed, has exercised a similar jurisdiction; id.

The "copy" of a lost instrument intended by the act of congress of January 23, 1874 (for stamping unstamped instruments), is a substantial copy, or such a draft of the original instrument as will identify the subject of the tax; 82 Pa. 280.

LOST, OR NOT LOST. A phrase in policies of insurance, signifying the contract to be retrospective and applicable to any loss within the specified risk, provided the same is not already known to either of the parties, and that neither has any knowledge or information not equally obvious or known to the other. The clause has been adopted only in maritime insurance; though a fire or life policy is not infrequently retrospective, or, under a different phraseology, by a provision that the risk is to commence at some time prior to its date. 1 Phill. Ins. § 925. Such policy on a vessel building "to take effect as soon as water-borne," takes effect at once if she is already water-borne; 6 Gray 192.

LOST PAPERS. See LOST INSTRUMENT.

LOST PROPERTY. See FINDER, where the subject is treated, and see also 33 Ch. D. 366, where a prehistoric boat found by a gas company while excavating on land leased by it was held to belong to the lessor.

LOST TIME. "Lost time" as an element of damage means time that is totally lost. 140 Ky. 495, 131 S. W. 278.

LOT. That which fortuitously determines what we are to acquire.

When it can be certainly known what are our rights, we ought never to resort to a decision by lot; but when it is impossible to tell what actually belongs to us, as if an estate is divided into three parts and one part given to each of three persons, the proper way to ascertain each one's part is to draw lots; Wolff, Dr. etc., de la Nat. § 669.

Verdicts reached by a jury by drawing lots will be set aside; 1 Ky. L. J. 500. See JURY. See also 1 Wash. Ty. 329; s. C. 34 Am. Rep. 606, n.

LOT OF GROUND. A small piece of land in a town or city, usually employed for building, a yard, a garden, or such other urban use. Lots are in-lots, or those within the boundary of the city or town, and out-lots, those which are out of such boundary and which are used by some of the inhabitants of such town or city.

LOT AND SCOT. Duties to be paid by persons exercising the elective franchise in certain cities before being allowed to vote.

It is said that the practice became uniform to refer to the poor-rate as a register of "scot and lot" voters, so that the term, when employed to define a right of election, meant only the payment by a parishioner of the sum to which he was assessed on the poor-rate. R. & L. Dict.; Brown.

LOTHERWITE or LEYERWIT. A liberty or privilege to take amends for lying with a bondwoman without license. See LAIRWITE.

LOTTERY. A scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance. 7 N. Y. 228; 59 Ill. 160.

A scheme by which a result is reached by some action or means taken, in which result man's choice or will has no part, and which human reason, foresight, sagacity, or design cannot enable him to know or determine, until the same has been accomplished. 74 Mich. 264.

A scheme by which, on one's paying money or some other thing of value, he obtains the contingent right to have something of greater value, if an appeal to chance, by lot or otherwise, under the direction of the manager of the scheme, should decide in his favor. Bish. St. Crimes § 952.

The word lottery "embraces the elements of procuring, through lot or chance, by the investment of a sum of money or something of value, some greater amount of money or thing of greater value." 58 Fed. Rep. 442. It includes policy-playing, gift-exhibitions, prize concerts, raffles at fairs, etc., and various forms of gambling; id.

Where a pecuniary consideration is paid, and it is to be determined by chance, according to some scheme held out to the public, as to what and how much he who pays the money is to receive for it, that is a lottery; 58 N. Y. 424. It is well settled that every scheme for the division of property or money by chance is prohibited by law; 61 Ind. 39. Lotteries were formerly often resorted to as a means of raising money, by states as well as individuals, and are still authorized in many foreign countries, but have been abolished as immoral in England, and throughout this country. They were declared a nuisance and prohibited by 10 & 11 Will. III. c. 17, and foreign lotteries were forbidden to be advertised in England by the 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 66.

Selling boxes of candy, each box being represented to contain a prize, the purchaser selecting his box in ignorance of its contents, is a lottery; 2 Tex. App. 610; so in 89 N. C. 572; 137 Mass. 250; 11 Q. B. Div. 207. Where money was subscribed which was to be invested in funds which were to be divided amongst the subscribers by lot, and divided unequally, it was held a lottery; 11 Ch. Div. 170. Although every ticket in a drawing represents a prize of some value, yet if those prizes are of unequal values, the scheme of distribution is a lottery; 40 Ill. 465.

A scheme for increasing the circulation of a newspaper, whereby all subscribers receive numbered tickets corresponding to numbered coupons, which are drawn from a box by a blindfolded person, prizes to be given to the holders of certain tickets, is a lottery under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3894, prohibiting carrying through the mails of any newspaper containing any advertisement of any lottery, etc., 58 Fed. Rep. 442; so it was held that an issue of bonds of the Austrian government, payable at a specified time, but with a provision that bonds, as drawn, should be redeemed with a bonus, which was to increase year by year, was within that act, which related to all lotteries, the word "illegal" having been omitted from the original act by amendment in 1890; 147 U. S. 456.

A lottery for the disposal of land is within the prohibition of the Pennsylvania act, where the lots drawn are of very unequal value; 4 S. & R. 151; so when there is a contract for the sale of several lots of land, of unequal value, to several subscribers, which provides that each one's lot shall be determined "by lot" and a certain "prize" lot is to be given to one of the subscribers by "lot"; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 103. So where one furnished a cigar to every person who placed a five-cent piece in a slot machine, and the one after whose play the machine indicated the highest card hand was to receive all the cigars; 33 So. Rep. (Ala.) 138; and where every purchaser of dry goods received a key and was told that one key would be given out which would unlock a certain box containing twenty-five dollars, which would go to the person who received this key; 54 Kan. 711. So where every subscriber to a newspaper received a ticket which entitled him to participate in a distribution of prizes by lot; 73 Mo. 647; and of a bond investment scheme, where bonds were issued at a specified price and the value of each bond was determined by its number, the bonds being numbered in the order of application for them; 63 Fed. Rep. 426.

A "missing word" competition, in which the winners are to be those who, upon sending a shilling to the promoter of the competition, select, to fill up a named sentence, a particular word also selected by the promoter, is a lottery within the English act; [1896] 2 Ch. 154.

Raffles at fairs, etc., are as clearly violations of the criminal law as the most elaborate and carefully organized lotteries; 8 Phila. 457. Thus the American Art Union is a lottery; 8 N. Y. 228, 240; so a "gift-sale" of books; 33 N. H. 329; so "prize-concerts"; 97 Mass. 583; and "gift-exhibitions"; 32 N. J. L. 398; 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 210; 59 Ill. 160; 62 Ala. 334; 74 N. Y. 63. The payment of prizes need not be in money; 7 N. Y. 228; as where a suit of clothing was given at a weekly drawing in a merchant tailor's club; 46 Minn. 555.

On the other hand, where the scheme affords room for the exercise of skill and judgment, it is not a lottery; 60 L. J. M. C. 116. So of a coupon competition in a newspaper, where purchasers of copies of the newspapers fill in on coupons the horses selected by them as likely to come in first, second, third, and fourth in a given race, the purchaser to receive a penny for every coupon filled up after the first, and a money prize to be given to the holder of the coupon who should name the first four horses correctly; [1895] 2 Q. B. 474; where a soap-dealer offered a prize to be drawn by lot, to the person who should most nearly guess the weight of a certain cake of soap, it was held not to be a lottery; 56 Alb. L. J. 95, S. C. of New Brunswick.

The mere determination by lot where there is no giving of prizes, is not a lottery; 8 Phila. 457. Merely determining by lot the time at which certain bonds are to be paid, is not a lottery; 30 Fed. Rep. 499; but it is otherwise if a prize is offered on the bonds so drawn; id. To constitute a lottery something of value must be parted with, directly or indirectly, by him who has the chance; 88 Ala. 196; 16 Am. St. Rep. 38 and note. Therefore, where every customer of a shoe store and every applicant received a ticket gratuitously, and a piano was allotted by chance among the holders, it was held not to be a lottery; 18 Colo. 321. Where the element of certainty goes hand in hand with the element of chance in an enterprise offering prizes, the former element does not destroy the existence or effect of the latter; 147 U. S. 449.

The act which forbids conveying in the mails newspapers containing anything relating to a lottery is within the power of congress to establishing postoffices, and does not abridge the freedom of the press; 143 U. S. 110. The right to operate a lottery is not a fundamental right; id. Under this act it is an offence to deliver in Illinois a prohibited circular mailed in the city of New York, and such an offence is triable in Illinois; 143 U. S. 207.

It is a valid exercise of power in a state to protect the morals and advance the welfare of the people by prohibiting any scheme bearing any semblance to a lottery or gambling; 74 Md. 565.

A lottery grant is not, in any sense, a contract within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, but is simply a gratuity and license, which the state, under its police powers, and for the protection of the public morals, may at any time revoke and forbid the further conduct of the lottery; and no right acquired during the life of the grant, on the faith of, or by agreement with, the grantees, can be exercised after the revocation of such grant and the forbidding of the lottery, if its exercise involves a continuance of the lottery as originally authorized; 168 U. S. 488, 502, following 101 U. S. 814, where it was said, referring to lotteries:—"Certainly the right to suppress them is governmental, to be exercised at all times by those in power at their discretion." A lottery charter is "in legal effect nothing more than a license."

The fact that one government authorizes lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets, cannot authorize their sale in another government which forbids their sale; 147 U. S. 462.

A purchase of a ticket in a foreign lottery outside the state, is a valid contract; 13 Pa. 328. An ordinance which makes it unlawful "for any person to have in his possession, unless it be shown that such possession is innocent, any lottery ticket," is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it places on the person accused of its violation, the burden of showing the innocence of his possession; 41 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 693.

Where it was undisputed that the defendant was engaged in the lottery business, evidence that he received an order for lottery tickets such as were subsequently mailed with the letter; that the name used in the address of the letter was the same as that signed to the order; that the tickets bore his stamp, and that the letter enclosed his business card, would justify the conclusion that the defendant deposited the letter in the post-office for mailing; 1 Fed. Rep. 426.

A court of equity will not grant relief where letters addressed to the secretary of a lottery company are detained by a postmaster under the direction of the postmaster-general, if the pleadings fail to show that the letters had no connection with the lottery business; 1 Fed. Rep. 417. The act of June 8, 1872, Rev. S. § 4041, authorizes the postmaster-general to forbid the payment by any postmaster of a money order to any person engaged in the lottery business. But this does not authorize any person to open any letter not addressed to himself.

The act of March 2, 1895, provides that any person who shall cause to be brought within the United States from abroad, for the purpose of disposing of the same, or deposited in or carried by the mails from one state to another, any paper, etc., purporting to be or represent a ticket, etc., in a lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise, offering prizes dependent upon chance, or shall cause any advertisement of such lottery, etc., to be brought into the United States, etc., shall be punishable, for the first offence, by imprisonment or fine, or both, and, for further offences, by imprisonment. See 164 U. S. 676. See POPULARITY CONTEST.

LOTTERY BOND. That bond to which is attached the contingent right to a price, or the vested right to chances at lottery. Thus, the lottery bond presents a double character. It is at once (1) a deed of loan, and (2) a lottery ticket. As deed of loan, it confers upon the holder the right to the payment of interest and reimbursement of the capital lent; as lottery ticket, it takes part periodically in drawings of more or less important prizes.

At first sight, lottery bonds have nothing to distinguish them from the ordinary bond. Like the latter they can be made out payable to order or to bearer, are usually provided with coupons representing interest to be paid, and bear the number of issue. But it is precisely the different use of these numbers which marks the difference between the two classes of obligations. In the ordinary bond the number of issue serves solely to facilitate the redemption of the amount loaned. In the lottery bond, however, the number of issue printed on the instrument prevents a very different character. It is not merely a number of issue which permits the arrangement of a gradual liquidation, but it is primarily the number of a lottery ticket. The essential characteristic of the lottery bond is that the number which it bears shares till its liquidation in periodical drawings of more or less important prizes, together with the other bonds of the same issue which have not been paid. These prizes consist of sums of money which are sometimes of considerable value (200,000 and 500,000 fr.). In practice, the drawings for payment are made to coincide with drawings for prizes, and it is so arranged that the holders of the bonds whose numbers appear first at the drawings for payment shall be the beneficiaries of the prizes.

At present the lottery bond may be found in most of the financial markets of Europe, and of all nationalities. Especially is this true in France. 9 Harv. L. R. 386-7.

LOUAGE. In French Law. The contract of hiring and letting. It may be of things or of labor. (1) Letting of things. (a) Bail à loyer, the letting of houses; (b) Bail à ferme, the letting of land; (2) Letting of labor.—(a) Loyer, the letting of personal service; (b) Bail à cheval, the letting of a horse.

LOUISIANA. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

It was first explored by the French in 1682, under Robert Chavallier de la Salle, and named Louisiana, in honor of Louis XIV. In 1699, a French settlement was begun at Biloxi by Lemoyne d'Iberville. His efforts were followed up in 1712 by Anthony Crozat, a man of wealth, who upheld the trade of the country for several years. About 1717 all his interest in the province was transferred to the "Western Company," a chartered corporation, at the head of which was the celebrated John Law, whose speculations involved the ruin of one-half the French nobility. In 1732 the "Company" resigned all their rights to the crown, by whom the whole of Louisiana was ceded to Spain in 1763. By the treaty of St. Ildefonso, signed October 1, 1800, Spain re-conveyed it to France, from whom it was purchased by the United States, April 30, 1803, for $15,000,000. Louisiana was admitted into the Union by an act of congress, approved April 8, 1812.

The first constitution was adopted January 22, 1812, and was substantially copied from that of Kentucky.

LOW BOTE. A récompense for the death of a man killed in a tumult. Cow.

LOWERS. In French Maritime Law. Wages. Ord. Mar. liv. 1, t. 14, Art. 16.

LOW-WATER MARK. That part of the shore of the sea to which the waters recede when the tide is lowest; i. e. the line to which the ebb-tide usually recedes, or the ordinary low-water mark unaffected by drought. 26 Me. 384; 60 Pa. 339. It has been said to be the point to which a river recedes at its lowest stage; 55 Fed. Rep. 854. See 157 Mass. 24; HIGH-WATER MARK; RIVER; SEA; DANE, ABR.; 1 Halst. Ch. 1.

LOYAL. Legal, or according to law; as, loyal matrimony, a lawful marriage.

"Uncore n'est loyal a homme de faire un tort" (it is never lawful for a man to do a wrong). Dyer, fol. 36, § 38. "Et per curiam n'est loyal" (and it was held by the court that it was not lawful). T. Jones 24. Also spelled loayl. Dyer 36, § 38; Law Fr. & Lat. Dict. The Norman spelling is "loyse." Kelh. Norm. Dict.

Faithful to a prince or superior; true to plighted faith or duty. Webster, Dict.

LOYAL VOTES. As ordinarily used, its meaning is believed to be quite different from that of the phrases "legal voters," "qualified voters." 1 Duv. (Ky.) 41.

LOYALTY. Adherence to law. Faithfulness to the existing government.

LOW. See HIGH.

LUCID INTERVALS. In Medical Jurisprudence. Periods in which an insane person is so far free from his disease that the ordinary legal consequences of insanity do not apply to acts done therein.

A lucid interval is not a perfect restoration to reason, but a restoration so far as to be able, beyond doubt, to comprehend and do the act with such perception, memory, and judgment as to make it a legal act. 2 Del. Ch. 268; Whart. & Stillé, Med. Jur. §2.

Lucid intervals were regarded as more common and characterized by greater mental clearness and vigor, by earlier medical writers than the later ones. This view was shared by legal authorities, who treated a lucid interval as a complete, though temporary, restoration. D'Aguesseau, in the case of the Abbé d'Orléans, concludes: "It must not be a mere diminution, a remission, of the complaint, but a kind of temporary cure, an intermission so clearly marked as in every respect to resemble the restoration of health." Pothier, Obl., Evans' ed. §79. And Lord Thurlow characterized it as "an interval in which the mind, having thrown off the disease, had recovered its general habit." 3 Bro. C. C. 334. Possibly there may be such intermissions of absolute restoration but they are of rare occurrence. Usually, with apparent clearness, there is a real loss of mental force and acuteness,—not necessarily apparent to a superficial observer, but, upon critical examination, showing confusion of ideas and singularity of behavior indicative of serious though latent disease. In this condition the patient may hold some correct notions, even on a matter of business, and yet be quite incompetent to embrace all the relations connected with a contract or a will, even though no delusion was present to warp his judgment. This conclusion is aided by the recorded experiences of patients after entire recovery. See Georget, Des Mal. Men. 46; Reid, Essays on Hypochondriacal Affections, Essay 31; Combe, Men. Derang. 241; Ray, Med. Jur. 878.

Of late years the interest of the courts in connection with lucid intervals both in civil and criminal cases is confined to the ascertainment of the mental capacity of the person concerned with relation to the transaction in question. This idea has even been carried to the excess of treating the reasonableness of the act itself as the test of the capacity of the individual, or the existence of a lucid interval; 1 Phill. Lect. 90; 2 C. & P. 415. But this has been said to be a mere begging of the question, inasmuch as persons undeniably insane constantly do and say things which appear perfectly rational; 2 Hagg. 488, where two wills, both perfectly reasonable, were set aside because within a short time prior to their execution there had been admitted insanity. And it was said: "When there is not actual recovery, and a return to the management of himself and his concerns . . . the proof of a lucid interval is extremely difficult."

In criminal cases this difficulty is intensified, since the very term lucid interval implies that the disease has not disappeared, but only that its outward manifestations have ceased and there remains an abnormal condition of the brain, by whatever name it may be called, whereby the power of the mind to sustain provocations, resist temptations, or withstand any other causes of excitement, is greatly weakened. Being in their nature, as temporary and of uncertain duration, there is no presumption that they will continue; 104 Ala. 642; 30 id. 287; contra, 59 Wis. 569; and see 28 Ill. 806.

Lucid intervals are not to be confounded with periods of apparent recovery between two successive attacks of mental disorder, nor with transitions from one phase of insanity to another. These are said to be equivocal conditions during which persons subjected to them labor under a degree of nervous irritability, which renders them peculiarly susceptible to many of those incidents and influences which lead to crime; Ray, Med. Jur. ch. Luc. Int.

Both in civil and criminal cases the burden rests upon the party who contends for a lucid interval to prove it, since a person once insane is presumed so until it is shown that he had a lucid interval or has recovered; Co. Litt. 186, n.; 3 Bro. Ch. 441; 1

Pet. 163; 15 N. J. Eq. 343; 46 Ill. 338; 8 Can. S. C. 383. This presumption may be rebutted by proof of a change of mental condition and a lucid interval at the time; 41 Miss. 291; and it arises only where habitual insanity is shown, and in cases of temporary or recurrent insanity, no burden is thrown upon the party seeking to take advantage of the lucid interval; 35 L. R. A. (Miss.) 118; 13 Abb. Pr. n. s. 207; 80 Fla. 170; 116 Mo. 96; 1 Brews. (Pa.) 396.

A contract made during a lucid interval is valid; 92 Ga. 296; 139 Mass. 177. And the same is true of deeds, wills, and of the performance of any civil act. But where a lucid interval is relied upon, it must appear to have been of such a character as to enable the person to comprehend intelligently the nature and character of the transaction; 104 Ala. 642. Proof of a lucid interval, where it is required, must be made to the satisfaction of the jury; 66 Tex. 476. There is no presumption of continuance of a lucid interval, it is temporary in its nature; 104 Ala. 642.

Insane persons, during a lucid interval, are competent witnesses, but the question of their competency is for the court to determine when the witness is produced to be sworn; 3 Abb. N. C. 329, which see for a note on the practice in such cases.

The general rule "is that a lunatic, or person affected with insanity, is admissible as a witness, if he have sufficient understanding to apprehend the obligation of an oath, and to be capable of giving a correct account of the matters which he has seen or heard in reference to the questions at issue; and whether he have that understanding is a question to be determined by the court upon examination of the party himself, and any competent witnesses who can speak to the nature and extent of his insanity;" 107 U. S. 519; 10 Allen 64; 158 Ill. 326; L. R. 11 Eq. 420; 97 Ala. 85; 80 Tex. App. 487; 25 Gratt. 865; 28 Conn. 177; 36 W. Va. 563. In State v. Brown, 36 Atl. Rep. (Del.) 458 (to be reported in 2 Marvel Del.), the witness was an inmate of an insane asylum and was admitted by an equally divided court to testify in a case of homicide in the asylum. The modern doctrine is that the fact of insanity goes to the credibility rather than to the competency of the witness; 5 Eng. L. & Eq. 547; 3 Den. C. C. 254; 5 Cox, C. C. 259; 4 Heisk. 565. See Clevenger, Med. Jur. of Insan. 607.

See 85 L. R. A. 117, n.; INSANITY.

LUCRATIVE OFFICE. One for which "pay, supposed to be an adequate compensation, is fixed to the performance of" its "duties." 8 Blackf. 329, where, under the Indiana constitution forbidding the holding of more than one lucrative office at one time, the offices of county commissioners and county recorder were held such. So also were prison director; 85 Ind. 111; mayor of a city; 85 id. 111; colonel of volunteers and reporter of the supreme court; 19 id. 351; otherwise as to the office of councilman in a city; 44 id. 405.

LUCRATIVE SUCCESSION. In Scotch Law. The passive title of præceptio hæreditatis, by which, if an heir apparent receive gratuitously a part, however small, of the heritage which would come to him as an heir, he is liable for all the grantor's precontracted debts. Erskine, Inst. 3. 8. 87-89; Stair, Inst. 3. 7.

LUCRI CAUSA (Lat. for the sake of gain). In Criminal Law. A term descriptive of the intent with which property is taken in cases of larceny.

Under modern decisions this ingredient is generally considered immaterial. In many English cases there is shown a tendency to resort to sophistical reasoning to avoid directly overruling the doctrine; 1 Den. C. C. 180; id. 193; Russ. & R. 307. In this country these cases have not been considered as authority; 18 Ala. 461. But the question has not been much discussed and the rule is generally considered well settled that it is sufficient if the taking be fraudulent and with the intent wholly to deprive the owner of his property. See LARCENY. See also 16 Miss. 401; 10 Als. n. s. 814; 3 Strobb. 506; 1 C. & K. 532; C. & M. 547; Inst. lib. 4, t. 1, §1; 2 Blah. N. Cr. L. §842; 30 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 227; 26 id. 218.

LUCRUM. A small slip or parcel of land.

LUCRUM CESSANS. In Civil Law. A cession of gain. The amount of profit lost as distinguished from damnum emergens, an actual loss.

The actual loss sustained for the breach of contracts other than the mere non-payment of money which was covered by interest. Damages could be recovered in particular cases for both. Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 215.

LUGGAGE. Such articles of personal comfort and convenience as travellers usually find it desirable to carry with them. This term is synonymous with baggage: the latter being in more common use in this country, while the former seems to be almost exclusively used in England. 70 Cal. 169. See BAGGAGE.

LUMEN. In Civil Law. Light of the sun or sky.

LUMINA. Openings to obtain light in a building.

LUMINARE. A lamp or candle set burning, on the altar of any church or chapel, for the maintenance whereof lands and rent-charges were frequently given to parish churches. Kenn. Glos.

LUMP COAL. In mining parlance, that which remains after the nut, slack and dirt have been separated from it by screening. 57 S. W. 12.

LUNACY. See INSANITY; MANIA.

LUNAR. Belonging to or measured by the moon.

LUNAR MONTH. See MONTH.

LUNATIC. One who is insane. See INSANITY; DE LUNATICO INQUIRENDU.

LUPINUM CAPUT GENERE. See CAPUT LUPINUM.

LUSHBOROW. A counterfeit coin, made abroad like English money, and brought in during Edward III.'s reign. To bring any of it into the realm was made treason. Cowel.

LYEF-GELD. In Saxon Law. Leave-money. A small sum paid by customary tenants for leave to plough, etc. Cowel; Somn. on Gavelk. p. 27.

LUXURY. Excess and extravagance, formerly an offence against public economy. Whart.

LYING. Saying that which is false, knowing or not knowing it to be so. Every deceit comprehends a lie, but a deceit is more than a lie on account of the view with which it is practised. 3 Term 56. See DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION.

LYING ABOUT. An owner is liable to a penalty for cattle found lying about a highway; 3 Q. B. 345; but not where cattle being driven along a highway lie down for a short time and are then driven on again; id.

LYING AT ANCHOR. A vessel is lying at anchor when floating upon the water but held by her cable and anchor; 19 Hun 285; but not where beached with a cable attached to an anchor sunk in the bank; id.; or fastened to a pier; 77 N. Y. 453; 82 Ind. 453.

LYING IN GRANT. Incorporal rights and things which cannot be transferred by livery of possession, but which exist only in idea, in contemplation of law, are said to lie in grant, and pass by the mere delivery of the deed. See GRANT; LIVERY OF SEIGN; SEIGN.

LYING ON. Where this term is used in the description of metes, bounds, and location of land, it imports in law as well as in fact that it extends to borders upon the boundary designated in the description. 4 Houst. 337.

LYING IN PORT. Where a vessel has been lying in port for a long time a policy "at and from" the port attaches as soon as preparations for the voyage are commenced, but if she changes ownership in port, it attaches only when the assured becomes owner; 1 Mass. 127; 2 Johns. Cas. 10; 1 Cal. 75; 2 Cal. Cas. 158.

LYING UP. A vessel insured against perils on the voyage or while lying up, was held to be within the meaning of this clause while she was being towed into the harbor; 5 Robt. 478.

LYING IN WAIT. Being in ambush for the purpose of murdering another.

Lying in wait is evidence of deliberation and intention. Where murder is divided into degrees, as in Pennsylvania, lying in wait is such evidence of malice that it makes the killing, when it takes place, murder in the first degree. See Dane, Abr. Index.

To constitute lying in wait, three things must concur: to wit, waiting, watching, and secrecy. 9 Humph. 651.

LYNCH LAW. A common phrase used to express the vengeance of a mob inflicting an injury and committing an outrage upon a person suspected of some offence. In England this is called Lidford

Law; in Scotland, Cowper Law, Jedburgh Justice.

The Ohio act (see infra) defines lynching and mob as follows: "That any collection of individuals, assembled for any unlawful purposes intending to do damage or injury to any one, or pretending to exercise correctional power over persons by violence, and without authority of law, shall for the purposes of this act be regarded as a 'mob,' and any act of violence exercised by them upon the body of any person, shall constitute a 'lynching.'" 92 Ohio Laws 136.

There are various theories as to the person from whom lynch law derived its name. That most generally accepted credits it to Col. James Lynch, a Virginian, who, in 1780, administered such law to the extent of whipping but not the death penalty against Tory conspirators. For the protection of himself and his associates an act of amnesty was passed by the Virginia legislature in October, 1782, in which their action was described as "not strictly warranted by law, although justified by the imminence of the danger." Another person mentioned in this connection was the founder of the town of Lynchburg, Virginia, and another, an Englishman, sent out in the seventeenth century under a commission to suppress pirates whom he summarily executed without trial. Another account ascribes the term to James Fitz-Stevens Lynch, mayor of Galway in 1498, who tried his son for murder and when prevented from publicly executing him, hanged him from the window of his own house. See Int. Cy. Lit.; 5 Green Bag 116; 4 id. 561; 2 Inter-coll. L. J. 163.

All who consent to the infliction of capital punishment by lynch law are guilty of murder in the first degree when not executed in hot blood. The act strikingly combines the distinctive features of deliberation and intent to take life; 88 Conn. 126; 1 Whart. Cr. Law § 599.

Lynch law differs from mob law in disregarding the forms of ordinary law, while intending to maintain its substance; while mob law disregards both.

In Ohio the act for the suppression of mob violence (supra) provided that any person assaulted by a mob and suffering lynching should be entitled to recover from the county $500; or, if the injury was serious, $1,000; or if it resulted in permanent disability of earning a livelihood $5,000. It also gave the county the right of recovering the amount of any judgment rendered against it from any of the parties composing the mob. This provision was held unconstitutional in specifying a definite recovery regardless of the actual damages suffered, being an encroachment of the legislature upon the judicial power, and so far as the damages awarded exceeded the actual damages suffered, it taxed the county for private interests; 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. 167, affirming 4 Ohio N. P. 249. This decision was followed in another county; 89 Wkly. L. Bul. 103.

LYON KING OF ARMS. In Scotch Law. An officer whose duty it formerly was to carry public messages to foreign states.

LYTÆ. In Old Roman Law. A name given to students of civil law in the fourth year of their course. Tayl. Civ. L. 39.

M.

M. The thirteenth letter of the alphabet.

Persons convicted of manslaughter, in England, were formerly marked with this letter on the brawn of the thumb.

This letter was sometimes put on the face of treasury notes of the United States, and signifies that the treasury note bears interest at the rate of one mill per dollar, and not one per centum interest.

MACE BEARER. In English Law. One who carries the mace, an ornamented staff, before certain functionaries. In Scotland an officer attending the court of session, and usually called a mace.

MACE-GREFF. In Old English Law. One who willingly bought stolen goods, especially food. Brit. c. 29.

MACE-PROOF. Secure against arrest. Wharton.

MACEDONIAN DECREE. In Roman Law. A decree of the Roman senate, which derived its name from that of a certain usurer, who was the cause of its being made, in consequence of his exactions.

It was intended to protect sons who lived under the paternal jurisdiction from the unconscionable contracts which they sometimes made on the expectations after their fathers' deaths; another, and perhaps the principal object, was to cast odium on the rapacious creditors. It declared such contracts void. Dig. 1, 6, 1; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 1, tit. 6, § 4; Fœnbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 2, § 12, note. See CATCHING BARGAIN; POST OFFICE.

MACHINATION. The act by which some plot or conspiracy is set on foot.

MACHINE. See PATENT.

MACHINE AND REPAIR SHOP. These words do not include woodwork; 23 U. C. C. P. 278.

MACHINERY. A more comprehensive term than machine, including the appurtenances necessary to the working of a machine; 111 Mass. 540; 108 id. 78; as the mains of a gas company; 12 Allen 75; or even a rolling-mill. 2 Sandf. 202.

Parts of a machine considered collectively; also the combination of mechanical means to a given end, such as the machinery of a locomotive, or of a canal lock, or of a watch; 44 La. Ann. 793. Those devices and parts of a car which have no physical operation and connection with the locomotive, except by means of the cars of a train, and the couplers between them are not within the meaning of the word as used in the exemption clause of a bill of lading; 47 U. S. App. 744; 81 Fed. Rep. 289. The mains or pipes laid in streets to distribute gas are "part of the machinery by means of which the corporate business (is) carried on;" 161 U. S. 816, 325. A saw is part of the machinery of a saw-mill; 44 Vt. 629; and iron and steel dies used in the manufacture of tinware are machinery; 111 Mass. 540.

The question of what machinery will pass under a mortgage of realty has been variously decided and will be found discussed under FIXTURES. The cases are collected in 11 Am. Rep. 814, note, and 24 id. 726, note. See 106 Mass. 81; 44 Ia. 64.

See HULL AND MACHINERY.

MACTATOR. A murderer.

MADMAN. See INSANITY.

MAD PARLIAMENT. The parliament held at Oxford in 1368, distinguished for the extreme character and the violence of its proceedings. Byrne. Called also "Parliamentum Insanum."

MADE KNOWN. Words used as a return to a writ of scire facias when it has been served on the defendant.

MÆG. A kinsman. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 241.

The larger group of individuals into which the Anglo-Saxon family were divided was called the mægth or mægburh. At her marriage the wife did not become a member of her husband's mægth but remained in her own. If she committed a wrong her own kindred were responsible therefor, and the wergild of the husband was paid to his mægth as was that of the wife to hers. The mægth of the wife entrusted to her husband the guardianship over her, but constantly watched over his administration of the trust and interfered to protect her if necessary. The children belonged to both the mægth of the father and to that of the mother. The organization of the mægth offered a natural means to the mutual guaranty of personal safety, but as civilization became more advanced both the church and the state encouraged every tendency to weaken the tie of kinship as it became so strong as to threaten the rights of the king. See Essays, Ang. Sax. Fam. L. 121; 2 Poll. & Maitl. 241.

MÆGBOTE. A recompense for the slaying of a kinsman. Cowel. See WERGILD.

MÆL. See MALLUM.

MAGISTER. A master; a ruler; a chief or superior.

MAGISTER AD FACULTATES (Lat.). In English Ecclesiastical Law. The title of an officer who grants dispensations: as, to marry, to eat flesh on days prohibited, and the like. Bacon, Abr. Eccles. Courts (A 5).

MAGISTER CANCELLARIÆ. In Old English Law. A master in chancery.

These officers were said to be called magistri, because they were priests. Burrill; Whitlock, J. Latch, 133.

MAGISTER LIBELLORUM. Master of requests.

MAGISTER LITIS. Master of a suit.

MAGISTER NAVIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Master of a ship; he to whom the whole care of a ship is given up, whether appointed by the owner, or charterer. L. 1, ff. de exercit.; idem § 3; Calvinus, Lex.; Story, Ag. § 36.

MAGISTER PALATII. Master of the palace, an officer similar to the modern lord chamberlain. Tayl. Civ. L. 37.

MAGISTER SOCIETATIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Managing partner. Vicat. Voo. Jur.; Calv. Lex. Especially used of an officer employed in the business of collecting revenues, who had power to call together the tything-men (decumands), as it were a senate, and lay matters before them, and keep account of all receipts, etc. He had, generally, an agent in the province, who was also sometimes called magister societatis. Id.; Story, Partn. § 95.

MAGISTRACY. In its most enlarged signification, this term includes all officers, legislative, executive, and judicial. For example, in some of the state constitutions will be found this provision: "the powers of the government are divided into three distinct departments, and each of these is confided to a separate magistracy, to wit: those which are legislative, to one; those which are executive, to another; and those which are judicial, to another." In a more confined sense, it signifies the body of officers whose duty it is to put the laws in force; as, judges, justices of the peace, and the like. In a still narrower sense, it is employed to designate the body of justices of the peace. It is also used for the office of a magistrate.

MAGISTRALIA BREVIA (Lat.). Writs adapted to special cases, and so called because drawn by the masters in chancery. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 239. For the difference between these and judicial writs, see Bracton 413 b.

MAGISTRATE. A public civil officer, invested with some part of the legislative, executive, or judicial power given by the constitution. In a narrower sense this term includes only inferior judicial officers, as justices of the peace.

The president of the United States is the chief magistrate of this nation; the governors are the chief magistrates of their respective states.

It is the duty of all magistrates to exercise the power vested in them for the good of the people, according to law, and with zeal and fidelity. A neglect on the part of a magistrate to exercise the functions of his office, when required by law, is a misdemeanor. See 15 Viner, Abr. 144; Ayliffe, Pand. tit. 22; Dig. 30. 18. 57; Merlin, Rép.; 13 Pick. 523.

A federal law requiring an affidavit sworn to before a magistrate, is complied when "sworn to before me, J. M., Clerk of the Municipal Court," it being presumed that it was taken in the court; 36 Fed. Rep. 664. See JUDGE; JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

MAGISTRATE'S COURT. In American Law. See COURT OF MAGISTRATES AND FREEHOLDERS.

MAGNA CENTUM. The great hundred or six score. Whart.

MAGNA CHARTA. The Great Charter of English liberties, so called (but which was really a compact between the king and his barons, and almost exclusively for the benefit of the latter, though confirming the ancient liberties of Englishmen in some few particulars), was wrung from king John by his barons assembled in arms, on the 19th of June, 1215, and was given by the king's hand, as a confirmation of his own act, on the little island in the Thames, within the county of Buckinghamshire, which is still called "Magna Charta Island."

The struggle to secure from the king some recognition of the rights of person and property and some settled administration of law had been going on for nearly two centuries. In fact it had begun soon after the time of William the Conqueror. That monarch had overthrown the laws he found prevailing in England and had distributed to his followers the lands of the conquered people. But the same arbitrary power which gave these estates could, at a moment's caprice, take them away, and the barons were anxious for a more stable system. The ancient baronial laws of Edward the Confessor contained all that was needed to secure their rights, and these ancient laws they petitioned to have restored. They renewed their efforts from time to time with William I., William Rufus, Henry I., and Stephen, all of whom, except Henry I., succeeded in putting them off with promises. From Henry a charter was extorted about the year 1100 declaring that the church should be free but should receive the same possessions, unredeemed, and all customs should be abolished. In fact it gave most of the privileges which were afterwards embodied in Magna Charta. But in the course of a hundred years nearly all the copies of it were lost and its provisions were forgotten. It was not until John came to the throne in 1199 that the barons had their best opportunity. John's right to assume the crown was weak, and in order to gain the support of the barons he had to promise them the privileges for which they fought with arms in their hands they compelled him to keep his word. Thomas, Magna Charta 2.

The preliminary interview was held in the meadow of Running Mede, or Runny Mede (Fr. Sax. rusa, council), that is, council meadow, which had been used constantly for national assemblies, and which was situated on the southwest side of the Thames, between Staines and Windsor. Though such formalities were observed, the provisions of the charter were disregarded by John and succeeding kings, each of whom, when wishing to do a popular thing, confirmed this charter. There were thirty-two confirmations between 1215 and 1416, the most celebrated of which were those by Hen. III. (1216) and Edw. I., which last confirmation was sealed with the great seal of England at Ghent, on the 5th November, 1297. Confirmation Chartarum. The Magna Charta printed in all the books as of Hen. III. is really a transcript of the roll of parliament of Edw. I. There were many originals of Magna Charta made, two of which are preserved in the British Museum.

An original was found early in the 17th century by Sir Robert Cotton, the antiquary, in the hands of a tailor, who was just on the point of cutting it into measuring strips for a bag. It was a lot of old papers out of an apartment anciently used as a scrivener's office: 11 Am. L. Rec. 634.

It is a misunderstanding to regard the Charter either as containing new principles or as terminating a struggle. On the contrary its character is eminently conservative. It is the law of Henry I., as its standard. At the same time "confirmation of the Charter" was the rallying cry of the three next generations, and the constitutional progress up to 1540 is little more than the working out of the Charter. See Soc. Edw. I., p. 28.

The Magna Charta of our statute-book is not exactly the charter that John sealed at Runnymede. It is a charter granted by his son and successor, Henry III., the text of the title of the original document having been modified on more than one occasion. 1 Soc. Edw. I., p. 28.

Magna Charta consists of thirty-seven chapters, the subject-matter of which is very various. (1) provides that the Anglican church shall be free and possess its rights unimpaired, probably referring chiefly to immunity from royal jurisdiction. (2) fixes relief which shall be paid by king's tenants of full age. (3) relates to heirs and their being in ward. (4) : guardians of wards within age are by this chapter restrained from waste of ward's estate. "waste hominum et rerum," waste of men and of things, which, however, were regarded as slaves even by this much-abused charter; and as serfs and freemen were at this time the divisions of society, and as freemen included, almost without exception, the nobility alone, we can see somewhat how much this charter desired to secure. (5) relates to the land and other property of heirs, and the delivering them up when the heirs are of age. (6) : the marriage of heirs. (7) provides that a widow shall have quarantine of forty days in her husband's chief house, and shall have her dowry set out to her at once, without paying anything for it, and in meanwhile to have reasonable estovers; the dowry to be one-third of lands of the husband, unless the wife was endowed of less at the church-door; widow not to be compelled to marry, but to have security that she will not marry without consent of the lord of whom she holds.

(8) : the goods and chattels of crown-debtor to be exhausted before his rents and lands are distrained. (9) : he is to be called upon, and the principal can pay; if sureties pay the debt, they to have the rents and lands of debtor till the debt is satisfied. (9) secures to London and other cities and boroughs and town barons of the five ports, and all other ports, to have their ancient liberties. (10) prohibits excessive distress for more services or rent than was due. (11) provides that the courts of common pleas should not follow the court of the king, but should be held in a certain place. They were, accordingly, located at Westminster. (12) declares the manner of taking assizes of novel disseisin and mort d'ancestor. These were actions to recover lost seisin (q. v.), now abolished. (13) relates to assizes darein presentment brought by ecclesiastics to try right to land, and to assize of benefices. Abolished. (14) provides that amerement of a freeman for a fault shall be proportionate to his crime, and not excessive, and that the villain of any other than the king shall be amerced in the same manner, his lands and tenements being reserved to him. For otherwise he could not cultivate the lord's land. (15) and (16) relate to making of bridges and keeping in repair of sewers and seawalls. This is now regulated by local parochial law. (17) forbids sheriffs to hold pleas of the crown. Pleas of the crown are criminal cases which it is desirable should not be tried by an inferior and perhaps ignorant magistrate. (18) provides that if any one holding a lay fee from the crown die, the king's sheriff, on showing letters patent of summons for debt from the king, may attach all his goods and chattels, so that nothing be moved away till the debt to the crown be paid off clearly, the rest to be delivered to the executors to perform the testament of the dead; and if there be no debt owing to the crown, all the chattels of the deceased to go to the executors, reserving, however, to the wife and children their reasonable parts. (19) relates to purveyance for the king's house; (20), to the castle-guard; (21), to taking horses, and wood for use of royal castles. The last three chapters are now obsolete. (22) provides that the lands of felons shall go to the king for a year and a day afterwards to the lord of the fee. The day is added to prevent dispute as to whether the year is exclusive or inclusive of its last day. (23) provides that the weirs shall be pulled down in the Thames and Medway, and throughout England, except on the sea-coast. These weirs destroyed fish, interrupted the floating of wood and the like down stream. (24) relates to the writ of precipe in capite for lords against their tenants offering wrong, etc. Now abolished. (25) provides a uniform measure. See 8 & 9 Will. IV. c. 38. (26) relates to inquisitions of life and member, which are to be granted freely. Now abolished. (27) relates to knight-service and other ancient tenures, now abolished. (28) relates to accusations, which must be under oath. (29) provides that "no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseised from his freehold, or liberties, or immunities, nor outlawed, nor exiled, nor in any manner destroyed, nor will we come upon him or send against him, except by legal judgment of his peers or the law of the land. We will sell or deny justice to none, nor put off right or justice." This clause is very much celebrated, as confirming the right to trial by jury. (30) relates to merchant-strangers, who are to be civilly treated, and, unless previously prohibited, are to have free passage through, and exit from, and dwelling in England, without any manner of extortions, except in time of war. If they are of a country at war with England, and found in England at the beginning of the war, they are to be kept safely until it is found out how English merchants are treated in their country, and then are to be treated accordingly. (31) relates to escheats; (32), to the power of alienation in a freeman, which is limited. (33) relates to patrons of abbeys, etc. (34) provides that no appeal shall be brought by a woman except for the death of her husband. This was because the defendant could not defend himself against a woman in single combat. The crime of murder or homicide is now inquired into by indictment. (35) relates to rights of holding county courts, etc. Obsolete. (36) provides that a gift of lands in mortmain shall be void, and lands so given go to the lord of fee. (37) relates to escheats and subsidy. (38) confirms every article of the charter.

The object of this statute was to declare and reassert such common-law principles as, by reason of usurpation and force, had come to be of doubtful effect, and needed therefore to be authoritatively announced, that king and subject might alike authoritatively observe them. Cooley, Const. Lim. 30. Magna Charta said by some to have been so called because larger than the Charta de Foresta (q. v.), which was given about the same time. Spelman, Gloss. But see Cowel. Magna Charta is mentioned casually by Bracton, Fleta, and Britton. Glanvill is supposed to have written before Magna Charta. The Mirror of Justices (q. v.) has a chapter on its defects. See Co. 2d Inst.; Barrington, Stat.; 4 Bla. Com. 423. See a copy of Magna Charta in 1 Laws of South Carolina, edited by Judge Cooper, p. 78. In the Penny Magazine for the year 1833, p. 223, there is a copy of the original of King John's charter fixed to this instrument, a specimen of a fac-simile of the writing of Magna Charta, beginning at the passage, Nullus liber homo capietur vel imprisonetur, etc. A fac-simile has been published by Chas. & W. Wood, London. A copy of the charter may be found in the Magazin Pittoresque for the year 1834, pp. 52, 53. Magna Charta was published for the first time in America in a tract issued by William Penn called "The excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property," printed by Bradford at Philadelphia in 1686. Besides extensive extracts from Magna Charta and Coke's comments thereon, the tract contains the confirmation of the charters of the liberties of England and of the forest made in the 28 Edward I., the Statute de Tallagio, the royal charter of Peter de Pons charter of liberties to the freemen of the province. This tract having become very scarce, has been reprinted by the Philobiblon Club of Philadelphia, with an historical introduction by Dr. Frederick D. Stone. See Encyc. Brit.; Wharton, Lex.; Thomson; Wells, Magna Charta.

They met in convention, by delegates elected for the purpose, and formed a separate state, by the style of the State of Maine, and adopted a constitution for the government thereof, October 19, 1819, and applied to congress, at its next session, for admission into the Union.

MAINPERNABLE. Capable of being bailed; one for whom bail may be taken; bailable.

MAINPERNORS. In English Law. Those persons to whom a man is delivered out of custody or prison, on their becoming bound for his appearance.

Mainpernors differ from bail; a man's bail may imprison or surrender him up before the stipulated day of appearance; mainpernors can do neither; but are merely sureties for his appearance at the day; bail are only sureties that the party be answerable for all the special matter for which they stipulate; mainpernors are bound to produce him to answer all charges whatsoever. 5 Mod. 231; 7 id. 77, 85, 98; 3 Bla. Com. 123. See Dane, Abr.; BAIL.

MAINPRISE. In English Law. The taking a man into friendly custody, who might otherwise be committed to prison, upon security given for his appearance at a time and place assigned. Wood, Inst. b. 4, c. 4. The writ of mainprise is now obsolete. See BAIL; Bish. Cr. L. Proc. § 248.

MAINSWORN. Forsworn, by making a false oath with hand (main) on book. Used in the North of England. Brownl. 4; Hob. 125.

MAINTAINED. In Pleading. A technical word indispensable in an indictment for maintenance. 1 Wils. 335.

MAINTAINORS. In Criminal Law. Those who maintain or support a cause depending between others, not being retained as counsel or attorney. For this they may be fined and imprisoned. 2 Swift, Dig. 328; 4 Bla. Com. 124; Bacon, Abr. Bar-rator.

MAINTENANCE. Aid; support; as-istance; the support which one person, who is bound by law to do so, gives to another. See FATHER; CHILD; HUSBAND.

Where by the constitution it is made the duty of the state legislature to make sufficient appropriations for the maintenance of the state militia, such a constitutional provision is not intended to make the entire expense of the militia a general state charge, and a provision in the military code making the compensation of certain armorers and others a county charge is not in violation of such a provision; 46 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 851.

In Criminal Law. A malicious, or, at least, officious, interference in a suit in which the offender has no interest, to assist one of the parties to it against the other, with money or advice to prosecute or defend the action, without any authority of law. 1 Russ. Cr. 176; Archb. Cr. Fr. & Pl. 1859. See 4 Kent 446; Whart. Cr. L. § 1854.

An unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels or sides to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. 51 Me. 63.

An officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one, by assisting either party to the disturbing of the community by stirring up suits. 49 Ohio St. 475.

At common law it signifies an unlawful taking in hand or upholding of quarrels, or sides, to the disturbance or hindrance of common right. The maintenance of one side, in consideration of some bargain to have part of the thing in dispute, is called champerty. Champerty, therefore, is a species of maintenance; 40 Conn. 570.

The intermeddling of a stranger in a suit for the purpose of stirring up strife and continuing the litigation. 2 Pars. Contr., 8th ed. *766. See 4 Term 340; 4 Q. B. 883.

But there are many acts in the nature of maintenance which become justifiable from the circumstances under which they are done. They may be justified, first, because the parties have a common interest recognized by the law in the matter at issue in the suit; Bacon, Abr. Maintenance; 11 M. & W. 675; 9 Metc. 459, 262; 11 Me. 111; [1895] 1 Q. B. 339; second, because the party is of kindred or affinity, as father, son, or heir apparent, or husband or wife; 3 Cow. 623; 90 Tenn. 673; third, because the relation of landlord and tenant or master and servant subsists between the party to the suit and the person who assists him; fourth, because the money is given out of charity; 1 Bail. 401; fifth, because the person assisting the party to the suit is an attorney or counsellor; the assistance to be rendered must, however, be strictly professional, for a lawyer is not more justified in giving his client money than another man; 1 Russ. Cr. 179; Bacon, Abr. Maintenance; Brooke, Abr. Maintenance. This offence is punishable criminally by fine and imprisonment; 4 Bla. Com. 124; 2 Swift, Dig. 328. Contracts growing out of maintenance are void; 11 Mass. 549; 5 Humphr. 379; 20 Ala. n. s. 521; 5 T. B. Monr. 413; 5 Johns. Ch. 44; 4 Q. B. 883. See 1 Me. 292; 11 Mass. 553; 8 Cow. 647; 4 Wend. 306; 3 Johns. Ch. 508; 7 Dowl. & R. 846; 5 B. & C. 188; 2 Bish. Cr. Law 123; 61 Hun 623; 70 N. H. Rep. (Minn.) 806; 23 Can. S. C. R. 437. See 14 L. R. A. 785, n.; CHAMPERTY.

MAITRE. In French Maritime Law. Master; the master or captain of a vessel. Burrill; Ord. Mar. 2. 1. 1.

MAJESTAS. In Roman Law. The supreme authority of the state or prince.

Also, a contraction for laesa majestas or crimen laesae majestatis, i. e. treason. Abbott. The term was applied indifferently to that person, or part of the people, where the supreme authority rested. Burrill; Tayl. Civ. Law, 37.

MAJOR. One who has attained his full age and has acquired all his civil rights; one who is no longer a minor; an adult. See MAJORITY.

In Military Law. The officer next in rank above a captain.

For the use of the word in Latin maxima, see MAXIMS.

MAJOR-GENERAL. In Military Law. An officer next in rank above a brigadier-general. He commands a division consisting of several brigades, or ever an army.

MAJORA REGALIA. The king's dignity, power, and royal prerogative, as opposed to his revenue, which is comprised in the minora regalia. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 483; 1 Bla. Com. 240. See MINORA REGALIA.

MAJORES (Lat.). The male ascendants beyond the sixth degree. The term was used among the Romans, and is still retained in making genealogical tables.

MAJORITY. The state or condition of a person who has arrived at full age. He is then said to be a major, in opposition to minor, which is his condition during infancy. See FULL AGE.

The greater number. More than all the opponents.

Some question exists as to whether a majority of any body is more than one-half the whole number or more than the number acting in opposition. Thus, in a body of one hundred voters, in which twenty did not vote on any particular question, the former supposition fifty-one would be a majority, on the latter forty-one. The intended signification is generally denoted by the context, and where it is not, the second sense is generally intended; a majority on a given question being more than one-half the number of those voting.

In every well-regulated society, the majority has always claimed and exercised the right to govern the whole society, in the manner pointed out by the fundamental laws; and the minority are bound whether they have assented or not, for the obvious reason that opposite wills cannot prevail at the same time, in the same society, on the same subject; 1 Tuck. Bla. Com. Appx. 168; 9 Dane, Abr. 87; 1 Story, Const., 5th ed. § 207.

As to the rights of the majority of part-owners of vessels, see 8 Kent 114; Pars. Marit. Law; PART-OWNERS. As to the majority of a church corporation, see 16 Mass. 488.

In the absence of all stipulations, the general rule in partnerships is that each partner has an equal voice, and a majority acting bona fide have the right to manage the partnership concern and dispose of the partnership property notwithstanding the dissent of the minority; but in every case when the minority have a right to give an opinion, they ought to be notified. See PARTNER.

As to the conflict of laws relating to majority, see 19 Am. Dec. 180.

In corporations, in the absence of any provision in the charter or constitution, the general rule is that, within the scope of the corporate affairs, the acts of a majority bind the corporation; 80 Pa. 42; 4 Blas. 78; 33 Conn. 396; see 18 Fed. Rep. 283. It is not necessary that those present at a meeting constitute a majority of all the members; 7 Cow. 42; a majority of those who appear may act; 88 Pa. 42; 104 Mass. 878; 5 Blatch. 525; 57 Ill. 416; s. c. 11 Am. Rep. 24; 83 Beav. 595. When, however, an act is to be performed by a select and definite body, such as a board of directors, a majority of the entire body is required to constitute a meeting; 9 Wend. 394; 16 Ia. 284; but if a quorum is present, a majority of such quorum may act; 23 N. H. 853; 18 Ind. 58. The minority of a committee to which a corporate power has been delegated cannot bind the majority, or do any valid act, in the absence of any special provision otherwise; 127 U. S. 579.

In political elections, a majority of the votes cast at an election on any question means the majority of those who voted on that question; 10 Minn. 107; 1 Sneed 687; 20 Ill. 159; 86 id. 414; 20 Wis. 544; 95 U. S. 369. "All qualified voters who absent themselves from an election duly called are presumed to assent to the express will of the majority of those voting, unless the law providing for the election otherwise declares. Any other rule would be productive of the greatest inconvenience, and ought not to be adopted unless the legislative will to that effect is clearly expressed." Id. (Miller and Bradley, JJ., dissenting); but the opposite view is held in 85 Mo. 103; 16 Minn. 249; 69 Ind. 505. In the last case an amendment to the constitution received less than a majority of all those who voted at the election, but had a majority of the votes cast for or against the adoption of the amendment; and it was held (two judges dissenting) that the amendment had been neither ratified nor rejected. See 23 Alb. L. J. 44.

The United States House of Representatives has power to transact business when a majority of its members is present, and may prescribe any method which is reasonably certain to determine the presence of a majority. 144 U. S. 1. See ELECTION; MEETING; QUORUM; REORGANIZATION.

MAJUS JUS. A writ proceeding in some customary manors to try a right to land. Cow.

MAKE. To perform or execute; as, to make his law, is to perform that which a man has bound himself to do; that is, to clear himself of an action commenced against him, by his oath and the oath of his neighbors. Old Nat. Brev. 161.

To make default is to fail to appear in proper trial; to fail in a legal duty.

To make oath is to swear according to the form prescribed by law. It is also used intransitively of persons and things, to have effect; to tend. See Hardr. 133.

MAKER. A term applied to one who makes a promissory note and promises to pay it when due.

He who makes a bill of exchange is called the drawer; and frequently in common parlance and in books of reports we find the word drawer inaccurately applied to the maker of a promissory note. See PROMISSORY NOTE.

MAKING HIS LAW. A phrase used to denote the act of a person who wages his law. Bacon, Abr. Wager of Law.

MAL. A prefix meaning wrong or fraudulent.

MAL-TOLTE. In Old French Law. A term supposed to have arisen from the usurious gains of the Jews and Lombards in their management of the public revenue. Steph. Lect. 372.

MALA. (Lat.). Bad.

MALA IN SE. Acts morally wrong; offences against conscience. 1 Bla. Com. 57, 58; 4 id. 8. See MALA PROHIBITA.

Things bad, or wicked, in themselves. Taylor, L. Gloss. To be distinguished from things which are wrong because they are forbidden (mala prohibita). Blackstone says that to the offences mala in se we are bound in conscience, because we are bound by superior laws; but in relation to those laws which forbid only such things as are not mala in se, but mala prohibita merely, without any intermixture of moral guilt, annexing a penalty to noncompliance, conscience is no farther concerned than by directing a submission to the penalty in case of our breach of those laws. 1 Bl. Com. 57, 58. Cf. MALA PROHIBITA.

MALA FIDES (Lat.). Bad faith. It is opposed to bona fides, good faith.

MALA PRAXIS (Lat.). Bad or unskillful practice in a physician or other professional person, whereby the health of the patient is injured. Present usage adopts rather the English term malpractice. See PHYSICIAN.

MALA PROHIBITA (Lat.). Those things which are prohibited by law, and therefore unlawful.

Crimes, made such, only by reason of statutory prohibition. 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 23.

The distinction was formerly made with respect to the right to recover upon a contract for doing an unlawful act between mala prohibita and mala in se, but it has been said that this "has been long since exploded," and that "it was not founded upon any sound principle,"—that it makes no difference whether an act is forbidden because it is against good morals or against the interest of the state; 5 B. & Ald. 385, 340; 13 Pick. 519; 12 Q. B. Div. 121; and "it is now well settled that every contract to do a thing made penal by statute is void as unlawful;" Sharsw. note, 1 Bla. Com. 58.

In the criminal law the distinction is important with reference to the intent with which a wrongful act is done. Thus, a man in the execution of one act, by chance, does another one for which, if he had wilfully committed it, he would be liable to punishment,—if the act that he is doing were lawful or merely mala prohibita, he is not punishable for the act arising from chance; but if mala in se, it is otherwise. For instance, if a person unauthorized to kill game in England, contrary to the statutes, in unlawfully shooting at game, accidentally kills a man, it is no more criminal than if he were authorized; but if the accidental killing be the result of wantonly shooting at another's fowls, which is mala in se, as a trespass, it is manslaughter: 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 332; citing 1 East, P. C. 260; and see 37 Conn. 424; 114 Mass. 323; 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 25.

Mr. Bishop also considers that the rule that ignorance of the law is no excuse for crime is particularly harsh when applied to what is only mala prohibita; but that at the same time this is less important because most indictable wrongs are mala in se; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 295.

It is said that "offences which are mala in se attract no additional turpitude from being declared unlawful by human legislation," while "mala prohibita are such acts as are in themselves indifferent," and become right or wrong, just or unjust, duties or misdemeanors, as the municipal legislature sees proper for protecting the welfare of society and more adequately carrying on the purposes of civil life; Anderson, Law Dict. In 22 Pick. 476, the court speak of offences "of a high and aggravated character, tending to breaches of the peace or other great disorder and violence, being what are usually considered mala in se, or criminal in themselves, in contradistinction to mala prohibita, or acts otherwise indifferent than as they are restrained by positive law."

"The substance of the distinction between mala in se and mala prohibita is that the former is more intensely evil than the latter." 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 658. Offences which have been judicially characterized in this country as mala prohibita are, violations of statutes against gambling and lotteries; 101 U. S. 814, 821; carrying concealed weapons; 90 Mo. 302.

Blackstone mentions as examples, game laws and laws against exercising certain trades without having served a certain apprenticeship, for not performing the statute-work on the public roads, and "for innumerable other positive misdemeanors." The subject of discussion being more particularly the effect of the mere prohibition of an act and affixing a penalty; he adds—"Now these prohibitory laws do not make the transgression a moral offence or sin; the only obligation in conscience is to submit to the penalty, if lawful. It must, however, here be observed that we are speaking of laws that are merely penal where the thing forbidden or enjoined is wholly a matter of indifference and where the penalty involved is an adequate compensation for the small inconvenience supposed to arise from the offence, but where disobedience to the law involves also indirect or public mischief or private injury, there it falls within our former distinction and is also an offence against conscience." 1 Bl. Com. 57. His "former distinction" is as to mala in se which we are in conscience bound to abstain from, apart from their being criminal. These views of Blackstone have been the subject of much criticism, and are controverted in the notes of Christian, Sharswood, and Chase.

Aside from the considerations suggested by Bishop as above stated, the distinction between mala prohibita and mala in se is of little, if any, practical utility, and some crimes usually relegated to the former class are so generally recognized as such by statute as to be considered as covered by the criminal law in the same sense as mala in se; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 23. Judicial notice is taken of them in a country where the common law prevails; 11 Mich. 337. See CRIME; MALUM IN SE.

MALADMINISTRATION. A term in law used interchangeably with misadministration and meaning "wrong administration." 14 Neb. 188.

MALANDRINUS. A thief or pirate. Wals. 333.

MALBERGE. A hill where the people assembled at a court, similar to the English assizes. Du Cange.

It was called by the Scotch and Irish "parley hills." Wharton; Du Cange.

MALE. Of the masculine sex; of the sex that begets young; the sex opposed to the female.

MALEDICTION (Lat.). In Ecclesiastical Law. A curse which was anciently annexed to donations of lands made to churches and religious houses, against those who should violate their rights.

MALEFACTOR (Lat.). He who has been guilty of some crime; in another sense, one who has been convicted of having committed a crime.

MALEFICUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Waste; damage; tort; injury. Dig. 5, 18, 1.

MALFEASANCE. The unjust performance of some act which the party had no right, or which he had contracted not, to do. It differs from misfeasance and nonfeasance, which titles see. See 1 Chitty, Pr. 9; 1 Chitty, Pl. 134.

MALICE. In Criminal Law. The doing a wrongful act intentionally without just cause or excuse. 4 B. & C. 253; 9 Metc. 104. A wicked and mischievous purpose which characterizes the perpetration of an injurious act without lawful excuse. 4 B. & C. 253; 9 Metc. 104.

A conscious violation of the law, to the prejudice of another. 9 Cl. & F. 32.

That state of mind which prompts a conscious violation of the law to the prejudice of another. 9 Cl. & F. 32.

In a legal sense malice is never understood to denote general malevolence or unkindness of heart, or enmity towards a particular individual, but it signifies rather the intent from which flows any unlawful and injurious act committed without legal justification. 15 Pick. 337; 30 Ga. 95, 33 Me. 331; 7 Ala. 9, 728; 2 Dev. 435; 4 Mass. 115; R. & R. 25, 465; 1 Mood. C. C. 93; 30 Fla. 142. It is not confined to the intention of doing an injury to any particular person, but extends to an evil design, a corrupt and wicked notion against some one at the time of committing the crime. Bacon Max. Reg. 15; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 727; 3 id. 1104; 90 Ga. 441.

Any formed design of mischief may be called malice. Malice is a wicked, vindictive temper, regardless of social duty, and bent on mischief. There may be malice, in a legal sense, in homicide, where there is no actual intention of any mischief, but the killing is the natural consequence of a careless action. Add. 158; 11 Fed. 261; 3 Cr. Law Max. 216.

Express malice exists when the party evinces an intention to commit the crime; 8 Bulstr. 171.

Implied malice is that inferred by law from the facts proved; 11 Humphr. 172; 6 Blackf. 299; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 871. See 24 Neb. 838. In cases of murder this distinction is of no practical value; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 675.

"Implied malice" is such as arises or may be inferred from the intentional doing of an unlawful or wrongful act with a wrongful purpose. 136 Ky. 468, 124 S. W. 409.

Malice is implied in every case of intentional homicide; and where the fact of killing is proved, all the circumstances of accident or necessity are to be satisfactorily established by the accused, unless they arise out of the evidence produced against him to prove the homicide and the circumstances attending it. If there are, in fact, circumstances of justification, excuse, or palliation, such proof will naturally indicate them. But where the fact of killing is proved by satisfactory evidence, and there are no circumstances disclosed tending to show justification or excuse, there is nothing to rebut the natural presumption of malice. It is material to the just understanding of this rule that it applies only to cases where the killing is proved and nothing further is shown; for if the circumstances disclosed tend to exonerate the act, the prisoner has the full benefit of such facts; 9 Metc. 93; 3 Gray 463.

Malice in fact is synonymous with "express malice," as distinguished from implied malice; 5 Ind. App. 78; 109 N. C. 270.

Malice in law is synonymous with implied malice; 5 Ind. App. 109; it is an act done wrongfully and wilfully, without reasonable or probable cause, and not necessarily an act done from ill feeling or spite, or a desire to injure another; 82 Neb. 444.

It is a general rule that when a man commits an act, unaccompanied by any circumstances justifying its commission, the law presumes he has acted with an intent to produce the consequences which have ensued. And therefore the intent to kill is conclusively inferred from the deliberate violent use of a deadly weapon; 5 Cush. 305. See 8 M. & S. 15; 1 R. & R. Cr. Cas. 207; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 229, 232, 340; 15 Viner, Abr. 506; 98 Ala. 1; 95 id. 5; 89 Va. 379.

In Torts. A malicious act is a wrongful act, intentionally done without cause or excuse. 48 Mo. 152.

A malevolent motive for action without reference to any hope of a remoter benefit to oneself to be accomplished by the intended harm to another. 148 Mass. 368.

Malice "is improper and indirect motive;" but a better definition is said to be, "A wish to injure the party, rather than to vindicate the law." Poll. Torts 308.

The evil mind that is regardless of social duty and the rights of others. 98 Tenn. 48.

In a libel. In connection with a privileged communication, malice is any direct and wicked motive which induces the writer to defame the other party. 109 N. C. 270. See 27 Alb. L. J. 134, 149; LIBEL.

In slander it is the absence of legal excuse; 81 Ind. 527; 5 Ind. App. 78. See SLANDER.

This term, as applied to torts, does not necessarily mean that which must proceed from a spiteful, malignant, or revengeful disposition, but a conduct injurious to another, though proceeding from an ill-regulated mind not sufficiently cautious before it occasions an injury to another; 11 S. & R. 39.

Malice consists in one's wilful doing of an act or wilful neglect of an obligation which he knows is liable to injure another, regardless of the consequences, and a malignant spirit or a specific intention to hurt an individual is not an essential element; 86 Fed. Rep. 309, per Brown, J. See 15 S. C. 409; 5 B. & A. 594; 51 Neb. 301.

It has been held that an act done in the exercise of a lawful right and without negligence may be unlawful if done with express malice; 25 Pa. 522; 113 id. 126; 7 H. L. Cas. 387; as persuading another to do, to the prejudice of a third person, something which he has a right to do, may give that third person a cause of action if the persuasion be malicious; [1895] 2 Q. B. 21, but this decision was reversed by the house of lords; [1898] A. C. 1; and the majority of the decisions tend to support the rule that an act in itself lawful is not converted by a malicious motive into an unlawful act, so as to make the doer liable to a civil action; id.; 24 Pa. 308; 72 N. Y. 39; 28 Vt. 49; and that no use of property which would be legal if due to a proper motive, can become illegal because it is prompted by a motive which is improper or even malicious; [1895] A. C. 587; and see 8 Harv. L. Rev. 1. Pecuniary dishonesty is held malicious; 101 Ill. 391.

A corporation may be liable civilly for that class of torts in which a specific malicious intention is an essential element; 86 Fed. Rep. 306. See 21 How. 203. See FALSE IMPRISONMENT; LIBEL; MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

Cf. HEAT OF PASSION
LEGAL MALICE; PARTICULAR MALICE.
ADEQUATE PROVOCATION.

MALICE AFORETHOUGHT. A technical phrase employed in indictments, which with the word murder must be used to distinguish the felonious killing called murder from what is called manslaughter. Yelv. 205; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 342; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 429. In the description of murder the words do not imply deliberation, or the lapse of considerable time between the malicious intent to take life and the actual execution of that intent, but rather denote purpose and design in contradistinction to accident and mischance; 5 Cush. 306; 116 Mo. 96; and the intent necessary to constitute malice aforethought need not have existed for any particular time before the act of killing, but it may spring up at the instant and may be inferred from the fact of killing; 164 U. S. 492; but premeditation may be an element showing malice when otherwise it would not sufficiently appear; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 677. See 8 C. & P. 616; 2 Mas. 60; 1 D. & B. 121, 163; 6 Blackf. 290; 3 Ala. N. S. 497.

MALICIOUS. Doing a wrongful act without legal right. 56 S. W. 673. See BY MALICIOUS.

MALICIOUS ABANDONMENT. The forsaking without a just cause a husband by the wife, or a wife by her husband. See ABANDONMENT; DIVORCE.

MALICIOUS ARREST. A wanton arrest made without probable cause by a regular process and proceeding. See MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

MALICIOUS INJURY. An injury committed wilfully and wantonly, or without cause. 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 136. See Whar. Cr., 9th ed. § 126 as to malice. See 4 Bla. Com. 143, 198, 206; 2 Russ. Cr. 544.

MALICIOUS MISCHIEF. An expression applied to the wanton or reckless destruction of property, and the wilful perpetration of injury to the person. Washb. Cr. L. 73.

The term is not sufficiently defined as the wilful doing of any act prohibited by law, and for which the defendant has no lawful excuse. To sustain to a conviction of the offence of malicious mischief, the jury must be satisfied that the injury was done either out of a spirit of wanton cruelty or of wicked revenge. Jacob, Law Dict. Mischief, Malicious; Alison, Sc. Law 448; 3 Cush. 558; 2 Metc. 21; 3 Dev. & B. 130; 5 Ired. 364; 8 Leigh 719; 3 Me. 177. See 72 Mich. 172; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 621; 49 Kan. 584.

This is a common-law offence; 19 Wend. 419; 1 Dall. 335; 9 Pick. 1; 48 Ark. 56; contra, 20 N. J. L. 96; 5 Den. 277; but there are in many states statutes on the subject, and it is now considered rather with reference to statutes; 2 McCl. Cr. L. § 811, where will be found an excellent classified collection of the statutes and cases under them. One may be convicted of maliciously injuring the property of another, without knowing who the owner is; 95 Ia. 491; but it is necessary to allege that the rightful possession of the property was in some person other than the defendant; 38 Tex. Cr. Rep. 554. In Georgia the statute is held applicable only to inanimate property and not to the case of a dog killed; 95 Ga. 111; but see 85 Neb. 638. The destruction of a boat by order of the owner of a pond, in an effort to protect his possession of the latter from trespasses of the owner of the boat who had repeatedly taken the boat back to the water after the defendant had hauled it away, is not malicious mischief; 142 N. Y. 866; and see S. C. 131 id. 111, where the advice of counsel was held no defence.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION. A wanton prosecution made by a prosecutor in a criminal proceeding, or a plaintiff in a civil suit, without probable cause, by a regular process and proceeding, which the facts did not warrant, as appears by the result. Actions for malicious prosecution are not favored by the law; they are to be carefully guarded and their true principles strictly adhered to; 1 Ld. Raym. 874; 21 Mass. 201; 20 Ill. 354; Newell, Mal. Pros. 48.

Where the defendant commences a criminal prosecution wantonly, and in other respects against law, he will be responsible; 12 Conn. 219. The prosecution of a civil suit, when malicious, is a good cause of action, even when there has been no arrest; 11 Conn. 533; 1 Wend. 345. See 106 Mass. 800; Big. Torts 71; 65 Hun 365; 53 Minn. 439; Newell, Mal. Pros. 48. But see 1 Am.

Lead. Cas. 261; 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 287; 64 Ia. 741; 64 Pa. 299; 27 Ill. 439. In such cases the want of probable cause must be very palpable; very slight grounds will not justify an action; Big. Torts 71. See L. R. 4 Q. B. 730. On the whole the weight of authority seems to be against the maintenance of an action for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit in which no process other than the summons was issued; 66 Cal. 123; Newell, Mal. Pros. 37; 66 Ill. App. 516. The bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously, and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause, will not support an action for malicious prosecution; 11 Q. B. D. 690, contra, 42 Vt. 203; otherwise of bankruptcy proceedings maliciously instituted, without probable cause; 11 Q. B. D. 674; brought after the adjudication in bankruptcy has been set aside; 10 App. Cas. 210; and of civil proceedings begun by attachment, or by arrest; Poll. Torts 303; also, probably, of bringing and prosecuting an action maliciously and without probable cause in the name of a third person; id.

The action lies against the prosecutor, and even against a mere informer, when the proceedings are malicious; 9 Ala. 367. But grand jurors are not liable for information given by them to their fellow-jurors, on which a prosecution is founded; Hard. 556. Such action lies against a plaintiff in a civil action who maliciously sues out the writ and prosecutes it; 16 Pick. 455; but an action does not lie against an attorney at law for bringing the action, when regularly retained; 16 Pick. 478. See 6 Pick. 193. The attorney, however, must act in good faith. If an attorney knows that there is no cause of action, and dishonestly and with some sinister view, for some purpose of his own, or for some other ill purpose which the law calls malicious, causes the plaintiff to be arrested and imprisoned, he is liable; 34 Eng. C. L. R. 276; Newell, Mal. Pros. 23.

The action lies against a corporation aggregate if the prosecution be commenced and carried on by its agents in its interest and for its benefit, and they acted within the scope of their authority; 6 Q. B. D. 287; 9 Phila. 189; 22 Conn. 580; 130 Mass. 443; 73 Ind. 430; Poll. Torts 301, contra, 11 App. Cas. 230 (a dictum, see id. 244, 236). See also Cooley, Torts 121; 7 C. B. N. S. 290; 55 J. P. 264.

The proceedings under which the original prosecution or action was held must have been regular, in the ordinary course of justice, and before a tribunal having power to ascertain the truth or falsity of the charge and to punish the supposed offender, the now plaintiff; 3 Pick. 579. When the proceedings are irregular, the prosecutor is a trespasser; 3 Blackf. 210.

The burden is on the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that he was prosecuted, that he was exonerated or discharged, and that the prosecution was both malicious and without probable cause; 11 Q. B. D. 440. Webb, Poll. Torts 892; Bish. Non-contr. L. § 218-250; 85 Md. 194; 48 Barb. 30; 8 Gill & J. 877; 12 Conn. 219; 8 Mass. 112.

Malice is a question of fact for the jury, and is generally inferred from a want of probable cause; 65 Hun 623; but it is not evidence of malice when the prosecutor honestly believes in the charge; [1891] 2 Q. B. 718; and such presumption is only prima facie and may be rebutted; 86 Ala. 250; see 41 La. Ann. 803; 45 Ill. App. 458; 65 Hun 625. Although absence of reasonable and probable cause is sometimes evidence of malice, yet it is not when the prosecutor actually believes in the charge; [1891] 2 Q. B. 718. From the most express malice, however, want of probable cause cannot be inferred; 35 Md. 194; 37 id. 282. Both malice and want of probable cause must concur in order to constitute a cause of action; 20 Nev. 290; 40 La. Ann. 374; 41 id. 311; 69 Tex. 167; 79 Ga. 637; 51 N. J. L. 891; 130 U. S. 141. The plaintiff must show total absence of probable cause, whether the original proceedings were civil or criminal; 1 Camp. 199; 7 Cra. 339; 1 Mas. 24; 11 Ad. & E. 488; 24 Pick. 81; 2 Wend. 424;

1 Hill S. C. 83; 3 G. & J. 377; 9 Conn. 309; 3 Blackf. 445; 47 Kan. 396; 108 Pa. 645.

Probable cause means the existence of such facts and circumstances as would excite the belief in a reasonable mind that the plaintiff was guilty of the offence for which he was prosecuted; 87 Md. 283; 86 Ala. 250. It is such conduct on the part of the accused as may induce the court to infer that the prosecution was undertaken from public motives; 1 Greenl. 185; a. c. 10 Am. Dec. 48. See, also, 73 Ill. 262; 88 id. 548; 4 Vt. 883; 62 N. Y. 325; 83 Neb. 444. Where there are grounds of suspicion that a crime has been committed and the interests of public justice require an investigation, there is said to be probable cause, however malicious the intention of the accuser may have been; Cro. Eliz. 70; 3 Term 231; 1 Wend. 140, 345; 5 Humph. 357; 3 B. Monr. 4; 55 Fed. Rep. 217. See 1 Pa. 234; 6 W. & S. 286; 1 Meigs 84; 3 Brev. 94; 37 Ill. App. 28. It is a reasonable ground of suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that the accused is guilty of the offence with which he is charged; 14 U. S. App. 297. And probable cause will be presumed until the contrary appears; circumstances sufficient merely to warrant a belief by a cautious man are not sufficient, but the belief must be that also of a reasonable and prudent man; 151 Pa. 86. The plaintiff must prove affirmatively the absence of probable cause and the existence of malice, and where the defendant had a very treacherous memory, and went on with the prosecution under the impression that the plaintiff had committed perjury, yet if that was an honest impression, the result of a fallacious memory, and acting upon it, he honestly believed the plaintiff had sworn falsely, the English court of appeals held that the jury would not be justified in finding that the defendant had prosecuted the plaintiff maliciously and without probable cause; 8 Q. B. D. 174. It makes no difference how malicious may have been the private motives of the party in prosecuting; he is protected if there was probable cause; 55 Fed. Rep. 217.

Whether the circumstances relied on are true is a question for the jury; but whether if true they amount to probable cause is a question of law for the court; 2 Q. B. 169; 93 Cal. 222; 27 Me. 266; 10 N. Y. 240; 20 Ohio 119; 10 Q. B. 272; 47 Pa. 84; 93 Cal. 222; 21 Can. S. C. 588. Evidence that the prosecution was to obtain possession of goods, is proof of want of probable cause; 47 Pa. 194; so is evidence that the plaintiff began the prosecution for the purpose of collecting a debt. See 144 Ill. 83; 66 Tex. 497. Probable cause depends upon the prosecutor's belief of guilt or innocence; 48 Barb. 30; see supra; rumors are not, but representations of others are, a foundation for belief of guilt; 52 Pa. 419. The foreman of the grand jury, who has testified that the criminal prosecution was dismissed, cannot be asked why it was dismissed, because his testimony merely proves that the prosecution is at an end and has no bearing on the question of probable cause; and evidence that the prosecution was dismissed at the instance of the defendant without the plaintiff's knowledge is irrelevant either in bar of suit or in mitigation of damages; 81 Md. 518. When the defendant, in instituting the prosecution, went before a magistrate with his counsel, expecting to make the complaint in writing and that the warrant would be issued in the usual manner, he is not liable for the act of the magistrate in directing the arrest of the defendant without a warrant; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 301.

A warrant for the arrest of a person issued upon an affidavit which charged such person with being "guilty of lying and misrepresentation" is void as a criminal prosecution, and it has been held that it cannot serve as the basis of an action for malicious prosecution; 27 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 680.

Malice may be inferred from the zeal and activity of the prosecutor conducting the prosecution; 36 Md. 346. The advice of counsel who has been fully informed of the facts is a complete justification; 25 Pa. 275; 135 id. 458; 151 id. 86; 61 N. W. Rep. 390; 87 Minn. 147; 40 id. 418; otherwise, where it does not appear that a full disclosure of all the facts was made; 41 La. Ann. 303; 85 Fed. Rep. 466; 89 Minn. 107; 2 Misc. Rep. 308; and where the defendant acts on the advice of a magistrate or one not learned in the law; 36 Md. 346; 159 Pa. 374; 81 Ga. 668; but see 84 Me. 261; 96 Mich. 408. Where he acted on the advice of a public prosecuting officer, probable cause is established if he shows a disclosure to such officer of all the facts within his knowledge, or which he had reasonable ground to believe, though there were exculpatory facts which he might have ascertained by diligent inquiry; 49 Pac. Rep. (Oreg.) 803.

A waiver of preliminary examination by the defendant in a criminal prosecution raises a presumption of probable cause; 49 Pac. Rep. (Oreg.) 803.

The advice of counsel is not, however, conclusive of want of malice; 69 Tex. 187; and while a full and complete statement of facts to a reputable attorney is a complete defence, yet though the facts may be established beyond doubt the question of good faith is for the jury, when different minds might draw different conclusions from the evidence; 67 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 49.

The fact that an attorney was consulted before prosecuting the plaintiff for opening his mail, is not admissible as proof of probable cause, when it also appears that the attorney gave defendant no advice, but referred him to the United States officers; 61 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 390. See 33 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 391.

The malicious prosecution or action must be ended, and the plaintiff must show it was groundless, either by his acquittal or by obtaining a final judgment in his favor in a civil action; 1 Root 553; 7 Cow. 715; 2 Dev. & B. 492; 17 Or. 447. But see contra, as to civil suits; Big. Torts 73; 14 East 216; because the plaintiff in a civil suit can terminate it whenever he wishes to do so. The finding by the examining court that there was probable cause to believe the plaintiff guilty and the binding him over for trial is only prima facie evidence of probable cause, and probable cause cannot be shown by admission of the plaintiff after his arrest nor by the finding of property on his premises, similar to that stolen, if that fact was not known to the defendant when he began his prosecution; 13 Ind. App. 10; 63 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 348. Any act which is tantamount to a discontinuance of a civil suit has the same effect; as where the plaintiff had been arrested in a civil suit, and the defendant had failed to have the writ returned, and to appear and file a declaration at the return term; 109 Mass. 158.

In criminal cases also, when the prosecuting officer enters a dismissal of the proceedings before the defendant is put in jeopardy, this act, in some jurisdictions, gives no right to the prisoner against the prosecutor; for instance, where, in a prosecution for arson, the prosecuting officer enters a nolle prosequi before the jury is sworn; 4 Cush. 217. See 56 Conn. 493; 151 Pa. 86; 73 Hun 547; 7 Ind. App. 581; 117 N. C. 81. The law on this point is unsettled. But it would seem that where the entry of the nolle prosequi is the mere act of the prosecuting attorney and no action of the court is had on it, the entry will not be an end of the proceedings, and for that reason would not warrant any action which could not be had before the proceedings were at an end. But when the court enters a judgment of discharge upon a nolle prosequi it seems to be a sufficient termination of the prosecution.

The remedy for a malicious prosecution is an action on the case to recover damages for the injury sustained; 5 Stew. & P. 367; 2 Conn. 700; 11 Mass. 500; 6 Me. 421; 3 Gill & J. 377. See CASE. The elements of damage in this action are very vague. The jury may consider the natural effect of the prosecution on reputation and feelings, the consequences of arrest, loss of time, injury to property, and expense; 57 Ia. 474; 52 Ill. 85; Newell, Mal. Pros. 494. If the prosecution was begun without probable cause, and persisted in for some private end, punitive damages may be given; 37 Md. 283. See full article in 21 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 281. To be relieved from an action the defendant must rebut the prima facie proof of implied malice against him, by showing honest belief, grounded on probable and reasonable cause; 41 La. Ann. 303. It is sufficient if the facts or appearances are sufficient to induce a reasonable probability that the acts which constitute the crime have been done; 85 Fed. Rep. 261.

MALICIOUSLY. With deliberate intent to injure. 30 Conn. 85.

Maliciously suing out an attachment means not only malevolent intention to do injury, but also that careless disregard of the rights of others which, without real ill-will, the law implies as malice. Anderson; 12 F. R. 268. In a spirit of wicked revenge toward a person, or of wanton cruelty toward an animal. Id.; 7 Ala. 728. In misdemeanors and felonies, imports a criminal motive, intent or purpose. Id.; 9 Gray 303.

See WANTONLY AND MALICIOUSLY.

MALIGNARE. To malign or slander; also to main.

MALINGERING. See PARALYSIS.

MALITIA (Lat.). An express evil design. 4 Bl. Com. 199. Wickedness of purpose; malice. See MALICE.

MALITIA PRÆCOGITATA. Malice aforethought.

MALLEABLE. Capable of being drawn out and extended by beating; capable of extension by hammering; reducible to laminated form by beating. 46 Fed. Rep. 845.

MALLUM. In Old English Law. A court of the higher kind in a county in which the more important business was dispatched by the count or earl.

A public national assembly. Burrill; 1 Rob. Charles V. App. n. 40. Spelman considers this word to be of Saxon origin, but the radical import of it to be doubtful. The Saxon mael has the several meanings of an assembly, a plea or plaint, law or judgment, and a banquet. Id.

MALO ANIMO. With an evil intention; with malice.

MALO GRATO. In spite; unwillingly.

MALT LIQUOR. A general term for an alcoholic beverage produced merely by the fermentation of malt, as opposed to those obtained by a distillation of malt or mash (q. v.). Thorpe, National and State Prohibition, 158; 153 Ark. 317. See SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

MALT-TAX. An excise duty imposed upon malt in England. 1 Bla. Com. 813.

MALPRACTICE. See PHYSICIAN.

MALUM (L. Lat.). A misfortune; an infirmity; a sudden indisposition, by which a party was prevented from appearing in court when summoned.

MALUM PROHIBITUM (Lat.). A wrong prohibited; an act prohibited as wrongful; an act involving an illegality resulting from positive law. See MALA PROHIBITA; MALA IN SE.

MALUM IN SE (Lat.). Evil in itself. A crime by reason of its inherent nature. 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 28.

An offence malum in se is one which is naturally evil, as murder, theft, and the like; offences at common law are generally malum in se. An offence malum prohibitum, on the contrary, is not naturally an evil, but becomes so in consequence of its being forbidden, as playing at games which, being innocent before, have become unlawful in consequence of being forbidden. See Bacon, Abr. Assumpsit (a); 1 Kent 488; MALA PROBITA.

MALVEILLES. Ill. In some ancient records this word signifies malicious practices, or crimes and misdemeanors.

MALVEIS PROCURORS. Such as used to pack juries, by the nomination of either party in a cause, or other practice. Cow.

MALVERSATION. In French Law. This word is applied to all punishable faults committed in the exercise of an office, such as corruptions, exactions, extortions, and larceny. Merlin, Répert.

MAN. A human being. A person of the male sex. A male of the human species above the age of puberty.

In its most extended sense the term includes not only the adult male sex of the human species, but women and children: examples: "of offences against man, some are more immediately against the king, others more immediately against the subject." Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 2, s. 1. "Offences against the life of man come under the general name of homicide, which in our law signifies the killing of a man by a man." Id. book 1, c. 8, s. 2.

It was considered in the civil or Roman law that although man and person are synonymous in grammar, they had a different acceptation in law; all persons were men, but all men—for example, slaves—were not persons, but things. See Barringt. Stat. 216.

MAN OF WAR. See SEAMAN.

MANACLE. See FETTERS.

MANAGE. Direct; control; govern; administer; oversee. 144 Pa. 377.

In so far as the use of the word is drawn in question in adjudications, it is generally applied to affairs somewhat complex and extended, and requiring a degree of authority, discretion, and judgment, to ensure satisfactory conduct of them. Abbott.

MANAGEMENT. In the Harter Act, relates to management on the voyage and not to the master's acts in stowing the ship with reference to her stability and seaworthiness; 81 Fed. Rep. 665.

Direction; oversight. In speaking of corporations, management is sometimes used for the body of persons charged with the conduct of the corporate affairs, in the same way as the direction or the directory is sometimes used for the board having the management or direction. Abbott. The management of an engine consists in part of the management of whatever generates the motive force. Anderson. 10 R. I. 28.

MANAGER. A person appointed or elected to manage the affairs of another. A term applied to those officers of a corporation who are authorized to manage its affairs.

One who has the conduct or direction of anything. 144 Pa. 377.

One of the persons appointed on the part of the house of representatives to prosecute impeachments before the senate.

In banking corporations these officers are commonly called directors, and the power to conduct the affairs of the company is vested in a board of directors. In some private corporations, such as railroad companies, canal and coal companies, and the like, these officers are called managers. Being agents, when their authority is limited, they have no power to bind their principal beyond such authority; 17 Mass. 29; 1 Me. 81.

In England and Canada the chief executive officer of a branch bank is called a manager. His duties are those of our presidents and cashiers combined. His signature is necessary to every contract binding on the bank, except entries in the pass-books of customers. He indorses bills, signs bills of exchange and drafts, and condacts the correspondence of the bank. He is under the control of the board of directors of the bank, and there is usually a local or branch board of directors, at which he acts as presiding officer. Sewell, Bank.

MANAGING AGENT. An agent having general supervision over the affairs of a corporation. Anderson; 16 Wis. 235. Distinguishes a person, representing a corporation, who is invested with general power, involving the exercise of judgment and discretion, from an ordinary agent or employee who acts in an inferior capacity, and under the discretion and control of superior authority, both in regard to the extent of the work and the manner of executing it. Id.; 19 Hun. 408. Such agent need not have charge of the whole business of the corporation. Id.; 35 Hun. 371. In several cases in New York, it has been held that "managing agent" means a person exercising the functions of an officer in the control and management of the business of a company or corporation, and does not include a person having charge of some special work, as, a baggage-master in respect to baggage, or a person employed to purchase horses and feed, or an assistant secretary, or a person who sells tickets, or who has charge of the transfer of the stock and the transmission of assessments. The adjudications have not gone so far as to hold that no agent is a "managing agent" who does not participate in the control of every part of the corporate business, and of every corporate act. Id.; 31 F. R. 295.

In England and Canada. The chief executive officer of a branch bank. Id. A member of the impeaching branch of a legislature, selected to assist as counsel at a trial. Id.

MANBOTE. A compensation paid the relations of a murdered man by the murderer or his friends.

MANCHE PRESENT. A bribe; a present from the donor's own hand.

MANCIPATE. To enslave; to bind up; to tie.

MANCIPATIO. In Roman Law. The legal form of conveyance and of fixing the relations between parties. Morey, R. L. 2. See MANUMISSION; MANCIPIUM; MANCIPIATORY WILL.

MANCIPIATORY WILL. A will by which a man's estate was conveyed to another to dispose of after his death to heirs whom the purchaser of the estate should name. Later, a person was appointed heir in the will through whom the legacies were left; and someone else, for form's sake, was employed as familias emptor (purchaser of the estate). (G. 2, 103.) Because this type of will was really a conveyance of property, it was made per aes et libram (q. v.). The procedure took the form of a conveyance (mancipatio), i. e., an imaginary sale in the presence of five witnesses and a balance-holder, all Roman citizens over puberty, and of the familias emptor. (J. 2, 10, 1.) At first this will took effect as a simple conveyance; it really became a will only when the estate was conveyed to a purchaser merely for the sake of form, and the heir was not disclosed until the death of the testator. Hunter, Rom. L., p. 767, 768.

A form of testamentary disposition of property.

"The testator, in the presence of five witnesses and a libripens, mancipates (i. e. sells) his estate (familias pecuniarum) to a third party, the so-called familias emptor, with a view to imposing upon the latter, in solemn terms (mancipatio), the duty of carrying out his last wishes as contained and expressed in the tabula testamenti. The object of the transaction is to make the familias emptor not the material, but only the formal owner of the estate. His actual duties consist in the carrying out of the testator's intentions and the handing over of the property to the persons named in the tabula testamenti, the familias emptor is neither more nor less than the executor of the testator." Sohm, Rom. L. 450.

This is said by the same author to be the oldest form of the Roman contract of mandatum "a juristic act validly concluded, not indeed consensum, but re (i. e. by a formal conveyance of ownership), and a juristic act giving rise to a rigorously binding obligation. The mandatum and the conveyance of ownership are not mutually incompatible. The familias emptor is the mandatory of the testator, because he is, formally speaking, the owner of the familias." Sohm, Rom. L. 451.

MANCIPIUM. The power acquired over a freeman by the mancipatio.

To form a clear conception of the true import of the word in the Roman jurisprudence, it is necessary to advert to the four distinct powers which were exercised by the pater familias, viz.: the manus, or marital power; the mancipium, resulting from the mancipatio, or alienatio per aes et libram, of a freeman; the dominica potestas, the power of the master over his slaves, and the patria potestas, the paternal power. When the pater familias sold his son, venundare, mancipare, the paternal power was succeeded by the mancipium, or the power acquired by the purchaser over the person whom he held in mancipio, and whose condition was assimilated to that of a slave. What is most remarkable is, that on the emancipation from the mancipium he fell back into the paternal power, which was not entirely exhausted until he had been sold three times by the pater familias. Si pater filium ter venundat, filius a patre liber esto. Gaius speaks of the mancipatio as imaginary quodam venditio, because in his times it was only resorted to for the purpose of adoption or emancipation. See 1 Ortolan, 112; Morey, Rom. L. 28, 32; Sohm, Inst. R. L. 124, 390; ADOPTION; PATER FAMILIAS.

MANCOMUNAL. In Spanish Law. A term applied to an obligation when one person assumes the contract or debt of another. Schmidt, Civ. L. 120.

MANDAMIENTO. In Spanish Law. Commission; power of attorney. A bona fide contract by which one person commits his affairs to the charge of another, and the latter assumes the charge. White, New Recop. b. 2, tit. 12, c. 1.

MANDAMUS. In Practice. This is a high prerogative writ, usually issuing out of the highest court of general jurisdiction in a state, in the name of the sovereignty, directed to any natural person, corporation, or inferior court of judicature within its jurisdiction, requiring them to do some particular thing therein specified, and which appertains to their office or duty. 8 Bla. Com. 110; 4 Bacon, Abr. 495; per Marshall, C. J., in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cra. 137, 168. See 3 Wyo. 588. It is a common-law writ with which equity has nothing to do; 76 Ga. 725.

It is an extraordinary remedy in cases where the usual and ordinary modes of proceeding are powerless to afford remedies to the parties aggrieved, and when, without its aid, there would be a failure of justice; 88 Va. 942. It confers no new authority and the party to be coerced must have the power to perform the act; 129 U. S. 498. Mandamus has been termed a "criminal process relative to civil rights;" 3 Brev. 284.

Its use is well defined by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Barker, 3 Burr. 1265: "It was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and defect of police. Therefore it ought to be used upon all occasions when the law has established no specific remedy, and where, in justice and good government there ought to be one." "If there be a right, and no other specific remedy, this should not be denied." The same principles are declared by Lord Ellenborough, in Rex v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 8 East 219. See 6 Ad. & E. 321. The writ of mandamus is the supplementary remedy when the party has a clear right, and no other appropriate redress, in order to prevent a failure of justice. 12 Petard. Abr. 438 (309). It is the absence of a specific legal remedy which gives the court jurisdiction; 2 Selw. N. P. Mandamus; 29 Pa. 131; 84 id. 496; 41 Me. 15; 2 Pat. & H. 865; but the party must have a perfect legal right; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1559; 27 Mo. 225; 11 Ind. 305; 20 Ill. 535; 28 Barb. 73; 3 Dutoh. 135; 8 Cal. 167; and there must be a positive ministerial duty to be performed and no other appropriate remedy. 81 S. C. 81; 196 U. S. 246; 85 Ky. 177; 33 Neb. 641.

Under the English system this writ acquired, and may probably be still said to retain, its prerogative character; but in the United States it is becoming more and more assimilated to an ordinary remedy, to the use of which the parties are entitled as of right. It was in this sense that Taney, C. J., characterized it in modern practice as "nothing more than an action at law between the parties"; 24 How. 66; see, also, 38 Conn. 390; High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 4. There is a tendency, however, in some states to adhere to the prerogative idea; 26 N. Y. 816; 33 Ill. 134; 48 id. 340. Though in the last named state, the prerogative idea seems to have been lost under the statutory use of the writ, while the discretionary character remains; 86 id. 283. It may be said to remain in this country an extraordinary remedy at law in the same sense that injunction is an extraordinary remedy in equity; High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 5. The injunction is preventive and conservative, its object being to preserve matters in statu quo. Mandamus is remedial, tending to compel action and redress past grievances; id. § 6, and cases cited. Mandamus cannot be used as a preventive remedy to take the place of an injunction; 42 Md. 203.

Mandamus is a remedial process, and is not available to compel the performance of an act that will work public or private mischief, or to compel compliance with the strict letter of the law in disregard of its spirit, or in aid of a palpable fraud, or to evade the payment of a just portion of a tax by taking advantage of a confessed mistake; 137 N. Y. 201.

The remedy extends to the control of all inferior tribunals, corporations, public officers, and even private persons in some cases. But more generally, the English court of king's bench, from which our practice on the subject is derived, declined to interfere by mandamus to require a specific performance of a contract when no public right was concerned; Ang. & A. Corp. 781; 6 East 356; Bacon, Ab. Mandamus; 28 Vt. 587.

Mandamus may be granted by an appellate court to require a judge of the court to settle and allow a bill of exceptions; 18 Or. 219; 30 W. Va. 58; 128 U. S. 544. See 129 Ill. 218. It will also lie to compel an inferior court to exercise a discretion; 44 La. Ann. 1031; but not to compel the court below to decide in a particular way, or to operate as a substitute for an appeal or writ of error, even if none is given by law; 153 U. S. 386.

It is a proper remedy to compel the performance of a specific act where the act is ministerial in its character; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 15; 12 Pet. 524; 34 Pa. 298; 26 Ga. 663; 7 Ia. 186, 890; but where the act is of a discretionary nature; 6 How. 92; 13 Cush. 403; 20 Tex. 60; 10 Cal. 376; 5 Harring. 108; 12 Md. 329; 145 N. Y. 253; 4 Mich. 187; 5 Ohio St. 528; or judicial nature; 14 La. Ann. 60; 7 Cal. 180; 18 B. Monr. 423; 7 E. & B. 366; it will lie only to compel action generally; 11 Cal. 42; 30 Ala. M. S. 49; 28 Mo. 359; 86 id. 75; 31 W. Va. 781; 83 Ala. 226; 40 La. Ann. 818; 119 Ind. 444; 85 Ky. 177; 51 N. J. L. 479; 120 Pa. 518; and where the necessity of acting is a matter of discretion, it will not lie even to compel action; 6 How. 92; 5 Ia. 380. A class of cases in which this distinction is constantly drawn into question is where a mandamus is applied for to control the letting of public or municipal contracts, and it is the general rule that the remedy will not be applied to compel a municipal corporation to enter into a contract with one who shows himself to have been the lowest bidder; 9 Wash. 518. The provision that the contract shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder is mandatory, but the municipal board has a discretion in determining the question of responsibility, and their decision will not be reviewed on mandamus even though erroneous; 108 Pa. 609; 63 Ill. 379; 16 Nev. 217; 91 Mo. 886, contra, 21 Ohio 311; 4 Neb. 150; in other cases it is held that where the contract has been entered into with another and expense incurred, a mandamus will not be issued; 27 N. Y. 378 and see 72 id. 496; 46 Barb. 354; 47 Mich. 135; 91 id. 263; others, again, hold that, the statutes being for the public benefit, the relations have not a clear legal right; 24 Wis. 683; 76 Md. 395; 45 Vt. 7; 23 Ia. 208. The writ is also refused where the matter is left entirely to the discretion of the authorities, with no provision about the lowest bidder; 141 Mass. 74; 35 Neb. 346; 78 Ia. 97; 49 Barb. 259. Where before the application the work was readvertised and the same person made a lower bid, under which he obtained the contract, a mandamus was refused; 155 U. S. 803. See 38 Am. L. Reg. 899.

Writs of mandamus have been issued from very early times to the ecclesiastical courts to compel them to absolve an excommunicated person who wished to conform to the orders of the church; 1 Palmer 50; to compel the Dean of Arches to hear an appeal; 7 E. & B. 315; but a mandamus is refused where the judge has absolute discretion, and it is said that a mandamus has never been granted to deprive one of office; Shortt, Mand. & Pro. 289; in such cases the remedy is by quo warranto.

This remedy will be applied to compel a corporation or public officer; 14 La. Ann. 265; 41 Me. 15; 8 Ind. 452; see 7 Gray 280; to pay money awarded against them in pursuance of a statute duty, where no other specific remedy is provided; 6 Ad. & E. 335; 34 Pa. 496; see 69 Tex. 589; 16 Or. 355; or where the money is in an officer's official custody, legally subject to the payment of such demand; 76 Cal. 269; but if debt will lie, and the party is entitled to execution, mandamus will not be allowed; Redf. Railw. § 158; 6 C. B. 70; 13 M. & W. 628; 4 B. & A. 360; 1 Q. B. 288. But mandamus will not be granted to enforce a matter of contract or right upon which an action lies in the common-law courts, as to enforce the duty of common carriers; 7 Dowl. P. C. 566; 81 Fla. 482; or where the proper remedy is in equity; 18 M. & W. 451. But where compensation is claimed for damages done partly under the powers of a statute and partly not, mandamus is the proper remedy; 2 Railw. & C. Cas. 1; Redf. Railw. § 158. Mandamus will not issue to compel the secretary of state to pay money in his hands to one party, which is claimed by another party, and the right to which is in litigation; 127 U. S. 246. Nor will the supreme court of the United States interfere by mandamus with the executive officers of the government in the exercise of their ordinary official duties; 128 U. S. 40; but it will issue where the law requires them to act, or when they refuse to perform a mere ministerial duty; 185 U. S. 200; 137 id. 636; 139 id. 806. It lies to compel the performance of a statutory duty only when it is clear and indisputable and there is no other legal remedy; 127 U. S. 246.

Mandamus is the appropriate remedy to compel corporations to produce and allow an inspection of their books and records, at the suit of a corporation, where a controversy exists in which such inspection is material to his interests; 2 Stra. 1223; 3 Term 141; 4 Maule & B. 162; 7 Houst. 398; 8 C. 25 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 594.

It lies to compel the performance by a corporation of a variety of specific acts within the scope of its duties; 84 Pa. 496; 26 Ga. 663; 2 Metc. Ky. 56; 84 Ill. 303; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 481; 89 Minn. 219; 31 Fla. 492; 143 U. S. 492.

But in order to permit the use of this remedy to compel corporate action, there must be a clear legal obligation on the part of the corporation to act in the manner suggested, and the coincidence of the other conditions required to warrant the issuing of the writ, such as the absence of any other adequate legal remedy. Accordingly a mandamus has been refused to compel street car companies to operate an abandoned portion of a line where the charter did not clearly require its operation; 90

Tex. 590; or to keep cars running during the whole year, as that would involve the performance of a long series of continuing acts involving personal service, and extending over an indefinite time; 28 Ont. 399. So a railroad company as purchaser of a branch railroad at a foreclosure sale, will not be compelled to maintain and operate it at a loss where the business can be otherwise handled; 26 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 943.

The general rule on this subject is, that, if the inferior tribunal or corporate body has a discretion, and acts and exercises it, this discretion cannot be controlled by mandamus; but if the inferior body refuse to act when the law requires it to act, and the party has no other legal remedy, and where in justice there ought to be one, a mandamus will lie to set them in motion, and to compel action, and in proper cases, the court will settle the legal principles which should govern, but without controlling the discretion of the subordinate jurisdiction; Dill. Mun. Corp., 4th ed. § 822; 52 Ala. 87. The writ may be issued where an inferior court refuses to take jurisdiction when by law it ought to do so, or where, having obtained jurisdiction, it refuses to proceed in its exercise; 131 U. S. 221; 147 id. 14; id. 486; 150 id. 150.

It is the common remedy for restoring persons to corporate offices of which they are unjustly deprived; Beach, Pub. Corp. §§ 194, 1587; 41 Kan. 122; the title to the office having been before determined by proceeding by quo warranto; but it will not lie to try the title to an office of which there is a de facto incumbent; 52 Ala. 87; 1 Burr. 402; 1 Ld. Raym. 426; 1 Salk. 314; 2 Head 650; 54 Me. 95; 17 Or. 640; see 83 Wis. 416; 49 Neb. 755; 58 N. J. L. 541; unless quo warranto does not lie; 3 Johns. Cas. 79; but see 20 Barb. 302; 9 Md. 83; 15 Ill. 492. And see the cases fully reviewed in Redf. Railw. § 159. Mandamus will lie to compel acceptance of municipal office by one who, possessing the requisite qualifications, has been duly appointed to the same; 145 Ill. 573. It will issue out of the supreme court to restore to his office an attorney at law illegally disbarred by the judgment of a circuit court; 30 Fla. 302.

This remedy must be sought at the earliest convenient time in those cases where important interests will be affected by the delay; 12 Q. B. 448. But it is often necessary to delay in order to determine definitely the rights and injuries of the several parties concerned, as until public works are completed; 9 Dowl. P. C. 614; 4 Q. B. 877.

It is no sufficient answer to the application that the party is also liable to indictment for the act complained of; 2 Railw. Cas. 599; 3 Q. B. 528. And where a railway company attempted to take up their rails, they were required by mandamus to restore them, notwithstanding they were also liable to indictment, that being regarded as a less efficacious remedy; 2 B. & Ald. 646. But mandamus will always be denied when there is other adequate remedy; 11 Ad. & E. 69; 1 Q. B. 288; Redf. Railw. § 159. See 97 Ala. 107; 96 Cal. 602.

It is not a proper proceeding for the correction of errors of an inferior court; 18 Pet. 279, 404; 18 Wend. 79; 18 La. Ann. 481; 7 Dowl. & R. 334; but see 140 U. S. 91; or where there is adequate remedy by appeal; 97 Mich. 620; 98 Cal. 602; 148 U. S. 107; id. 14; or by certiorari; 97 Mich. 687; 88 W. Va. 485. Indeed, by statute 6 & 7 Vict. ch. 67, § 2, the decisions of the English courts upon proceedings in mandamus may be revised on writ of error, and upon principle a writ of error will lie when the decision is made to turn upon a question of law and not upon discretion merely; Redf. Railw. § 159.

The writ is not demandable, as matter of right, but it is to be awarded in the discretion of the court; 1 Term 381, 386, 404, 426; 49 Barb. 269; 95 Cal. 450; Redf. Railw. § 159. But where a clear legal right to a writ is shown, the court has no discretion about granting it; 143 Ill. 484.

A petition for a mandamus to a public officer abates by his resignation of his office; 165 U. S. 28, where it was said that this principle has for years been considered as so well settled in that court "that in some of the cases no opinion has been filed and no official report published;" 9 Wall. 298, 313; 102 U. S. 378, 408; 155 id. 308, 306; 164 id. 701. The writ does not reach the office, but is against the officer as a person; 17 Wall. 604.

The power of granting this writ in England seems originally to have been exercised by the court of chancery, as to all the inferior courts, but not as to the king's bench; 1 Vern. 175; Ang. & A. Corp. § 697. But see 2 B. & Ald. 646; 2 M. & S. 80; 164 8 Ad. & E. 416. But for a great number of years the granting of the prerogative writ of mandamus has been confined in England to the court of king's bench.

In the United States the writ is generally issued by the highest court of judicature having jurisdiction at law; 34 Pa. 490; 20 Ill. 525; as relief by mandamus cannot be granted in equity; 127 U. S. 103.

The thirteenth section of the Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789, gives the supreme court power to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the authority of the United States. The issuing of a mandamus to courts is the exercise of an appellate jurisdiction, and, therefore, constitutionally vested in the supreme court; but a mandamus directed to a public officer belongs to original jurisdiction, and by the constitution, the exercise of original jurisdiction by the supreme court is restricted to certain specified cases, which do not comprehend a mandamus. The latter clause of the above section, authorizing this writ to be issued by the supreme court, to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, is, therefore, not warranted by the constitution, and void; 1 Cr. 175; see 5 Pet. 190; 13 id. 279, 404; 5 How. 103.

The supreme court of the United States has no power to control by mandamus the discretion of the circuit court in granting or refusing a supersedeas upon an appeal to the circuit court of appeals from an interlocutory order granting or continuing an injunction; 147 U. S. 525; nor can it compel the circuit court of appeals to receive and consider new proofs in an admiralty appeal in a cause within the legitimate jurisdiction of that court; 147 U. S. 486; but it will issue to compel compliance with a mandate of the supreme court of the United States, without regard to the value of the matter in dispute; 152 U. S. 512.

The circuit courts of the United States may also issue writs of mandamus; but their power in this particular is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction; 7 Cr. 504; 8 Wheat. 598; 1 Paine 453.

The mode of proceeding in obtaining the writ is: first, to demand of the party to perform the act. And it would seem that the party should be made aware of the purpose of the demand; 3 Ad. & E. 217, 477. The refusal must be of the thing demanded, and not of the right merely; 5 B. & Ad. 978. The refusal should be absolute and unqualified; but it may be by silence only. But the party should understand that he is required to perform the duty upon pain of the legal redress being resorted to without further delay; 4 Railw. Cas. 112. But any exception to the demand should be taken as a preliminary question; 10 Ad. & E. 531; Redf. Railw. § 190. A formal demand and refusal have been held not a necessary preliminary to the filing of a petition for mandamus to compel the performance of a public duty which the law requires to be done; 127 Ill. 613.

The application for a mandamus may be by motion in court, and the production of ex parte affidavits, in support of the facts alleged; in which case an alternative writ issues, as matter of course, generally, and the case is heard upon the excuse alleged in the return to the alternative writ; see 2 Metc. Ky. 56. Or the party may apply for the writ by formal petition, setting forth the grounds in detail, in which case the merits of the question are determined upon the traverse of the petition, instead of the traverse of the return to the alternative writ; 9 Ohio St. 599. In the latter case a rule is granted to show cause why a mandamus shall not issue; upon the decision of this rule an alternative writ would issue at common law and upon failure to obey this or make return of an adequate legal excuse, the peremptory writ followed. This practice is entirely changed by statute, see infra, but the rule to show cause is in many states the usual proceeding. And in either form, if the application prevails, a peremptory mandamus issues; the only proper or admissible return to which is a certificate of compliance with its requisitions, without further excuse or delay; 1 Q. B. 616; 1 Ia. 179. See Ang. & A. Corp. § 715. The peremptory writ need not precisely follow the alternative writ in matters of detail; 39 Minn. 426. The return to an alternative writ should be made with the greatest possible certainty, as at common law the return cannot be traversed; 127 Pa. 523; 77 Cal. 84. The practice varies greatly in different jurisdictions, though resting in all cases upon the same general principles, as to all which see generally, High, Extr. Leg. Rem. ch. 8.

The English practice is, if the first writ is denied, even on the ground of defects in the affidavits, not to permit a second application to be made; 8 Ad. & E. 413; so also, if it fail for other defects of form. But a more liberal practice obtains in the American courts; Redf. Railw. § 160.

By the Common-Law Procedure Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, provision is made for statutory mandamus, incidental to an action, brief in form and enforceable by attachment, which, if awarded, will issue peremptorily in the first instance. It has been held that a plaintiff could not under this act enforce specific performance of a contract; but that the act contemplated a public duty in which the plaintiff among others was interested, and not a private obligation which the plaintiff alone could enforce; but under the judicature acts, it is allowable for the court by an interlocutory order to grant a mandamus in any cases in which it shall appear just and convenient; Mozl. & W. The prerogative writ of mandamus is still retained in the English practice; but it is obvious that the foregoing statute must have very essentially abridged its use, as well as that of decrees in chancery for specific performance. See 8 E. & B. 512; Redf. Railw. § 190, pl. 8.

Contrived questions of fact, arising in the trial of applications for mandamus in the English practice, are referred to the determination of a jury; 1 Railw. Cas. 377; 2 id. 714; 8 El. & B. 512; 1 East 114. By the American practice, questions of fact, in applications for mandamus, are more commonly tried by the court; 2 Metc. Ky. 56. See Angell & Ames, Corp.; High, Extra. Leg. Rem.; 16 N. J. L. J. 138.

Costs rest in the discretion of the court. In the English courts they are allowed when the application fails, but not always when it prevails; Redf. Railw. § 159. The more just rule in such cases is to allow costs to the prevailing party, unless there is some special reason for denying them; and this rule now generally prevails; 8 Ad. & E. 901, 905; 5 id. 804; 1 Q. B. 636, 751; 6 E. L. & Eq. 267.

MANDANS. One who gives a thing in charge to another; one who requires, requests or employs another to do some act for him.

MANDANT. The bailor in a contract of mandate.

MANDATARY, MANDATARIUS. One who undertakes to perform a mandate. Jones, Bailm. 53. He that obtains a benefice by mandamus. Cowel.

MANDATE. A direction or request.

Thus a check is a mandate by the drawer to his banker to pay the amount to the transferee or holder of the check; 1 Q. B. Div. 82; Rapalje & Lawrence.

A power of attorney to receive payment in the extinguishment of an obligation. It may be express or implied. See Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 152.

In Practice. A judicial command or precept issued by a court or magistrate, directing the proper officer to enforce a judgment, sentence, or decree.

The decision of an appellate court sent down to the court whose proceedings have been reviewed.

In some jurisdictions the court of last resort is authorized to enter final judgment upon which execution may issue without further proceedings, but neither of the federal appellate courts has such power; 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 701; Post. Fed. Pr. § 496. Accordingly in these courts, and in appellate courts generally, it is the practice to send down a mandate embodying the decision. In the supreme court of the United States the mandates are sent down before the February recess, and also before the conclusion of the term; but for proper cause shown a special mandate may be ordered. A mandate may be recalled from the inferior court and set aside or corrected at the term at which it is issued; 15 Pet. 119; 111 U. S. 798; but an application to recall and correct the mandate cannot be made after the close of the term; id.; 107 id. 629.

Where there is a reversal of a judgment or decree which has been executed pending the appeal, a direction of the court below to compel restitution should be included in the mandate; 6 Cr. 329; 8 Wall. 507; even where the reversal is for want of jurisdiction; 139 U. S. 218. Restitution may be enforced by contempt proceedings; 9 Wall. 605; and it may be compelled even where a third person has received the funds or property, if he is within the jurisdiction and no superior equities in his favor have intervened; id.; but duties or charges paid by the party from whom restitution is required may be allowed; id. Restitution from the United States cannot be compelled; 10 Wheat. 431.

Interest should be included in the mandate, otherwise it cannot be awarded after the affirmance; 9 Pet. 275; but after affirmance the defendant is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the date of judgment until payment; 1 U. S. Rev. Stat. § 1010; Supr. Ct. Rule 23; Cir. Ct. App. Rule 30; 14 How. 328.

When the mandate is filed in the court below, that court again acquires the jurisdiction of the case. It has been held that in some cases a state court may act upon an affirmance without awaiting the mandate; 140 U. S. 291; but it is clearly the better practice to have the proceedings below await the mandate, which may always be specially applied for if circumstances require it; see supra. It was held that the statute of limitations against the right of the purchaser to sue for breach of warranty of title would run from the decision of the appellate court that his title was invalid, and not from the time of filing the mandate; 42 Fed. Rep. 757.

The court below is bound by the decree of the appellate court as set forth in the mandate; 12 Pet. 488; which must be interpreted according to its subject-matter, with due consideration to the decree below as well as that above; 15 Pet. 52; 116 U. S. 45. After the case has been sent back by a mandate it has been held too late to question the jurisdiction; 6 Cr. 267; 20 How. 541; to grant a new trial; 1 Wall. 69 (except in ejectment; 149 U. S. 99); to permit the filing of a supplemental answer; 12 Pet. 339; to grant leave to file a supplemental bill suggesting new defenses; 116 U. S. 45; to review the case below on its merits; 3 How. 611; 138 U. S. 595; 101 id. 555; 10 Wheat. 431. See, generally, Post. Fed. Pr. § 496.

Royal mandates to judges for interfering in private causes constituted a branch of the royal prerogative, which was given up by Edward I. And the 1 W. & M. at 2. c. 2, declared that the pretended power of suspending or dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by royal authority, without consent of parliament, is illegal. Whart.

In Contracts. A bailment of property in regard to which the bailee engages to do some act without reward. Story, Bailm. § 137. A contract whereby one party agrees to execute gratuitously a commission received from the other. Sohm, Rom. L. 314.

In the early Roman law (before the doctrines of agency were developed), it was a trust or commission by which one person, called the mandator, requested another, the mandatarius, to act in his own name and as if for himself in a particular transaction (special mandate), or in all the affairs of the former (general mandate). The mandatarius was the only one recognized as having legal rights and responsibilities as toward third persons in the transactions involved. As between him and the mandator, however, the latter was entitled to all benefit, and bound to indemnify against losses, etc.; but the service was gratuitous. Cent. Dict.

The contract of mandate in the civil law is not limited to personal property, nor does it require a delivery of personal property when it relates to that. Pothier, de Mand. n. 1; La. Civ. Code, 2981-64. It is, however, restricted to things of a personal nature at common law, and of these there must be a delivery, actual or constructive. Story, Bailm. § 142; 3 Stroth. 345.

Mandates and deposits closely resemble each other: the distinction being that in mandates the care and service are the principal, and the custody the accessory; while in deposits the custody is the principal thing, and the care and service are merely accessory. Story, Bailm. § 140; 2 Kent 569.

For the creation of a mandate it is necessary—first, that there should exist something, which should be the matter of the contract; secondly, that it should be done gratuitously; and, thirdly, that the parties should voluntarily intend to enter into the contract. Pothier, Pand. l. 17, t. 1, p. 1, § 1; Pothier, de Mandat, c. 1, § 2; Ersk. Prin. 319.

There is no particular form or manner of entering into the contract of mandate prescribed either by the common law or by the civil law, in order to give it validity. It may be verbal or in writing; it may be express or implied; it may be in solemn form or in any other manner. Story, Bailm. § 140. The contract may be varied at the pleasure of the parties. It may be absolute or conditional, general or special, temporary or permanent. Wood, Civ. Law 242; 1 Domat, b. 1, t. 15, §§ 1, 6, 7, 8; Pothier, de Mandat, c. 1, § 3.

In Louisiana it is generally gratuitous, but not so when a contrary intention is implied from conduct of parties or nature of business; 7 La. Ann. 207; a right to compensation may be inferred from nature of services without express agreement; 5 id. 672.

The mandatary, upon undertaking his trust and receiving his article, is bound to perform it as agreed upon; 5 B. & Ald. 117; 1 Sneed 248; 6 Binn. 308; 5 Fla. 38; 41 Fed. Rep. 152; and is responsible only for gross negligence; 2 Kent 571; 4 B. & C. 345; 2 Ad. & E. 256; 16 How. 475; 3 Mas. 132; 17 Mass. 450; 2 Hawks 146; 34 Neb. 426; 154 Pa. 296; but in considering the question of negligence, regard is to be had to any implied undertaking to furnish superior skill arising from the known ability of the mandatary. Story, Bailm. §§ 177, 182; 20 Mart. La. 68. The fact that a gratuitous bailee has given bond for the faithful performance of his duties as such does not increase his liability; 154 Pa. 296. Whether a bank is liable for neglect of its agent in collecting notes, see 8 N. Y. 459; 4 Rawle 384; 2 Gall. 565; 10 Cush. 583; 12 Conn. 303; 6 H. & J. 140; 1 Pet. 25; 89 Mo. 240. He must render an account of his proceedings, and show a compliance with the condition of the bailment; Story, Bailm. § 191.

The dissolution of the contract may be by renunciation by the mandatary before commencing the execution of the undertaking; 2 M. & W. 145; 22 E. L. & Eq. 501; 6 B. Monr. 415; 3 Fla. 38; Story, Bailm.

Monr. 661; 8 Humphr. 430.

In Civil Law. The instructions which the emperor addressed to a public functionary, and which were to serve as rules for his conduct. These mandates resembled those of the proconsuls, the mandata jurisdictionis, and were ordinarily binding on the legates or lieutenants of the emperor of the imperial provinces, and there they had the authority of the principal edicts. Savigny, Dr. Rom. c. 3, § 42, n. 4.

In the Canon Law. A rescript of the pope, by which he commands some ordinary collator, or precentor, to put the person there nominated in possession of the first benefice vacant in his collation. As to their abuses, see 2 Hall. Mid. Ages 212; Rapalje & Lawrence.

MANDATOR. The person employing another to perform a mandate. Story, Bailm. § 138; 1 Brown, Civ. L. 382; Halif. Anal. Civ. L. 70.

MANDATORY. In the construction of statutes, this word is applied to such as require to be obeyed, under penalty of having proceedings under them declared void. Directory statutes must be obeyed, but, if not, do not invalidate the act. See STATUTE. IMPERATIVE. Cf. DIRECTORY.

MANDATORY INJUNCTION. One that compels the defendant to restore things to their former condition and virtually directs him to perform an act. Bishp. Eq. § 400. See INJUNCTION, and an extended note there cited from 20 Am. Dec. 389.

MANDATORY STATUTES. See MANDATORY.

MANDATUM. See BAILMENT; MANDATE.

MANDAVI BALLIVO. In English Practice. The return made by a sheriff when he has committed the execution of a writ of a liberty to a bailiff, who has the right to execute the writ.

MANERIUM. A manor Wharton.

MANHOOD. In Feudal Law. A term denoting the ceremony of doing homage by the vassal to his lord. The formula used was devenio vester homo, I become your man. 2 Bla. Com. 54; 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 585. See HOMAGE.

MANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. The most common of all forms of insanity, consisting of one or both of the following conditions, viz.: intellectual aberration, and morbid or affective obliquity.

A chronic affection of the brain, ordinarily without fever, characterized by the perturbation and exaltation of the sensibilities, the intelligence, and will. Esquirol.

A condition of exaltation which affects the emotions and the intellect, and expresses itself by increased activity,—mental and physical. 3 With. & B. Med. Jur. 250.

A condition in which the perversion of the understanding embraces all kinds of objects and is accompanied with a general mental excitement. 2 Misc. Rep. 329.

It is in one form mere excitement, or this may have developed into the other,—frenzy. It is the reverse of melancholia, and as well developed as the depression of the latter, is the opposite feeling which characterizes the former; id.

An insanity in which there is general exaltation of the mental, sensory, and motor functions. 1 Clevenger, Med. Jur. of Insan. 933.

It would appear to be of easy diagnosis, but the excitement of other forms of insanity is constantly mistaken for that of simple mania. The beginning is very gradual, and weeks, months, or even years of bad health may precede an outbreak, and the mental explosion is usually unexpected. Id. The maniac either misapprehends the true relation between men and things, or the consequences of which he adopts notions manifestly absurd, and believes in occurrences that never did and never could take place, or his sentiments, affections, and emotions are so perverted that whatever excites activity is viewed with a distorted medium, or, which is the most common fact, both these conditions may exist together, in which case their relative share in the disease may differ in such degree that one or the other may scarcely be perceived at all. According as the intellectual or moral element prevails, the disease is called intellectual or moral mania. Whether the former is ever entirely wanting has been stoutly questioned, less from any dearth of facts than from some fancied metaphysical incongruity. The logical consequence of the fact is that in the absence of intellectual disturbance there is really no insanity,—the moral disorders proceeding rather from unbridled passions than from any pathological condition. Against all such reasoning it will be sufficient here to oppose the very common fact that in every collection of the insane may be found many who exhibit no intellectual aberration, but in whom moral disorders of the most flagrant kind present a marked contrast to the previous character and habits of life.

Both forms of mania may be either general or partial; the latter, the patient has adopted some notion having a very limited influence upon his mental movements, while outside of that no appearance of impairment or irregularity can be discerned. Pure monomania, as this form of insanity has been often called,—often called,—is confined to a certain point, the understanding being perfectly sound in every other respect,—is, no doubt, a veritable fact, but one of very rare occurrence. The peculiar notions of the insane, constituting insane belief, of two kinds, delusions and hallucinations, which titles see. See also delirium.

In general intellectual mania, excepting that form of it called raving, it is not to be understood that the mind is irrational on every topic, but rather that it is the sport of vague and shifting delusions, or that the reason is not manifest, has lost all nicety of intellectual discernment, and that the patient is in any continuous process of thought with its customary steadiness and correctness. It is usually accompanied by feelings of estrangement or indifference towards those who at other times were objects of affection and interest. A common feature of the disease is either more or less nervous exaltation, manifested by loquacity, turbulence, and great muscular activity, or depression, indicated by silence, gloom, painful apprehensions, and thoughts of self-destruction.

In moral or affective mania, the disorder is manifested chiefly, if not entirely, in the sentiments or propensities, which are essential parts of our mental constitution, and, of course, as liable to disease as the intellectual faculties. In modern classification what is termed affective insanity is a form in which the feelings and emotions are chiefly involved; it concerns the desires and the ethical side of human nature. 3 With. & B. 265. It may be partial or general. In the former, a single propensity is excited to such a degree of activity as to impel the patient to its gratification by an irresistible force, while perfectly conscious of the nature of the act and deploring the necessity that controls him. Our limits allow us to do but little more than to indicate the principal of these morbid impulses:—propensity to kill, homicidal monomania; propensity to steal, kleptomania; sexual propensity, by various names such as idoomania, erotomania, nymphomania; propensity to burn, pyromania; propensity to drink, dipsomania; propensity to use opium, morphomania. In the first, the patient is impelled by an inward necessity to take life, without provocation, without motive. The victim is often the patient's child, or some one to whom there has been a tender attachment. In most cases there have been some arrangements of health, or some deviation from the ordinary physiological condition, such as delivery, or suppressed menstruation; but occasionally no incident of this kind can be detected; the patient has been, apparently, in the ordinary condition, both bodily and mental. See DIPLOMANIA; EROTIC MANIA; KLEPTOMANIA; PYROMANIA.

In general moral mania, it is not to be supposed that the sentiments and propensities are all equally disordered. On the contrary, the propensities may not be excessively active, though occasionally one may crave unusual indulgence. The essential features of general moral mania is that the moral relations, whereby the conduct is governed, more than by the deductions of reason, are viewed through a distorted medium. This condition is usually accompanied by a perversion of some of the sentiments that inspire hope, fear, courage, self-reliance, self-respect, modesty, veracity, domestic affection. The patient is eager and sanguine in the pursuit of whatever strikes his fancy, ready with the most plausible reasons for the success of the wildest projects, viewing every prospect through a rose-colored medium, and regardless of the little proprieties and amenities of life. Love for others is replaced by aversion; in indifference, the most contradiction or check is met by anger or impatience; he is restless, insensible to fatigue, and sleeps comparatively little. In some cases, and often at different periods in the same case, the very opposite moral condition occurs. Without cause, true or delusive, the person is completely wretched. The past affords him no pleasure, the future reveals not a single gleam of hope, and the ordinary sources of comfort and joy only serve to darken the cloud of doubt, apprehension, and despair in which he is enveloped.

Mania is usually a growth, rather than a sudden development (though sometimes the latter), and its incipient stages are characterized by more or less of morbid depression, or, in some cases, irritability. Then follows a period of restless but undirected and unconcentrated activity. Delusions and hallucinations are common, and may extend to an entire change of personality.

The physical condition, like the mental, indicates early an appearance of vigor with excessive appetite; and the use of alcoholic stimulants, while not in itself a cause, may hasten the attack, so that in many cases where the morbid alcoholic mania it is found that the mental disorder preceded the drinking. It is said that "there is always, however, finally a failure of nutrition with loss of flesh, the tongue becomes coated and the bowels are constipated. The pulse may be somewhat rapid, but frequently, even during great excitement, there is little change, it often being slow and small. Insomnia is a marked symptom, days passing without sleep despite the ceaseless activity. There is one peculiarity about this constant activity, in that there seems to be no sense of fatigue accompanying it. There is, in fact, apparently a cerebral anaesthesia. This applies also to pain perception, as exposure to cold does not seem to be recognized, and even painful operations can be carried on without apparent suffering. Acts of self-mutilation, which are especially common where sexual disturbance is associated with the mania, are often done, which are narrowing in the extremities and yet are not appreciated by the patient." 8 With. & B. Med. Jur. 551.

This form of mental disorder may be acute with frenzy and raving, in which case there is entire mental confusion and delirium; or it may be chronic in which case there is usually some more or less settled delusion with periodic excitability easily aroused and liable quickly to subside. "There is almost always associated with this condition a generally happy-go-lucky state of mind. There is in fact more or less dementia (q. v.), the state toward which all cases tend which do not end in recovery." Id. 253.

With respect to the effect of this form of mental disorder, whether general or partial, upon criminal responsibility and civil incapacity, see INSANITY.

MANIA A POTU. See DELIRIUM TREMENS; Whart. & St. Med. Jur.

MANIFEST. In Commercial Law. A written instrument containing a true account of the cargo of a ship or a commercial vessel. It must contain a list of all packages or separate items of freight with their distinguishing marks, numbers, etc. By the United States statute it must also designate the ports of lading and of destination, a description of the vessel and the designation of its owners, and must contain the names of the consignees and passengers with a list of their baggage and an account of the sea stores remaining; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2807. The manifest should be made out, dated, and signed by the captain at places where the goods or any part of them are taken on board.

The want of a manifest where one is required and also the making a false manifest, are grave offences.

In Evidence. Clear and requiring no proof; notorious; apparent by examination; open; palpable; incontrovertible. It is synonymous with evident, visible, or plain. 71 N. Y. 486.

MANIFESTO. A solemn declaration, by the constituted authorities of a nation, which contains the reasons for its public acts towards another.

On the declaration of war, a manifesto is usually issued, in which the nation declaring the war states the reasons for so doing. Vattel, l. 3, c. 4, § 84; Wolffius § 1187. It differs from a proclamation in that it is issued to the other belligerent and to neutral nations.

MANKIND. Persons of the male sex; the human species. The statute of 25 Hen. VIII. c. 6, makes it felony to commit sodomy with mankind or beast. Females as well as males are included under the term mankind. Fortescue 91; Bac. Abr. Sodom.

MANNER. Mode of performing or exercising; method; custom; habitual practice. 159 Ill. 629.

MANNER AND FORM. In Pleading. After traversing any allegation in pleading, it is usual to say, "in manner and form as he has in his declaration in that behalf alleged," which is as much as to include in the traverse not only the mere fact opposed to it, but that in the manner and form in which it is stated by the other party. These words, however, only put in issue the substantial statement of the manner of the fact traversed, and do not extend to the time, place, or other circumstances attending it, if they were not originally material and necessary to be proved as laid. See MODE ET FORMA.

MANNER OF VOTING. The phrase "manner of voting" literally interpreted, applies simply to the act of voting, but by itself, signifies nothing. 85 Ky. 112, 2 S. W. 690.

MANNING. A day's work of a man. Cowel. A summoning to court. Spelman, Gloss.

MANNIRE. To cite any person to appear in court and stand in judgment there. Du Cange.

It differs from bannire, for although both words signify a citation, one is by the adverse party, the other by the judge. Jacob; Du Cange.

MANNOPUS (Lat.). An ancient word, which signifies goods taken in the hands of an apprehended thief.

MANOR (French, manoir). A house, residence, or habitation. It includes not only a dwelling-house, but also lands. See Co. Litt. 58, 108; 2 Rolle, Abr. 121; Merlin, Répert. Manoir; Serg. Land Laws of Penn. 195; 11 H. L. Cas. 88.

Manor is also said to be derived originally either from Lat. manendo, remaining, or from Brit. maer, stones, being the place marked out or inclosed by stones. Webster.

In English Law. A tract of land originally granted by the king to a person of rank, part of which (terra tenementales) was given by the grantee or lord of the manor to his followers. The rest he retained under the name of his demesnes (terra dominicales). That which remained uncultivated was called the lord's waste, and served for public roads, and commons of pasture for the lord and his tenants. The whole fee was called a lordship, or barony, and the court appendant to the manor the court-baron. The tenants, in respect to their relation to this court and to each other were called proes curie; in relation to the tenure of their lands, copyholders (q. v.), as holding by a copy of the record in the lord's court.

Originally a manor was a "highly complex and organized aggregate of corporeal and incorporeal things. It usually involved the lordship over villeins and the right to seize their chattels. It was not a bare tract of land, but a complex made up of land and of a great part of the agricultural capital that worked the land, men and beasts, ploughs and carts, forks and flails." 2 Poll. & M. 143, 148.

The franchise of a manor; i. e. the right to jurisdiction and rents and services of copyholders. Cowel. No new manors were created in England after the prohibition of sub-infeudation by stat. Quia Emptores, in 1290. 1 Washb. R. P. 30.

In American Law. A manor is a tract held of a proprietor by a fee-farm rent in money or in kind, and descending to the oldest son of the proprietor, who in New York was called a patroon. 9 Seld. 291.

MANORIAL COURTS. By the end of Edward I's reign, four main types of local courts were distinguishable, of which the manorial court was one (See FEUDAL COURTS). It has been said that there were two courts in a manor, a court Baron and a court Customary (4 Co. Rep. 26 b), but the distinction is not clearly drawn. From the side of jurisdiction it appears that the manor contained two kinds of jurisdiction—a jurisdiction over freeholders and a jurisdiction over copyholders. The former was a kind of "liberty," the latter was merely an incident to the property absolutely necessary to its management.

The business of the manorial court was petty but varied, more especially when, to the ordinary business of the court Baron and court Customary, there was added the business of a hundred court and a court leet. In the court Baron all kinds of personal actions (where the cause of action did not exceed 40s. in value) could be tried. 1

Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 3rd ed., 64, 180 et seq. See COMMUNAL COURTS; FRANCHISE COURTS; FEUDAL COURTS.

MANQUELLER. In Saxon Law. A murderer.

MANSE. Habitation; farm and land. Spelman, Gloss. Parsonage or vicarage house. Paroch. Antiq. 481; Jacob, Law Dict. So in Scotland. Bell, Dict.

MANSIO. The name given to an ancient measure of land. It was that quantity of land which will support a man and his family. It has also been called, familia, hide. What this amount of land was is a subject of controversy. It is probable that it was a fairly large tract—a tract of about 120 acres. 2 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 3rd ed., 64.

MANSION-HOUSE. Any house of dwelling, in the law of burglary, etc. Co. 3d Inst. 64.

The term "mansion-house," in its common sense, not only includes the dwelling-house, but also all the buildings within the curtilage, as the dairy-house, the cow-house, the stable, etc.; though not under the same roof nor contiguous. Burn, Inst. Burglary, 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 215, 216; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 558; 4 Bla. Com. 225. See 3 S. & R. 199; 4 Strobb. 372; 4 Call 409; 14 M. & W. 181; 4 C. B. 105; 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 783.

MANSLAUGHTER. In Criminal Law. The unlawful killing of another without malice either express or implied. 4 Bla. Com. 190; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 466.

Any unlawful and wilful killing of a human being, without malice, is manslaughter, and thus defined, it includes a negligent killing which is also wilful. 37 Fed. Rep. 875. See 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 737.

The distinction between manslaughter and murder consists in the following. In the former, though the act which occasions the death be unlawful, or likely to be attended with bodily mischief, yet the malice, either express or implied, which is the very essence of murder, is presumed to be wanting in manslaughter; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 218; Foster 290; 5 Cush. 304.

It also differs from murder in this, that there can be no accessories before the fact, there having been no time for premeditation; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 487; 1 Russ. Cr. 485; but see 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 878.

In a recent work, cases of manslaughter are divided into three classes: (1) Where there was an intent to take life and the killing would be murder but for mitigating circumstances. (2) Where death results from unintentionally doing an unlawful act. (3) Where it results from the negligent doing or omission of an act which, though not itself wrongful, was attended by circumstances which endangered life; 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 335.

There is a not uncommon division of manslaughter into two degrees, voluntary and involuntary; and these degrees are distinctly recognized by statute in several states; in other states several distinct degrees of the crime are created by statute; in some as many as four.

Involuntary manslaughter is such as happens without the intention to inflict the injury.

Voluntary manslaughter is such as happens voluntarily or with an intention to produce the injury.

It has been said that the distinction between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter is now obsolete, and unless where the terms are used in statutes defining the crimes, they are not used in indictment, verdict, or sentence. But where the distinction is made by statute, there can be no conviction of involuntary manslaughter on an indictment for voluntary; 1 Whart. Cr. L. § 37. It would seem however that it is incorrect to characterize as obsolete what is literally recognized by statute in several jurisdictions. See supra. It is more accurate to say that the division is purely statutory in its origin, not entering into the common-law definitions.

Homicide may become manslaughter in consequence of provocation; mutual combat; in case of resistance to public officers, etc.; killing in the prosecution of an unlawful or wanton act; or killing in the prosecution of a lawful act improperly performed, or performed without lawful authority.

The provocation which reduces the killing from murder to manslaughter is an answer to the presumption of malice, which the law raises in every case of homicide; it is, therefore, no answer when express malice is proved: 1 Russ. Cr. 440; Foster 132; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 259. And to be available the provocation must have been reasonable and recent; for no words or slight provocation will be sufficient, and if the party has had time to cool, malice will be inferred: Washb. Cr. L. 81; 4 Pa. 264; 2 N. Y. 193; 25 Miss. 383; 3 Gratt. 594; 6 Blackf. 299; 8 Ired. 344; 18 Ala. N. S. 720; 15 Ga. 223; 10 Hunphr. 141; 5 C. & P. 324; 6 How. St. Tr. 789; 17 id. 57; 1 Leach 151; 26 Tex. App. 221, 322; 150 U. S. 62; 114 Ill. 86; it is on the assumption that passion disturbs the sway of reason and makes one regardless of its admonition: 83 Ala. 26. Words alone, however provoking or insulting, will not reduce killing to manslaughter: 98 Mo. 150; 85 Ala. 326; 26 Tex. App. 624; 64 Cal. 369; 116 Mo. 1; 147 Ill. 310. Intent to kill cannot be an element of involuntary manslaughter: 76 Ga. 478. It does not necessarily follow that homicide was not murder because done in sudden passion; 45 La. Ann. 1036.

In case of mutual combat, it is generally manslaughter only, when one of the parties is killed: 4 D. & B. 191; 1 Jones N. C. 280; 2 C. & K. 814. When death ensues from duelling, the rule is different; and such killing is murder.

The killing of an officer by resistance to him while acting under lawful authority is murder: Whart. Cr. L. § 413; but see 57 Conn. 307; but if the officer be acting under a void or illegal authority, or out of his jurisdiction, the killing will be manslaughter, or excusable homicide, according to the circumstances of the case: Washb. Cr. L. 81; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 80, 132; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 458; 84 Ky. 103; 26 Tex. App. 1.

Killing a person while doing an act of mere wantonness is manslaughter: as, if a person throws down stones in a coal-pit, by which a man is killed, although the offender was only a trespasser; Lew. Cr. Cas. 179; MALA PROHIBITA; or where a person in another's charge, too feeble to take care of herself, dies from lack of proper food, nursing, and medical attention, the latter is guilty of manslaughter; [1893] 1 Q. B. 450.

When death ensues from the performance of a lawful act, it may, in consequence of the negligence of the offender, amount to manslaughter. For instance, if the death had been occasioned by negligent driving: 1 East, Pl. Cr. 263; 1 C. & P. 320; 6 id. 129; or by negligently running an engine and thereby causing a collision by which a passenger is killed; 118 Ind. 167. Again, when death ensues from the gross negligence of a medical or a surgical practitioner, it is manslaughter.

It is no crime for any one to administer medicine; but it is a crime to administer it so rashly and carelessly, or with such criminal inattention, as to produce death: Whart. Cr. L. § 346; and in this respect there is no difference between the regular practitioner and the quack: 1 F. & F. 519, 521; 4 C. & P. 440; 1 B. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 46; 8 Wash. 12. And see 6 Mass. 184; 8 C. & P. 632. ADEQUATE CAUSE; HEAT OF PASSION.

MANSTEALING. A word sometimes used synonymously with kidnapping (q. v.). The latter is more technical. 4 Bla. Com. 219.

MANTHOFF. A horse-stealer.

MANTIPULATE. To pick pockets. Bailey.

MANTLE CHILDREN. See LEGITIMATION.

MAN-TRAPS. Engines to catch trespassers, now unlawful, unless set in a dwelling-house for defence between sunset and sunrise. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 81.

MANU BREVI. With a short hand. Shortly; directly; by the shortest course; without circuitry. Burrill; Calv. Lex. Cf. MANU LONGA.

MANU FORTI (Lat. with strong hand). A term used in pleading in cases of forcible entry. No other words are of equal import. It implies greater force than the words vi et armis; 10 Ired. 39; 8 Term 863; 4 Cush. 141; Dane, Abr. c. 182, s. 6, c. 208, s. 12.

MANU LONGA. With a long hand. Indirectly; circuitously. Burrill; Calv. Lex. Cf. MANU BREVI.

MANU OPERA. See MANUS OPERA.

MANUAL. That which is employed or used by the hand, of which a present profit may be made. Things in the manual occupation of the owner cannot be distrained for rent. See TOOLS.

MANUAL GIFT. A giving of movable effects accompanied by real delivery which does not require any formality. La. Civ. Code, art. 1539.

MANUALIS OBEDIENTIA. Sworn obedience or submission upon oath. Cow.

MANUCAPTIO (Lat.). In Old English Practice. A writ which lay for a man taken on suspicion of felony, and the like, who could not be admitted to bail by the sheriff, or others having power to let to mainprise. Fitzh. N. B. 249.

MANUCAPTORES. Mainperners, which see.

MANUFACTORY. A building, the main or principal design or use of which is to be a place for producing articles as products of labor. It is something more than a place where things are made. 57 Pa. 82. A steam flouring mill is a manufactory; 57 Md. 515. See FACTORY.

MANUFACTURE. To make or fabricate raw materials by hand, art, or machinery, and work into forms convenient for use; and, when used as a noun, anything made from raw materials by hand, or by machinery, or by art. 61 Hun 53.

Making fish lines, ropes, etc., from raw material is a manufacture; 36 La. Ann. 96; as is the making of cordage, rope, and twine; 42 id. 723. Cutting ice and storing it in a building is not; 135 Mass. 258.

As to its signification in patent law, see PATENT.

MANUFACTURED ARTICLES. Kindling wood produced by machinery from green slabs of wood, kiln dried and compressed into a bundle, is manufactured. 20 App. Div. 514. India rubber made into shapes suitable for use as shoes is manufactured within the meaning of the tariff act; 7 How. 795; also animal charcoal and bone black; 5 Blatch. 215; coral cut into the form of a cameo but not set; id. 195; reeds; 40 Fed. Rep. 570; shingles; 3 Cliff. 284; gun blocks planed on the sides; 42 Fed. Rep. 292; split timbers; 4 Wall. 408; pieces of wood cut or sawed into size or shape to be put together into boxes; 43 La. Ann. 226; and door sashes, and blinds; 41 La. Ann. 906.

Wool is not a manufactured article under the revised statutes; 20 Blatch. 267; nor are wool tops prepared for spinning and broken up into small fragments; 46 Fed. Rep. 461; nor copper plates turned up and raised at the edges by labor, to fit them for subsequent use in the manufacture of copper vessels; 5 Cra. 284; nor marble cut into blocks for transportation; Hunt. Merch. Mag. 167; nor firewood; 65 Cal. 273.

An article made by hand; an article made, either by hand or by machinery, into a new form, capable of being used, in ordinary life. 7 How. (U. S.) 794.

The application of labor to an article, either by hand or by mechanism, does not make the article necessarily a manufactured article, within the meaning of that term as used in the tariff laws. For example, washing and scouring wool does not make the resulting wool a manufacture of wool; cleaning and ginning cotton does not make the resulting cotton a manufacture of cotton, etc. 121 U. S. 615. MANUFACTURING CORPORATION.

MANUFACTURER. One engaged in the business of working raw materials into wares suitable for use. 63 How. Pr. 458. A cooper; 84 La. Ann. 596; a pork packer; 41 Ohio St. 691; a gas company; 12 Allen 75; 89 N. Y. 409; one who prepares for market and sells lumber which is the growth of his own land; 1 Low. 478; a publisher of a newspaper; 6 Bankr. Reg. 238 (contra, 8 McArthur. 405); are manufacturers. An ice cream confectioner is not; 83 La. Ann. 1075; nor is one engaged in cutting and making coats and trousers out of cloth which is already manufactured by another; 41 id. 894; or a dry-dock company; 92 N. Y. 487; or an aqueduct corporation; 100 Mass. 188; or a mining company; 106 id. 131.

Not, necessarily, one who produces a new article out of materials entirely raw. He is one who gives new shapes, new qualities, new combinations to matter which has already gone through some artificial process. Anderson; 34 La. Ann. 597.

MANUFACTURING. "Manufacturing," as used in the Bankrupt Act of 1898, has no meaning from adjudication as used in former laws, nor has it any technical meaning. In construing the act, the intention of Congress to include corporations engaged in manufacturing will be regarded by giving the term a liberal, rather than a narrow meaning. 216 U. S. 449. See MANUFACTURING CORPORATION.

MANUFACTURING CORPORATION. A corporation engaged in the production of some article, thing or object, by skill or labor, out of raw material, or from matter which has already been subjected to artificial forces, or to which something has been added to change its natural condition. 99 N. Y. 181. The term does not include a mining corporation; 106 Mass. 135; nor one engaged in mixing teas and in roasting, mixing, and grinding coffee; 145 N. Y. 375.

Manufacturing is the process by which the application of labor and skill to materials that exist in the natural state gives to them a new quality and prepares or adapts them for new uses; this is true whether the change is produced by manual labor or by means of machinery. But these tests are not conclusive in determining the scope and meaning of the term "manufacturing corporations." It is proper to consider manufacturing as a product of capital and labor, the investment and operation of a complex system of machinery such as boilers, engines, shafting, b'ling, and such other things as are commonly used in what are known as manufacturing establishments. The product produced by the application of power to machinery and by means of processes wholly artificial may be said to be a manufactured product, and the corporation producing it a manufacturing corporation. 1 Thomp. Corp. 48, 49.

MANUFACTURING PRODUCT. See MANUFACTURING CORPORATION.

MANUMISSION. The act of releasing from the power of another. The act of giving liberty to a slave.

The modern acceptance of the word is the act of giving liberty to slaves. But in the Roman law it was a generic expression, equally applicable to the enfranchisement from the manus, the manicium, the dominica potestas, and the patria potestas. Manumittere signifies to escape from a power, — manus. Originally, the master could only validly manumit his slave when he had the dominium jure quiritium over him; if he held him merely in bonis, the manumission was null, according to the civil law; but by the ius honorarium the slave was permitted to enjoy his liberty de facto, but whatever he acquired belonged to his master. The status of these quasi-slaves was fixed by the Lex Junia Norbana under which they became Latini Juniani, both which titles see. At first there were only three modes of manumission, viz.: 1. vindicta;

MANUS, and, testamentum. The vindicta consisted in a fictitious suit, in which the assertor libertatis, as plaintiff, alleged that the slave was free; the master not denying the claim, the praetor rendered a decision declaring the slave free. In this proceeding figures were used—festuca vindicta, a sort of lance (the symbol of property), with which the assertor libertatis touched the slave when he claimed him as free; hence the expression vindicta manumissio. Census, the second mode, was when the slave was inscribed at the instance of his master, by the censor, in the census as a Roman citizen. Testamentum was when the testator declared in express terms that the slave should be free.—servus meus Cratinus liber esto,—or by a fideicommissum,—heres meus rogo te ut sumum vicini mei servum, manumittas, fideicommitto herediti mei ut tute eum; servum manumittat.

Afterwards, manumission might take place in various other ways; in ecclesiis, of which we have a form: Ex beneficio S. per Joannem piscipum et per Albertum S. Casatum, factus est liber Lemberus, teste hac sancta ecclesia. Per epistolam. Justinian required the letter containing the manumission to be signed by five witnesses. Inter amicos, a declaration made by the master before his friends that he gave liberty to his slave: five witnesses were required, and an act was drawn up in which it was stated that they had heard the declaration. Per codicillum, by a codicil, which required to be signed by five witnesses. There were many other modes of manumission, which were enumerated in a Constitution of Justinian. C. 76, 3-12; 1 Ortolan 35 et seq.; 1 Etienne 78 et seq.; Lagrange 101 et seq.

Direct manumission may be either by deed or will, or any other act of notoriety done with the intention to manumit. A variety of these modes are described as used by ancient nations.

Indirect manumission was either by operation of law, as the removal of a slave to a non-slaveholding state animus mandati, or by implication of law, as where the master by his acts recognized the freedom of his slave.

Manumission being merely the withdrawal of the dominion of the master, in accordance with the principles of the common law the right to manumit existed everywhere, unless forbidden by law. No formal mode or prescribed words were necessary to effect manumission; it could be by parol; and any words were sufficient which evinced a renunciation of dominion on the part of the master; 8 Humphr. 189; 3 Halst. 275. No one but the owner could manumit; 4 J. J. Marsh. 108; 10 Pet. 380; and the effect was to make a freeman, not a citizen. But mere declarations of intention were insufficient unless subsequently carried into effect: Cox 259; 8 Mart. La. 149; 14 Johns. 324; 19 id. 58. Manumission could be made to take effect in future: Cox 4; 2 Root 361. In the meantime the slaves were called statu liberi.

As to the emancipation of slaves in the United States by proclamation of the president, see BOWDOX. See Cobb, Law of Slavery.

MANURE. Manure made upon a farm in the ordinary manner, from the consumption of its products, is a part of the realty; 1 Washb. R. P. 18; 68 Me. 204; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 36, n.; 15 Wend. 169; 13 Gray 58; 11 Conn. 525; 44 N. H. 120; see 38 Fed. Rep. 911. It has been also held to be personally; 4 Dutch. 581; 2 Ired. 326; especially if it be made from hay purchased and brought upon the land by the tenant; 48 N. H. 147; and where a teamster owning a house and stable sold them with a small lot on which they stood, it was held that manure in the stable was personally; 49 N. H. 62. Manure in heaps has been held to be personally; 11 Conn. 525; and where the owner of land gathered manure into heaps and sold it, and then the land, the manure did not pass with the land; 43 Vt. 93; 110 Mass. 94. In 1 Cr. & M. 809, a custom for a tenant to receive compensation for manure left by him on the farm was recognized. Manure dropped in the street belongs originally to the owners of the animals that dropped it, but, if abandoned by them, the first taker has a right to it; 37 Conn. 500; s. c. 9 Am. Rep. 350. See EMBLEMENTS.

MANUS (Lat. hand), anciently, signified the person taking an oath as a compurgator. The use of this word probably came from the party laying his hand on the New Testament.

Manus signifies, among the civilians, power, and is frequently used as synonymous with poteslas. Lec. El. Dr. Rom. § 94. Manus mariti, marital power. Manus injectio, an executory judgment.

MANUS MARRIAGE. A form of Roman marriage in which the husband possessed over his wife the rights called "manus." A wife thus in her husband's manus, obtained the rights of a daughter. (G. I. 115.) The right over children was called "poteslas"; manus lies further away from the characteristics of ownership than the poteslas. The manus was incompatible with the poteslas: a woman that passed into the manus of her husband necessarily ceased to be under the poteslas of her father. A husband, under this form of marriage, acquired all his wife's property, and was responsible for her obligations to the extent of that property. (G. 2, 98.) While she was in manus she could not acquire any property for herself, but only for her husband. She could, however, enjoy that modified and permissive form of ownership granted to slaves and children; namely, the peculium. The husband does not seem to have possessed over his wife in manu, the same powers of chastisement and killing that he had over slaves and children. Nor is there any trace of the actual sale of a wife except by fictitious sale, relieving the wife from the manus of her husband. Hunter, Rom. L. 223, 224.

MANUSCRIPT. An unpublished writing. A writing of any kind as distinguished from any thing that is printed. Cent. Dict. The term does not include pictures and paintings; 3 Cliff. 537.

In every writing the author has a property at common law, which descends to his representative, but is not liable to seizure by creditors so that they can publish it; 1 Bell, Dict. 68; 5 McLean 32. And an unauthorized publication will be restrained in equity; 4 Burr. 3320, 2409; 2 Bro. P. C. 138; 2 Edw. Ch. 329; 2 Mer. 434; 1 Ball & B. 207; 2 Stor. 100. The passage of the copyright acts has not abrogated the common-law rights of an author to his unpublished manuscript, and for a wanton infringement of his rights, exemplary damages may be given; 73 Fed. Rep. 196. Letters are embraced within this principle; for, although the receiver has a qualified property in them, the right to object to their publication remains with the writer. It is held, however, that the receiver may publish them for the purposes of justice publicly administered, or to vindicate his character from an accusation publicly made; 2 V. & B. 19; 2 Stor. 100; 2 Atk. 842; 2 Bush 480; 1 Mart. La. 297; 4 Du. N. Y. 379. The receiver may destroy or give away the letters, as soon as received; 2 Bush 480. The latter proposition has been doubted; see Drone, Copyr. 137. In the United States, the Copyright Act recognizes the right of property in "any manuscript whatever," which includes private letters; 5 McLean 32; and gives a remedy for the unauthorized publication. These rights will be considered as abandoned if the author publishes his manuscripts without securing the copyright under the acts of congress. See Curtis; Copinger; Drone. Copyright; LETTER; PRIVACY; COPYRIGHT.

MANUTENENTIA. A writ which lay against persons for the offence of maintenance. Reg. Orig. 182.

MANY. Denotes multitude, but not majority. 87 Ala. 708.

MAP. A transcript of the region which it portrays, narrowed in compass so as to facilitate an understanding of the original. 8 Minn. 103.

When a deed conveys a lot as indicated on a recorded plat, the latter may be consulted in aid of the description in the deed; 114 Mo. 13. A map in a deed should be treated as a part of the description, when evidently intended to be so treated, though it is not expressly referred to therein; 64 Conn. 78.

Where the owner of land lays it out in lots and streets, and in the map thereof filed with the public records designates certain portions as a park and afterwards conveys lots with reference to such map, it operates as a dedication of the land for a park; 23 Or. 176. The mere recording by public authority of a map of a proposed system of highways does not of itself entitle the owner of the land to damages; 167 U. S. 548; so with reference to the streets on such a map; 44 La. Ann. 931; 95 Ala. 272; 17 R. I. 799; 133 Ind. 831; 33 Fla. 470; but see 67 Hun 546. Maps and surveys are not competent evidence unless their accuracy is shown by other evidence; 1 Black 209; as by the testimony of the surveyors who prepared them; 5 Thomp. & C. 611; but a map of public land, made by a public surveyor and duly certified and filed in a public office under a statute, is admissible for that purpose; 17 Wend. 812; and so are ancient maps to show matters of public and general right; 11 Wall. 395; but an ancient map of partition among private owners is not evidence; 2 Johns. 180.

In an action for the recovery of real estate, a map not dated or signed but shown to have been made in 1818 by a skilful surveyor long since dead, as to which other surveyors testified that they had tested it in their own work and that it was the earliest known survey of the district in question, and which was shown to have related to an actual transaction, was held admissible as an ancient map. Other maps made in 1820 and 1823 by the same surveyor and showing in detail certain of the lots in the vicinity of those in dispute were admissible as showing accuracy of the ancient map. The testimony of other surveyors as to the use of the map in their own work was admissible for the purpose of showing general accuracy of the map and deeds executed shortly after the map was made conveying the tracts described therein were admissible as ancient deeds to show that the map was made in an actual transaction; 44 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 333.

A map or plan of land referred to in making conveyances thereof is evidence to show boundaries or location, or to explain the contract; 64 N. Y. 33; and so in dedicating land to the public; 40 Conn. 410.

Maps showing boundaries are receivable in evidence, if it appears that they were made by persons having adequate knowledge. Anderson; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 139.

MARAUDER. One who, while employed in the army as a soldier, commits a larceny or robbery in the neighborhood of the camp, or while wandering away from the army. Merlín, Rept. See Halleck, Int. Laws; Lieber, Guerrilla Parties.

MARC-BANCO. The name of a coin. The marc-banco of Hamburg, as money of account, at the custom-house, is deemed and taken to be of the value of thirty-five cents. Act of March 3, 1843.

MARCHERS. In Old English Law. Nobles who lived on the Marches, and had their own laws, and power over life and death, as if they were petty princes. Camden; Jacob, Law. Dict. Abolished by stat. 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26, 1 Edw. VI. c. 10, and 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 15. They were also called Lords Marchers (q. v.).

MARCHES. Limits; confines; borders. Especially used of the limits between England and Wales and between England and Scotland. Ersk. Inst. 2. 6. 4.

MARCHET. See MARCHETA

MARCHETA. Maiden rents (q. v.). Ten shillings paid to the lord by every tenant at the marriage of his daughter. (British language called, Gwabr Merched, i. e. a maid's fee.) Jacob.

Anciently a fee given to the lord for omitting the custom of merchet, (q. v.). Jacob, Maiden's Fee. See MERCHET.

MARCHIONESS. See MARQUIS.

MARE. See HORSE.

MARE CLAUSUM. The sea closed. It was formerly contended that a nation could in some cases claim jurisdiction over certain parts of the open sea even beyond the immediate vicinity of its own coast; but the contention has been abandoned. There has been an attempt to extend the principle to certain inland seas not entirely enclosed within the limits of a single state. When Turkey included the shores of the Black Sea, it was mare clausum. But when it lost part of its shore, Russia and other nations became entitled to participate in the commerce of the Black Sea, a right which was recognized by treaty in 1820. The great inland lakes and their outlets fall under the same principal; 16 Hallick. Int. L., Baker's ed. 170. See 1 Kent 37; SEA.

The title of a famous work by Selden, intended as an answer to the Mare Liberum of Grotius. R. & L. Dict. See MARE LIBERUM.

MARE LIBERUM. The sea free. The title of a work by Grotius against the Portuguese claims to an exclusive trade to the Indies through the South Atlantic and Indian oceans. 1 Kent 27.

This work was written to show that all nations have an equal right to use the sea. R. & L. Dict. See MARE CLAUSUM.

MARESCALLUS (fr. Germ. march, horse, and schalch, master. Du Cange). A groom of the stables, who also took care of the diseases of the horse. Du Cange.

An officer of the imperial stable; magister equorum. Du Cange.

A military officer, whose duty it was to keep watch on the enemy, to choose a place of encampment, to arrange or marshal the army in order of battle, and, as master of the horse, to commence the battle. This office was second to that of comes stabuli or constable. Du Cange.

An officer of the court of exchequer. 51 Hen. III. 5.

An officer of a manor, who oversaw the hospitalities (mansionarius). Du Cange: Fleta, lib. 2, 74.

Marescallus aulae. An officer of the royal household, who had charge of the person of the monarch and the peace of the palace. Du Cange.

MARETUM (Lat.). Marshy ground overflowed by the sea or great rivers. Co. Litt. 5.

MARGIN. A sum of money, or its equivalent, placed in the hands of a stock broker, by the principal, or person on whose account the purchase is to be made, as a security to the former against losses to which he may be exposed by a subsequent depression in the market value of the stock. 49 Barb. 462.

A sale on margin is a sale on time, of stock retained as security and not delivered until final payment is made. If the stock falls in value before the time of final payment, the buyer is called upon to advance more margin.

The effect of the contract is that the broker, upon the performance of certain conditions by the customer, will buy and hold a certain number of shares, and in case any advance accrues and is realized by a sale, made under the direction or authority of the customer, he shall enjoy the benefit of it, and in case a loss ensues, the broker having performed the contract on his part, the customer shall bear it; 49 Barb. 464; 66 N. Y. 518.

The circumstances attending ordinary speculations in stocks on a margin are described by Hunt, C. J., in 41 N. Y. 235; and also more fully in Dos Passos, Stock Brokers 102.

Stock purchased on a margin instantly becomes the property of the customer, with all future dividends and earnings, and the client is entitled to the possession of it upon paying the purchase money with commissions; 41 N. Y. 235, 247, 257, 258; 53 id. 211, 216. It was settled in New York by the leading case of Markham v. Jaudam that a purchase of stock on margin by brokers to be carried for the customer in their own name and with their own funds, creates the legal relation of pledgor and pledgee, and that a sale, not judicial, or upon notice and demand for payment of advances and commissions is a wrongful conversion; 41 N. Y. 23. This doctrine was finally distinctly reaffirmed in New York; 81 N. Y. 25; and in other states; 25 Md. 242, 269; 48 Cal. 99; 5 Pa. 41; 71 id. 76; and apparently in England; 5 Bligh N. s. 183, affirming 3 Sim. 153. See Dos Passos, Stock Brokers 112, where many other cases are cited. The pledgee is not liable for neglect to sell the stock where it depreciates in his hands or even becomes worthless, if he has not been requested to sell or refused to transfer the stock for that purpose; 87 Pa. 394; 98 Mass. 133; nor is he liable if the pledge be stolen without negligence on his part; 58 How. Pr. 68; and a stock broker is not liable where spurious securities are purchased for a customer in the regular course of business, and if he sells such and in consequence refunds the purchase money, he can recover it from his customer; 15 M. & W. 308, 498; 8 C. B. 373. It thus appears that one purchasing stock on a margin is in all essential parts the owner of the stock, entitled to the advantages and subject to the responsibilities of that relation.

The provision of the California constitution invalidating contracts for the sale of futures is held to apply to a sale of stock on margin; 89 Cal. 373. See FUTURES; TOWN RECORD.

Of Railroad. A deed made to a railroad company to land adjoining its right of way, where there is a cut, calling for the "margin of the railroad" means the top of the cut, and not the base of it. 108 S. W. 858.

MARGINAL NOTE. An abstract of a reported case; a summary of the facts, or brief statement of the principle decided which is prefixed to the report of the case.

The marginal notes which appear in the statute books have not the authority of the legislature, and cannot alter the interpretation of the text; L. R. 3 C. P. 522; 22 Ch. D. 573.

In Scotch Law. A note inserted on the margin of a deed embodying either some clause which was omitted in transcribing or some change in the agreement of the parties. Bell; Ersk. Prin. 274.

MARINARIUS (L. Lat.). An ancient word which signified a mariner or seaman. In England, marinarius capitaneus was the admiral or warden of the ports.

MARINE. Belonging to the sea; relating to the sea; naval.

A soldier employed, or liable to be employed, on vessels of war, under the command of an officer of marines, who act under the direction of the commander of the ship. See MARINE CORPS.

It is also used as a general term to denote the whole naval power of a state or country.

MARINE CONTRACT. One which relates to business done or transacted upon the sea and in seaports, and over which the courts of admiralty have jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of common law. See Parsons, Marit. Law; 2 Gall. 398; MARITIME CONTRACT.

MARINE CORPS. A body of officers and soldiers under an organization separate and distinct from that of the army, and intended for service, in detached portions, on board of ships of war.

A military body primarily, belonging to the navy under the control of the secretary of the navy, but liable to be ordered to service in connection with the army. 120 U. S. 249.

MARINE COURT OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK. A local court originally established for the determination of controversies between seamen, but now a court of record, possessing general jurisdiction of controversies involving not more than $2,000, and special jurisdiction of civil actions for injuries to person or character, without regard to the amount of damages claimed. Rap. & L. Law Dict.

The name of this court was changed to city court by Laws 1888, ch. 26. See NEW YORK.

MARINE INSURANCE. See HULL AND MACHINERY; INSURANCE.

MARINE INTEREST. A compensation paid for the use of money loaned on bottomry or respondentia. Provided the money be loaned and put at risk, there is no fixed limit to the rate which may be lawfully charged by the lender; but courts of admiralty, in enforcing the contract, will mitigate the rate when it is extortionate and unconscionable. See BOTTOMRY; MARITIME LOAN; RESPONDENTIA.

MARINE LEAGUE. A measure equal to the twentieth part of a degree of latitude. Boucher, Inst. n. 1845. It is generally conceded that a nation has exclusive territorial jurisdiction upon the high seas for a marine league from its own shores. 1 Kent 29. See The Franconia, 2 Ex. Div. 68; TERRITORIAL WATERS; SEA.

MARINE RISK. See INSURANCE; RISKS AND PERILS.

MARINE TORTS. See MARITIME TORTS.

MARINER. One whose occupation it is to navigate vessels upon the sea. Surgeons, engineers, clerks, stewards, cooks, porters, and chambermaids, on passenger-steamers, when necessary for the service of the ship or crew, are also deemed mariners, and permitted as such to sue in the admiralty courts for their wages. 1 Conkl. Adm. 107. See Gilp, 505; 80 N. Y. 71; 1 Hagg. Adm. 187.

The term includes masters, mates, sailors, surveyors, carpenters, coopers, stewards, cooks, cabin boys, kitchen boys, engineers, pilots, firemen, deck hands, and waiters—women as well as men. Bened. Adm. § 278. Those employed upon a vessel in any capacity, however humble, and whose labor contributes in any degree, however slight, to the accomplishment of the main object in which the vessel is engaged, are clothed by the law with the legal rights of mariners, "no matter what be their sex, character, station, or profession." 77 Fed. Rep. 476 (C. C. of A.). See 7 How. 80; 3 Sumn. 115; 80 N. Y. 80; SEAMEN; LIEN; SHIPPING ARTICLES.

MARISCHAL. An officer in Scotland, who, with the lord high constable, possessed a supreme itinerant jurisdiction in all crimes committed within a certain space of the court, wherever it might happen to be. Wharton.

MARITAGIO AMISSO PER DEFALTAM. An obsolete writ for the tenant in frank marriage to recover lands, etc., of which he was deforced.

MARITAGIUM (Lat.). A portion given with a daughter in marriage. See FEUDAL LAW.

MARITAGIUM HABERE. To have the free disposal of an heiress in marriage.

MARITAL. That which belongs to marriage; as marital rights, marital duties. See HUSBAND; MARRIED WOMAN.

MARITAL PORTION. The name given to that part of a deceased husband's estate to which the widow is entitled. 3 Mart. La. n. s. 1.

MARITIMA ANGLIÆ. Profits and emoluments received by the king from the sea. They were anciently collected by sheriffs but were afterwards granted to the Lord High Admiral; Par. 8 Hen. III. m. 4.

MARITIMA INCREMENTA. Lands gained from the sea. See ALLUVION.

MARITIME. Pertaining to navigation or commercial intercourse upon the seas, great lakes, and rivers.

"The word maritime is also to have its appropriate meaning relating to the sea. The words admiralty and maritime, as they are used in the constitution and acts of congress, are by no means synonymous, although able lawyers, on the bench, as well as at the bar, seem sometimes to have so considered them. They were evidently both inserted to preclude a narrower construction which might be given to either word, had it been used alone. The English admiralty had jurisdiction of all cases arising beyond sea, although not maritime in their character. These are excluded by the use of both terms." Bened. Adm. § 40.

Maritime pertains primarily to things bordering on the sea, as distinguished from marine, which applies to things of or pertaining to the sea. Anderson.

MARITIME BELT. That part of the sea which, in contradistinction to the open sea, is under the sway of the riparian States, which can exclusively reserve the fishery within their respective maritime belts for their own citizens, whether fish, or pearls, or amber, or other products of the sea. 202 U. S. 52; 139 U. S. 240; 94 U. S. 391.

MARITIME CAUSE. A cause arising from a maritime contract, whether made at sea or on land.

In all cases of contract the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts depends upon the nature or subject-matter of the contract; but in cases of maritime tort and salvage their jurisdiction depends upon the place in which the cause of action accrued; 1 Conkl. Adm. 19, 32. In general, the courts of common law have a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of admiralty in those cases which are prosecuted on the instance side of the court. But the admiralty also has jurisdiction of prize cases, and that jurisdiction is exclusive, except where affected by special statutes; 6 Wall. 759. See PRIZE COURTS. The jurisdiction of the district courts in civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is exclusive of all others; nor can a state legislature confer jurisdiction upon a state court; 4 Wall. 411; 7 id. 624.

The admiralty jurisdiction has been held not to extend to preliminary contracts, merely leading to the execution of maritime contracts; 3 Mas. 6; 3 Sumn. 144; nor to trusts, although they may relate to maritime affairs; Davis 71; nor to enforcing a specific performance of a contract relating to maritime affairs; nor to a contract not maritime in its character, although the consideration for it may be maritime services; 4 Mas. 360; nor to questions of possession and property between owner and mortgagee; 17 How. 399; nor to contracts of affreightment from one port of the great lakes to another port in the same state; 21 How. 244. In the following cases (cited in Bened. Adm. § 214 a) actions have been sustained in admiralty: On an insurance policy; 10 Wall. 1; against an owner of cargo in general average; 12 id. 341; for weighing, inspecting, and measuring cargo; 2 Fed. Rep. 731; for cooping cargo; 18 id. 703; for compressing cargo; 28 id. 927; for the services of a watchman; 7 id. 235; a diver; 28 id. 429; an average adjuster; 7 id. 236; for the use of a dry dock; 12 id. 207; for removing ballast; 2 id. 722; for lockage in a river; 1 id. 218; for wharfage; 95 U. S. 75; for insurance premiums; 40 Fed. Rep. 603; for launching a vessel which had been driven ashore; 5 Hughes 125; for repairing a scow; 8 Fed. Rep. 207; on a contract to supply nets to a fishing vessel; 33 id. 297; for the charter of a vessel yet to be built; 44 id. 102; for services as watchman; 32 id. 800; actions to try the title to a ship; Bened. Adm. § 276; but not to enforce a merely equitable title; 185 U. S. 599.

The following cases are cited by the same author as not being within the maritime jurisdiction: For storage of sails; 2 Fed. Rep. 393 (contra, 2 Gall. 488); for services of a ship broker; 10 Fed. Rep. 848; for wharfage while laid up in the winter; 28 id. 429; for receiving and storing cargo on board a vessel during the winter; 35 id. 383; for obtaining a concession to dig guano; 15 id. 385; for lease of a "bar" on board a vessel; 2 Flipp. 427; on a contract to navigate a raft; 1 id. 543; a contract to store wheat for the winter; 33 Fed. Rep. 388; a contract by a master to carry cargo, sell it, and account for the proceeds; 87 id. 369; for services in purchasing a vessel; 39 id. 40.

As to passengers, it has been a question whether contracts for their transportation were within the jurisdiction; Glip. 184; but the contrary view is now established; 4 Wall. 411.

Stevedores were formerly not considered as rendering marine services, but the contrary view appears now to obtain; Bened. Adm. § 285; 87 Fed. Rep. 209, 367; 51 id. 954.

As to jurisdiction over foreign ships, all persons in time of peace have the right to resort to the tribunals of the nation where they may happen to be, for the protection of their rights, unless the jurisdiction is excluded by treaty, though sometimes, as in the case of foreign seamen, they will refuse, from considerations of expediency, to exercise their jurisdiction; Bened. Adm. § 283; thus, admiralty jurisdiction does not apply to claims of bad treatment suffered by an American serving as a seaman on a Norwegian vessel; 55 Fed. Rep. 80.

As to the jurisdiction of the Lord High Admiral of England, see "A Water Court," 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 142, by Sir S. Baker; another article on "The Water Court of Saltaash"; 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 195.

MARITIME CODES. See CODE. Much learning in relation thereto and certain lesser maritime codes not referred to under that title will be found in Bened. Adm. ch. xi.

MARITIME CONTRACT. One which relates to the business of navigation upon the sea, or to business appertaining to commerce or navigation to be transacted or done upon the sea, or in sea-ports, and over which courts of admiralty have jurisdiction concurrent with the courts of common law.

Such contracts, according to civilians and jurists, include, among others, charter-parties, bills of lading, and other contracts of affreightment, marine hypothecations, contracts for maritime service in building, repairing, supplying, and navigating ships or vessels, contracts and quasi contracts respecting averages, contributions, and jettisons. See 2 Gall. 398, in which Judge Story gave a very elaborate opinion on the subject; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 182. See 3 Mas. 27; 2 Story 176; 2 Curt. C. C. 322; 7 How. 729.

The contract for building a vessel is not a maritime contract; 20 How. 393; 7 Am. Law Reg. 5; 22 How. 129; contra, 21 Law Rep. 281.

The fact that contracts of affreightment are personal contracts between the shipper and ship owner does not prevent them from being maritime contracts on which a libel in rem against the ship may be maintained; 61 Fed. Rep. 213; 61 id. 860. See MARITIME CAUSE.

MARITIME COURT. See ADMIRALTY.

MARITIME INTEREST. See MARINE INTEREST.

MARITIME LAW. That system of law which particularly relates to the affairs and business of the sea, to ships, their crews and navigation, and to the marine conveyance of persons and property.

Whilst the general maritime law is the basis of the maritime law of the United States, as well as of other countries, it is only so far operative in this, or any country, as it is adopted by the laws and usages thereof. It has no inherent force of its own. 21 Wall. 558.

In particular matters, especially such as approach a merely municipal character, the received maritime law may differ in different countries without affecting the integrity of the system as a harmonious whole.

The general system of maritime law which was familiar to the lawyers and statesmen of this country when the constitution was adopted, was intended, and referred to, when it was declared in that instrument that the judicial power of the United States shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."

Thus adopted, it became the maritime law of the United States, operating uniformly in the whole country.

The question as to the true limits of maritime law and admiralty jurisdiction is exclusively a judicial question, and no state law or act of congress can make it broader or narrower than the judicial power may determine those limits to be. But what the law is within those limits, assuming the general maritime law to be the basis of the system, depends on what has been received as law in the maritime usages of this country, and on such legislation as may have been competent to effect it.

The decisions of this court illustrative of these sources, and giving construction to the laws and constitution, are especially to be considered; and when these fail us, we must resort to the principles by which they have been governed.

In Bened. Adm. § 214 a it is said:—The maritime law is a law common to all nations which are engaged in maritime commerce; it consists of certain principles of equity and usages of trade which general convenience and a common sense of justice have established in all the commercial countries of the world, to regulate the dealing and intercourse of merchants and mariners, in matters relating to the sea.

"This maritime law does not in the least depend upon the court in which it is to be administered, but furnishes the proper rule of decision in cases to which it applies, no matter in what court they may be brought; and it has, in fact, been administered in different countries, in different courts, each constituted in its own manner. In England, the court of admiralty and the court of chancery especially enforced it, while truth was required in pleading; but when, by the use of a fictitious venue, the facts might be laid as occurring in London, the king's bench took jurisdiction and prohibited the admiralty; and thus, in the king's bench more than in the court of admiralty, and especially under Lord Mansfield, the maritime law was built up and extended." Bened. Adm. § 42.

"The jurisdiction of the admiralty, and the administration of the admiralty law proper—the local maritime law,—as it became a judicial function, has thus passed into the hands of the courts, and they now administer the admiralty law and the maritime law, both of which are sometimes called the admiralty law, sometimes the maritime law, and sometimes the admiralty and maritime law; and cases arising under them are cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." Bened. Adm. § 43. See 2 Gall. 398.

The law of limited liability was enacted by congress as a part of the maritime law of the United States, and, in its operation, extends wherever public navigation extends; 130 U. S. 527; the act of congress of 1890, § 4, extending the limited liability act to vessels used on a river in inland navigation, is a constitutional and valid law; 141 U. S. 1. See ABANDONMENT. See ADMIRALTY; MARITIME CAUSE, and the various titles in regard to which information is sought.

MARITIME LIEN. See LIEN.

MARITIME LOAN. A contract or agreement by which one, who is the lender, lends to another, who is the borrower, a certain sum of money, upon condition that if the thing upon which the loan has been made should be lost by any peril of the sea, or vis major, the lender shall not be repaid unless what remains shall be equal to the sum borrowed; and if the thing arrive in safety, or in case it shall not have been injured but by its own defects or the fault of the master or mariners, the borrower shall be bound to return the sum borrowed, together with a certain sum agreed upon as the price of the hazard incurred. Emerigon, Mar. Loans, c. 1, s. 2. See BOTTOMRY; MARINE INTEREST; RESPONDENTIA.

MARITIME PROFIT. A term used by French writers to signify any profit derived from a maritime loan.

MARITIME SERVICE. A service rendered upon water in connection with some vessel, the preservation of her cargo or crew. 16 Fed. Rep. 934.

MARITIME TORT. A tort which by reason of the place where it is committed is within the jurisdiction of admiralty.

A tort committed upon water and which comes within the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty. 17 Fed. Rep. 837.

Admiralty courts have always had jurisdiction of torts committed upon the high seas, and there is also no question as to injuries upon waters of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows, but in the United States, where that is not the test, the jurisdiction would extend to any waters which for other purposes are held to be within the general admiralty jurisdiction. Civil jurisdiction of torts has been said to depend solely upon the place where the cause of action arises; 66 U. S. 574; but a doubt is suggested whether it does not also "depend upon the relation of the parties to a ship or vessel, embracing only those tortious violations of maritime right and duty which occur in vessels, to which the admiralty jurisdiction in cases of contract applies." Bened. Adm. § 308 and cases cited. This maritime jurisdiction of civil injuries has been held to extend to all cases of personal injuries committed by the master or his officers against passengers or seamen; id. § 309. The jurisdiction has been held not to survive the death of the person injured even if aided by a state statute enabling an administrator to sue for such injuries in ordinary cases; Sprague 184. It was held by the supreme court that no action would lie for the death of a person killed by a marine tort; 119 U. S. 199, where the decisions are collected. In that case the question whether an action in rem would lie was left undetermined. A personal action in such case has been maintained against the owner at common law; 77 N. Y. 546; and also in admiralty; 55 Fed. Rep. 98. Every violent dispossession of property at sea is prima facie a maritime tort; 1 Wheat. 236. An injury to a vessel from negligence in operating a drawbridge is a maritime tort, and a suit in admiralty will lie against the town therefor; 60 Fed. Rep. 560; 45 id. 260; 27 id. 230; 38 id. 202. In actions for torts arising from negligence courts of admiralty do not confine themselves within the limits of mere municipal law, but deal with the question of damage upon enlarged principles of equity and justice, to the extent of dividing the damages in cases of mutual fault; 60 Fed. Rep. 560, 578; 137 U. S. 1. See MARITIME CAUSE.

MARITUS. A husband; a married man.

MARK. A sign, traced on paper or parchment, which stands in the place of a signature; usually made by persons who cannot write. The use of the mark in ancient times was not confined to illiterate persons; among the Saxons the mark of the cross, as an attestation of the good faith of the person signing, was required to be attached to the signature of those who could write, as well as to stand in the place of the signature of those who could not write. It was the symbol of an oath. It is most often the sign of the cross, made in a little space left between the Christian name and surname; 2 Bla. Com. 305; 13 Pet. 150; 2 Ves. Sen. 456; 1 V. & B. 862. The word his is usually written above the mark, and the word mark below it; Schoull. Wills 303, 305. But it is not essential that these words should be attached to the mark made or adopted by a person unable to write, in the execution of a deed, as it is sufficient if it appears that he in fact made the mark or adopted it; 96 N. C. 13. A mark is a signature; 12 Pet. 151; 47 N. H. 205; 98 N. C. 624; 182 Mass. 105. And it may be proved as handwriting; by one who has seen the person make his mark; 17 Ala. 708; 8 Humph. 47; 5 Johns. 144; contra, 17 Pa. 159. A mark is now held to be a good signature though the party was able to write; 8 Ad. & E. 94; 8 Curt. 753; 5

Johns. 144; 3 Bradf. Surr. 385; 34 Pa. 502; 19 Mo. 609; 18 Ga. 896; 16 B. Monr. 108; 1 Jarm. Wills 69, 112; 1 Will. Exec. 63. The signature of a subscribing witness to a deed may be made by a cross mark; 102 N. C. 384.

It is not necessary in the execution of a note, that the person executing, if unable to write, touch the pen while the person authorized signs his name; 35 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 925. See SIGNATURE.

The sign, writing, or ticket put upon manufactured goods to distinguish them from others; 3 B. & C. 541; 2 V. & B. 218; also to indicate the price; and if one use the mark of another to do him damage, an action on the case will lie, or an injunction may be had from chancery; 2 Cro. 47. This mark may consist of the name of the manufacturer, printed, branded, or stamped in a mode peculiar to itself, or a seal, a letter, a cipher, a monogram, or any sign or symbol, to so distinguish it as his product; 31 Fed. Rep. 280. See TRADE-MARKS; UNION LABEL LAWS.

By the act of July 8, 1870, patentees are required to mark patented articles with the word patented and the day and year when the patent was granted, and in any suit for infringement by the party failing so to mark, no damages can be recovered by the plaintiff, except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement, and continued, after such notice, to make, use, or vend the article patented.

Marks and brands are admissible in evidence to prove ownership of animals, whether recorded or not, unless prohibited by statute; 26 Tex. App. 466.

MARK (spelled, also, Marc). A weight used in several parts of Europe, and for several commodities, especially gold and silver. When gold and silver are sold by the mark, it is divided into twenty-four carats. A money of accounts in England, and in some other countries a coin. The English mark is two-thirds of a pound sterling, or 13s. 4d.; and the Scotch mark is of equal value in Scotch money of account. Encyc. Amer.

MARK. The portion of territory occupied by the community of kindred cultivators was termed in German muniments the "mark." It signified something marked out and defined, and having settled boundaries. The mark might be located either in the forest or in the plain; and its borderland consisted either of wood or waste. It was divided into three parts,—the village, the arable lands, and the common waste lands. In the center of the mark was situated the village in which dwelt the markmen. The possession of a homestead was evidence of the fact that its possessor was a fully qualified member of the mark, and as such entitled to a full share in the enjoyment of the arable, the pasture, the meadow, and waste lands belonging to the community. In the fields under cultivation in any given year, every householder had allotted to him his equal share which he cultivated separately by his own labor, with sons and slaves. But he was required to cultivate according to fixed rules. The woods, pastures, and meadows embraced within the mark were undivided, and enjoyed in common, and, originally, without restriction. Taylor, Jurispr. 199. See MARK MOOT.

MARK MOOT. That place where all the business was transacted that arose out of the German system of common cultivation, and out of the enjoyment of common rights. The annual allotment of the arable lands, the rotation of crops, the choice of the meadow, the admission of a new member into the mark (g. w.), were all questions determined in the mark moot. Taylor, Jurispr. 200. See MARK.

MARKET. A public place and appointed time for buying and selling. A public place, appointed by public authority, where all sorts of things necessary for the subsistence or for the convenience of life are sold. All fairs are markets, but not vice versa; Bract. 1. 2. c. 21; Co. Litt. 23;

Co. 2d Inst. 401; Co. 4th Inst. 272. Markets are generally regulated by local laws. A city may establish public markets and confine the sale of commodities therein, where the regulations are reasonable and in consideration of public health; 84 Ala. 17; 17 Wend. 265; 44 La. Ann. 809; 11 Ia. 407; 6 H. & S. 269. See 38 Ga. 239; and ordinances are valid, prohibiting sales in markets by non-producers without license; 11 Pick. 168; 9 Metc. 253; requiring a small fee for stalls; 10 Ohio 257; prohibiting produce wagons from standing within the limits of a market; 109 Mass. 353; or the keeping a private market within six squares of a public market (where the ordinance was authorized by statute); 41 La. Ann. 887; 139 U. S. 621; and prohibiting the sale of specified provisions except at a public market; 80 Ala. 540; 76 Tex. 559; 44 Mo. 549; 10 Wend. 100; 8 Johns. 418; 106 N. C. 664; 11 Mich. 347; 63 Ga. 613. See 24 L. R. A. 584, n.

The franchise by which a town holds a market, which can only be by royal grant or immemorial usage.

By the term market is also understood the demand there is for any particular article: as, the cotton market in Europe is dull. See 15 Viner. Abr. 41; Comyns, Dig. Market; MARKET STALLS.

See RIGGING THE MARKET.

MARKET OVERT. An open or public market; that is, a place appointed by law or custom for the sale of goods and chattels at stated times in public. "An open, public, and legally constituted market." Jervis, C. J., 9 J. Scott 601; 18 C. B. 599. As to what is a legally constituted market overt, see 5 C. B. n. s. 299. In 5 B. & S. 318, the doctrine of market overt was much discussed by Cockburn, C. J., and the opinion expressed that a sale could not be considered as made in market overt, "unless the goods were exposed in the market for sale, and the whole transaction begun, continued, and completed in the open market; so as to give the fullest opportunity to the man whose goods have been taken to make pursuit of them, and prevent their being sold."

The market-place is the only market overt out of London, but in London every shop is a market overt; 6 Co. 83; F. Moore 300. Where a sale took place in a showroom above a store, access to which was only obtainable by special permission, it was not a sale in market overt; [1892] 1 Q. B. 25. In London, every day except Sunday is market-day. In the country, particular days are fixed for market-days by charter or prescription; 2 Bla. Com. 449.

All contracts for any thing vendible, made in market overt, shall be binding; and sales pass the property, though stolen, if it be an open and proper place for the kind of goods, there be an actual sale for valuable consideration, no notice of wrongful possession, no collusion, parties able to contract, a contract originally and wholly in the market overt, toll be paid, if requisite, by statute, and the contract be made between sun and sun; 5 Co. 83 b. But sale in market overt does not bind the king, though it does infants, etc.; Co. 2d Inst. 713; 3 Bla. Com. 449; Comyns, Dig. Market (E); Bacon, Abr. Fairs and Markets (E); 5 B. & Ald. 624. A sale by sample is not a sale in market overt; 5 B. & S. 318; but a sale to a shop-keeper in London is; 11 Ad. & E. 326; but see 5 B. & S. 318. Under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 100, upon the conviction of a thief, at the prosecution of a person from whom he has stolen goods, summary restitution of the stolen goods is provided for. The English Sale of Goods Act, 1893, provides that a bona fide buyer in market overt acquires a good title, but horses are excepted from the act.

There is no law recognizing the effect of a sale in market overt in the United States; 5 S. & R. 180; 1 Johns. 480; 32 N. H. 158; 59 Ma. 111; 3 Mass. 531; 6 Ohio 206; 1 Tyl. 341; 10 Pet. 161; 2 Kent 324; 2 Tud. Lead. Cas. 784, where the subject is fully treated.

MARKET PRICE. When referring to the value of an article at the place of exportation, it means the price at which such articles are sold and purchased, clear of every charge, but such as is laid upon it at the time of sale. 2 Wash. C. C. 499.

MARKET QUOTATIONS, PROPERTY RIGHT IN. A board of trade has a property right in the quotations made upon the transactions of its exchange, as prepared by its officers and agents until their publication. 103 Fed. 902. The furnishing by a board of trade of market quotations, made upon the transactions of its exchange, to customers for the exclusive use, either by means of a ticker, or by placing them on a blackboard in the customer's office, is not such a publication as deprives the board of its right therein. 109 Fed. 705.

MARKET STALLS. The right acquired by a purchaser of a market stall is in the nature of an easement in, not a title to, a freehold in the land, and such right or easement is limited in duration to the existence of the market, and is to be understood as acquired subject to such changes and modifications in the market during its existence, as the public needs may require. The purchase confers an exclusive right to occupy the particular stalls, with their appendages, for the purposes of the market, and none other, and subject to the regulation of the market. So held in a case in 2 Md. Law Rep. 81, a case of a public market in Baltimore. In 83 Pa. 202, the court refused to enjoin the city of Philadelphia from demolishing the old market house with a view to building a new one on other property. See, also, 18 Ohio 568; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 9.

MARKET VALUE. A price established by public sales, or sales in the way of ordinary business, as of merchandise. 99 Mass. 348; 69 N. Y. 448.

The market value is to be determined by the general market value of goods without regard to special advantages which the importer may enjoy; and in ascertaining that value, it is proper in some instances to consider the cost of production, including such items of expense as designs, salary of buyer, clerk hire, rent, interest, and percentage on the aggregate cost of the business in tariff law cases; 155 U. S. 240.

MARKETABLE TITLE. A title which a reasonable purchaser, well informed as to the facts and their legal bearings, willing and anxious to perform his contract, would, in the exercise of that prudence which business men ordinarily bring to bear in such transactions, be willing and ought to accept; and which one is entitled to have. 128 N. Y. 636. A title by adverse possession for forty years is a marketable title; 188 Ind. 108. In equity a marketable title is one in which there is no doubt involved, either as law or fact; 158 Pa. 494. See TITLE.

MARKSMAN. A person who cannot write, and only makes his mark in executing instruments.

MARLBOROUGH, STATUTE OF. An important English statute, 53 Hen. III. (1267), relating to wrongful distress. It derived its name from the town in Wiltshire in which parliament sat when it was enacted, now known as Marlborough. See 6 Chitty, Eng. Stat.; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 62; Crabb, Com. Law 156; 1 Soc. Eng. 410.

MARQUE AND REPRISAL. See LETTERS OF MARQUE.

MARQUESS. See MARQUIS.

MARQUIS. A title of nobility. In England the rank of a marquis is below that of a duke and above an earl. It is also a title of dignity in France, Italy, and Germany.

The title dates from 1386. The wife of a marquis is formally styled marchioness, but is informally known as "Lady"; and his sons (other than the eldest son, who takes by courtesy the next lower title—usually an earldom—of the family) are by courtesy entitled to the prefix of "lord," while his daughters are entitled in like manner to the prefix of "lady." During his life the eldest son of his eldest son bears by courtesy the title of the family next in rank after that used by the eldest son. Byrnc.

MARRIAGE. A contract made in due form of law, by which a man and woman reciprocally engage to live with each other during their joint lives, and to discharge towards each other the duties imposed by law on the relation of husband and wife. For the laws of the Hebrews and Romans and the canon or ecclesiastical law of the Middle Ages on the subject of marriage, see Fulton's Laws of Marriage.

Marriage, in our law, as distinguished from the agreement to marry and from the act of becoming married, is the civil status of one man and one woman united in law for life, for the discharge to each other and the community of the duties legally incumbent on those whose association is founded on the distinction of sex. 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 3.

It does not mean a mere temporary agreement to dwell together for a time for the gratification of sexual desires, but it is essential that the contract be entered into with a view to its continuance through life and then be followed by celebration and cohabitation, with the apparent object of continuing such cohabitation through life; 50 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 155.

The better opinion appears to be that marriage is something more than a mere civil contract. It has been variously said by different writers to be a status, or a relation, or an institution. This view is supported by the following: Story, Conf. Laws § 108 n.; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 12; 1 R. I. 87; 9 Ind. 37; 3 P. D. 1; s. c. 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 80; 4 P. D. 1; 5 id. 94; 5 Law Mag. & Rev. 4 ser. 26. But see contra, 22 S. E. Rep. 178. In New York it has been held to be merely a civil contract; 7 Abb. N. C. 98. Marriage is not a contract within the federal constitutional provision as to impairment of contracts; 125 U. S. 190.

All persons are able to contract marriage unless they are under the legal age, or unless there be other disability. The age of consent at common law is fourteen in males and twelve in females; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 236; 2 Kent 78; 1 N. Chipm. 254; 10 Humphr. 61; 1 Gray 119; 55 Ala. 111. This is still the rule in the older states; but in Ohio, Indiana, and other western states, the age of consent is raised to eighteen for males, and fourteen for females; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 24. When a person under the age marries, such person can, when either he or she arrives at lawful age, avoid the marriage, or such person or both may, if the other is of legal age, confirm it. It has been held that the one who is of legal age may also disaffirm the marriage; Co. Litt. 79; East, P. C. 468; but see 15 Mich. 193. The disaffirmance may be either with or without a judicial sentence; 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 150. If either of the parties is under seven, the marriage is void; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 436; 5 Ired. Eq. 487. As to the age for contracting marriage in different countries, see 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. App.

If either party is non compos mentis, or insane, the marriage is void. See INSANITY.

If either party has a husband or wife living the marriage is void; 4 Johns. 53; 22 Ala. N. S. 86; 1 Salk. 120; 1 Bla. Com. 438; 45 La. Ann. 419; although the woman may have thought her first husband was dead; 124 Pa. 646. See 40 La. Ann. 10; 156 Mass. 578; INTENTION.

A man may contract marriage before entry of a decree declaring his former marriage to have been void; 36 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 11. See NULLITY OF MARRIAGE.

Consanguinity and affinity within the rules prescribed by law in this country render a marriage void. In England they rendered the marriage liable to be annulled by the ecclesiastical courts; 10 Metc. 451;

2 Bla. Com. 484. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

If either party acts under compulsion, or is under duress, the marriage is voidable; 2 Hagg. Cons. 104, 246; 75 Hun 56; 12 P. & D. 21; [1891] P. 369. Where one of the parties answers "no" to every question of the magistrate which should have been answered "yes," and thereafter refused to cohabit with the man, the marriage is not valid; 78 Mich. 183.

The parties must each be willing to marry the other. Where a woman silently withholds her consent to a formal marriage, but subsequently treats it as a good marriage, she is estopped from saying it was not real and binding on her; 69 Hun 146. Where one of the parties is mistaken in the person of the other, the requisite of consent is wanting. But a mistake in the qualities or character of the other party will not avoid the marriage; Poynt. Marr. & D. c. 9. If a man marries the woman he intends to marry, the marriage is valid, though she passes under an assumed name; 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 204; 3 Curt. Ec. 185; see Burke's Trials 63.

If the apparent willingness is produced by fraud, the marriage will be valid till set aside by a court of chancery or by a decree of divorce; 5 Paige, Ch. 48. See 94 Mich. 559; 6 Misc. Rep. 355. A ceremony of marriage without license and performed by an unauthorized person, and imposed on a woman by false pretences, but believed by her to be lawful and bona fide, is valid for all civil purposes, unless and until avoided by the deceived person; 94 Ala. 501. Fraud is sometimes said to render a marriage void; but this is incorrect, as it is competent for the party injured to waive the tort and affirm the marriage. Impotency in one of the parties is sometimes laid down as rendering the marriage void, as being a species of fraud on the other party; but it is only a ground for annulling the contract by a court, or for a divorce. Schoul. Husb. & W. § 32.

A prohibition, imposed by the laws of a state against a subsequent marriage by a husband against whom a decree of divorce has been rendered, can have no extra-territorial effect; and therefore such person may contract a subsequent marriage in another state where the law imposes no such prohibition; 83 Ala. 528; but at his death the second wife is not entitled to letters of administration on his estate, in the state which imposed the prohibition against his re-marriage; 89 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 16.

Dr. Wharton (Conf. Laws) gives three distinct theories as to the law which is to determine the question of matrimonial capacity.

It is determined by the law of the place of solemnization of the marriage. This view is supported by Judge Story (Conf. Laws §§ 110, 112), and Mr. Bishop (Mar. & D. § 380); 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 219; 76 Ga. 177; but it is objected to this theory that it is subject to exceptions which destroy its applicability to the majority of litigated cases. Thus marriages which by our law are incestuous, are not invalidated by being performed in another land, where they would be lawful, and so the converse is true, that the marriage, in England, of an American with his deceased wife's sister, would be recognized as valid in such of our states as hold such a marriage to be legal, nor is it believed that an American court will ever hold a marriage of Antian citizens, solemnized abroad, to be illegal, simply because the consent of parents was withheld or because one of the parties, though of age at home, was a minor at the place of celebration. Further, to make the lex loci celebrationis supreme enables parties to acquire for themselves any kind of marital capacity they want, by having the marriage solemnized in a state where this kind of marital capacity is sanctioned by law. See 87 Tenn. 244; 59 Fed. Rep. 682.

A second theory of matrimonial capacity is that it is determined by the lex domicilii; Wheat. Int. Law (Lawr.) 173; 4 Phill. Int. Law 264; 2 Cl. & F. 498; 9 H. L. C. 198. There are two serious objections to this theory. First it would make the validity of the marriages in the United States of natives of other countries depend upon the question whether such persons had acquired a domicile in the United States; for if they had not, they would be governed by the laws of their foreign domicile. Few aliens, who marry in this country, could be sure they were legally married. Second, it would be necessary upon this theory to sustain the polygamous marriages of Chinese; see, as sustaining this theory, L. R. 2 P. & M. 440; 4 P. D. 13; 8 P. D. 1; 29 L. J. P. & M. 97; Westl. 56; but see 125 Mass. 374. According to Savigny, all questions of capacity are to be determined by the husband's domicile; which, as the true seat of the marriage, absorbs that of the wife. It has been conceded that the law of domicile does not extend to the direction of the ceremonial part of the marriage rite, and that the lex domicilii is the law of the country in which the parties are domiciled at the time of the marriage, and in which their matrimonial residence is contemplated; Lord Campbell in 9 H. L. C. 193.

The third theory is that matrimonial capacity is a distinctive national policy, as to which judges are obliged to enforce the rules of the state of which they are the officers. So far as concerns the United States, our national policy in this respect is to sustain the matrimonial capacity in all classes of persons arrived at puberty, and free from the impediments of priorities. This view is approved by Dr. Wharton, Conf. Laws §§ 160-165. See 19 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 76, 219; 31 Am. L. Rev. 524.

At common law, no particular form of words or ceremony was necessary. Mutual assent to the relation of husband and wife was sufficient. Any words importing a present assent to being married to each other were sufficient evidence of the contract. If the words imported an assent to a future marriage, if followed by consummation, this established a valid marriage by the canon law, but not by the common law; 10 Cl. & F. 534; 15 N. Y. 345; 2 Rop. Husb. & W. 445; 1 How. 219; 2 N. H. 268. But a betrothal followed by consummation does not make the common-law marriage per verba de futuro cum copula when the parties looked forward to a formal ceremony, and did not agree to become husband and wife without it; 12 R. I. 485. An agreement made per verba de presenti between a man and a woman to become husband and wife, followed by consummation thereof, either secret or public, is a valid marriage and is not invalidated by an agreement of one of the parties not to make the marriage known until a specified time, unless with the consent of the other; 75 Cal. 1; 17 Wash. L. Rep. 328. The question has been raised of the validity of a marriage at sea, and it has been held in California that outside of the three-mile limit there is no law governing marriage, and that if persons go to sea to escape the conditions attached to the ceremony within a state the state cannot be expected to recognize the ceremony as valid; 55 Alb. L. J. 208. But a formal marriage on a British man-of-war on the high seas has been held valid in England; [1896] P. 116.

At common law the consent might be given in the presence of a magistrate or of any other person as a witness, or it might be found by a court or jury from the subsequent acknowledgment of the parties, or from the proof of cohabitation, or of general reputation resulting from the conduct of the parties. In the original United States the common-law rule prevails, except where it has been changed by legislation; 6 Binn. 405; 4 Johns. 52. See 10 N. H. 383; 4 Barr. 2058; 1 How. 219, 224; 1 Gray 119; 2 Me. 102.

In civil cases a marriage can generally be proved by showing that the parties have held themselves out as husband and wife, and by general reputation founded on their conduct. This is sufficient, too, for purposes of administration; 2 Redf. 456. There is an exception, however, in the case of such civil suits as are founded on the marriage relation, such as actions for the seduction of the wife, where general reputation and cohabitation will not be sufficient; 4 N. Y. 390; 183 Pa. 210; 3 Bradf. Surr. 869, 873; 6 Conn. 446; 29 Me. 323; 14 N. H. 450.

Marriage may be proved by the witnesses to its solemnization, by presumption, from a record, or from cohabitation and repute, and by declaration, or admissions of the parties to it, when against their interest or a part of the res gestæ, or by conduct from which such admission may be implied; 49 N. J. Eq. 520; see 65 Vt. 492; or by circumstantial evidence; 76 Hun 200. Eyewitnesses and records are not essential; 103 U. S. 311.

Documentary evidence is not the best proof of marriage; a witness who swears to having seen a marriage ceremony performed, intended to be in good faith, by a person acting as a clergyman or magistrate, testifies to a valid marriage, unless it is clearly illegal by statute; 72 Mich. 184.

In most of the states, the degrees of relationship within which marriages may not be contracted are prescribed by statute. This limit in cases of consanguinity is generally, though not always, that of first cousins. In some of the states, a violation of the rule renders, by statute, the marriage absolutely void. In others, no provision of this kind is made. Various statutes have been passed to guard against abuse of the marriage ceremony. Such of them as require license, or the publication of bans, or the consent of parents or guardians, are regarded as directory, and, unless explicitly declaring the marriage to be void, if not complied with, do not render it void. See 4 Ia. 449; 26 Mo. 260; 2 Watts 9; 1 How. 219; 2 Halst. 138; 2 N. H. 268; 103 Mo. 188; 43 Ala. 57; 30 Ga. 173; 25 N. Y. 390. But see 2 Yerg. 589; 9 H. L. C. 274; 155 Mass. 425; 29 W. Va. 732; 30 Pac. Rep. 85. See Nelson, Divorce.

In England Lord Hardwicke's Act, 1753, nullified all marriages (except those of Quakers and Jews) celebrated otherwise than in a church and according to the rites of the church of England, and this continued to be the law up to the passing of the Marriage Act, 1836, by which provisions were made for civil marriages at a register office, and for legalizing all marriages in duly registered dissenting places of worship, if celebrated in the presence of a civil official called a registrar of marriages. Foreign marriages are regulated in England by the act of 1892. See LEX LOCI, as to foreign marriages.

As to rights of married women, see HUSBAND; MARRIED WOMAN. RESTRAINT OF MARRIAGE. MIXED MARRIAGE;

MARRIAGES ACT, ROYAL. Under this act of 1772, no descendant of King George II. other than the issue of princesses married into foreign families, may contract matrimony without the previous consent of the sovereign, provided, however, that any such descendant, being over the age of twenty-five, may, upon giving twelve months' notice to the Privy Council, contract a marriage of which the king disapproves unless in the meantime both Houses of Parliament expressly declare their disapproval. Byrne.

MARRIAGE ARTICLES. Articles of agreement between parties contemplating marriage, in accordance with which the marriage settlement is afterwards to be drawn up; they are to be binding in case of marriage. They must be in writing, by the Statute of Frauds; Burt. R. P. 484; Crabb, R. P. § 1809; 4 Cruise, Dig. 274, 323.

MARRIAGE BROKAGE. The act by which a person interferes, for a consideration to be received by him, between a man and a woman, for the purpose of procuring a marriage between them. The money paid for such service is also known by this name.

Such contracts are illegal at common law; Show. P. C. 76; 3 P. Wms. 76; 3 Lev. 411; and in equity they are utterly void, as against public policy; 1 Fonbl. Eq. b. 1, c. 4, 10, note s; 2 Sto. Eq. Jur. § 263; 1 Ves. 508.

It is said that such contracts were good at the civil law and that "matchmakers (procuratores) were allowed to receive a reward for their services." Bisph. Eq. § 224, note.

MARRIAGE LICENSE. See MARRIAGE.

MARRIAGE PORTION. That property which is given to a woman on her marriage. See DOWER.

MARRIAGE, PROMISE OF. See PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT. An agreement made by the parties in contemplation of marriage, by which the title to certain property is changed, and the property to some extent becomes inalienable. 1 Rice, Eq. 315. See 2 Hill, Ch. 3; 8 Leigh 29; 1 D. & B. Eq. 389; Baldw. 344; 15 Mass. 106; 139 id. 144; 7 Pet. 348; 37 Ill. App. 145; 93 Mich. 274; 112 Mo. 442. See 2 Washb. R. P. Appx.; Atmoly, Marr. Settl.

Such settlements are valid, the marriage being at law a valuable consideration; 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 213; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 560; and payments made in pursuance thereof cannot be set aside by creditors; 42 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 213. The property covered passes, on the death of the wife, to her devisees under the settlement; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 560; and is free from any claim by the husband to curtesy; 20 Misc. Rep. 481. It is sufficient to change the course of inheritance and authorize each party to dispose of his or her own property by deed or devise without consent of the other; 5 Kan. App. 341. See 42 Ia. 600. It is not affected by a subsequent statute respecting married women; 109 Ala. 689.

In Quebec a gift of future property between future consorts by marriage contract is illegal and void; Rap. Jud. Quebec 11 C. S. 404. See ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACT.

MARRIED WOMAN. A woman who has a husband.

The relation confers upon her certain rights, imposes on her certain obligations, and deprives her of certain powers and privileges.

At Common Law. A wife has a right to share the bed and board of her husband. She can call upon him to provide her with necessary food and clothing according to her position in life, and if he neglects or refuses to do it she can procure them on his account. See NECESSARIES. She is entitled, on his death, to dower in all the real estate of which he is seised at any time during coverture. See DOWER.

She is bound to follow him wherever in the country he may choose to go and establish himself, provided it is not, for other causes, unreasonable. She is under obligation to be faithful in chastity to her marriage vow; 5 Mart. La. n. s. 50. See DIVORCE; ADULTERY.

A married woman can acquire rights of a political character: these rights stand on the general principles of the law of nations; 2 Hard. Ky. 5; 3 Pet. 242. See WOMAN.

When she commits a crime in the presence of her husband, unless it is of a very aggravated character, she is presumed to act by his coercion, and, unless the contrary is proved, she is irresponsible. Under other circumstances she is liable, criminally, as if she were a feme sole. See COERCION; DURESS; HUSBAND; WILL.

Her property rights were put by the marriage very much under the control of the husband. He could manage his own affairs in his own way, buy and sell all kinds of personal property, without her control, and he might buy any real estate he might deem proper; but, as the wife acquired a right in the latter, he could not sell it, discharged of her dower, except by her consent, expressed in the manner prescribed by the laws of the state where such lands lay. Her personal property in possession was vested in him, and he could dispose of it as if he had acquired it; this arose from the principle that they were considered one person in law; 2 Bla. Com. 438; 83 Ala. 202; and he was entitled to all her property in action, provided he reduced it to possession during her life; 2 Bla. Com. 434. If the wife died before the claims were collected, the husband received them as her administrator, in which case, after payment of her debts, the surplus belonged to him absolutely. He was also entitled to her chattels real, but these vested in him not absolutely, but sub modo; as, in the case of a lease for years, the husband was entitled to receive the rents and profits of it, and could, if he pleased, sell, surrender, or dispose of it during the coverture, and it was liable to be taken in execution for his debts; and, if he survived her, it was to all intents and purposes his own. In case his wife survived him, it was considered as if it had never been transferred from her, and it belonged to her alone. In his wife's freehold estate he had a life estate during the joint lives of himself and wife; and when he had a child by her who could inherit, he had an estate by the curtesy. See CURTESY.

At common law a married woman could not bind herself by contract, express or implied, by parol or under seal, even for necessities, nor, though living apart from her husband, could she make a binding contract except for necessities or for the benefit of her separate estate; 9 Col. 291; and a contract made by her being invalid would be no consideration for a subsequent promise during widowhood; 49 N. J. L. 58. Her husband might be bound by her acts as his agent, duly authorized; 2 Freeman. 178; 4 Man. & G. 253; but where payment to her was pleaded, her authority must be stated; 2 id. 173. By her own act her authority could not be enlarged; 101 U. S. 240; and she could not execute a conveyance, even in release of dower, otherwise than by joining with her husband in a deed to a third person; 4 Paige 448. No promise of a wife could at common law be enforced against her unless she had a separate estate, and then not by a personal decree but only by treating it as an appointment out of such estate; 49 N. J. L. 53; and then only for her or its benefit; 48 Ark. 220; and no implied promise could be raised against her; 58 Vt. 337. The common-law disabilities of a married woman could not be avoided by any false representations with respect to her capacity, and no estoppel would be raised thereby; 39 Pa. 299; 53 N. Y. 96; 2 Gray 161; but in the management of her separate property she would be answerable for the frauds of her agent, within the scope of his agency, though she were ignorant of it; 47 N. Y. 577. The disabilities of a married woman are her personal privilege, and must be pleaded; 7 Gray 338; 99 Mass. 199. See COVERTURE. And no one but the husband can object to a suit against him by the wife, so that a judgment against a firm of which he is a member is good if he do not himself raise the defence; 126 Pa. 470. Her common-law disability is not removed by the so-called married woman's acts which operate only to give her such capacity as is expressed in them; 22 Mo. App. 554; 4 Sawy. 604; 99 U. S. 325; 41 Miss. 125; 25 W. N. C. (Pa.) 218; 1 Biss. 64; and where such statutes authorize her to contract as though single, she is bound by estoppel arising from her misrepresentation or concealment; 77 N. C. 487; 46 Wis. 677; or by the acts of her husband; 86 Ill. 74; 53 Miss. 344. Where such estoppel operates, it is only in respect to her personal estate; 80 Ark. 398; but the weight of authority is against sustaining estoppel against her; 2 L. R. A. 845, n., where are collected cases of common-law disabilities of a married woman and estoppel against her. The rigor of the common-law disabilities of a married woman and the merger of her individual and property rights in her husband gave rise to certain equitable remedies against her husband, intended to secure at least a portion of her property to the use of herself and her children. As to the character and extent of these rights, see WIFE'S EQUIT.

As a general rule, a contract made between parties who subsequently intermarry is, both at law and in equity, extinguished by the marriage; 1 Bla. Com. 442; but when articles are entered into or a settlement is executed whereby the wife is to have a certain provision in lieu of her fortune, the husband becomes virtually a purchaser of her fortune, and she becomes entitled to her provision, though there may be no intervention of trustees, and equity will enforce the contract; 2 Ves. Sen. 675; Husbands, on Married Women 125; MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.

At common law a married woman was personally liable jointly with her husband for her torts unless committed under the coercion of her husband; 115 Pa. 534; 58 Vt. 337. The death of the wife terminated the liability of the husband, but if the husband died the wife might be sued alone; 115 Pa. 534.

It has been remarked by the recent historians of early English law that "the main idea which governs the law of husband and wife is not that of a 'unity of person,' but that of the guardianship, the mund, the profitable guardianship, which the husband has over the wife and over her property;" 1 Poll. & M. 468.

In Equity. The difficulties arising from the common-law doctrine of a married woman's incapacity, and her practical non-existence as a legal person, resulted in a qualified recognition by courts of equity of the individuality and existence of a married woman as such. This, however, was only granted in cases where she had what was termed a separate estate. This gave rise to two great doctrines of the law, the separate use and restraint on anticipation.

The latter was an invention of the court of equity and an exception to the general law of inalienability of property. It was justified as the most satisfactory method of giving property to a married woman so that it should not be practically given to her husband, to prevent which the "condition was allowed to be imposed restraining her from anticipating her income and thus fettering the free alienation of her property;" Jessel, M. R., in 11 Ch. D. 644. By the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the court was authorized, where it appeared to be for the benefit of a married woman, by judgment or order with her consent, to bind her interest in any property, notwithstanding that she was restrained from anticipation; 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, § 89, 40. This was held to be not "a general power of removing the restraint upon anticipation, but only a power to make binding a particular disposition of property by a married woman if it be for her benefit;" 52 L. J. Ch. 928. See as to this doctrine, Brett, L. C. Mod. Eq. 104. The separate use was also originally a creation of the court of chancery, but in recent years it has been adopted in statutes with the effect of abolishing the common-law marital rights of the husband, to the same extent that they were avoided by a trust, in equity, to her sole and separate use.

The separate property of a feme covert as to which equity considers her as a feme sole, is that property alone which is settled to her sole and separate use by some will, writing, or deed of settlement with a power expressly or impliedly given her of managing it without the concurrence of her husband; 5 Day 174. This estate may be created by any form of settlement, written or oral (as to personality), by deed or will, to her directly or in trust for her; or it may be by antenuptial agreement (q. v.). It may be settled by the husband; 68 Ala. 405; herself; 1 L. R. 16 Eq. 29; or a stranger; 2 S. C. n. s. 123, 129, 133. The one essential ingredient required for its creation is a sufficient indication of an intention to bar or exclude the marital rights; 2 Bush 112; 49 Conn. 52; 24 Gratt. 250; of the husband contemplated by the settlement; 4 Myl. & C. 377; 1 Beav. 1. See Stew. H. & W. §§ 196, 199. No particular form of words is required, but any which sufficiently indicate this intention will be sufficient. For a great variety of phrases which have been judicially passed upon as sufficient or insufficient, see Stew. H. & W. § 200. Where a wife purchases land in her own name and with her own money it will be presumed to be her separate property; 11 Wash. 390.

To an ordinary equitable estate of a married woman the marital rights of the husband attach; 35 Ark. 84, 88; but the effort to mitigate the severity of the common-law doctrine gave rise to the equitable creations of the wife's equity (q. v.) and the equitable separate estate; 1 Bro. C. C. 16; 27 Gratt. 491, 507; 1 L. Cas. Eq. 481; Stew. H. & W. § 197; 2 Perry, Trusts § 625.

In England a married woman's capacity to dispose of property of whatever kind settled to her separate use, by deed or will, is absolute, unless she be expressly restrained by the settlement; and, generally speaking, it is bound by her contracts, written or verbal; 3 Bro. C. C. 347; 1 id. 20. See, also, 13 Ves. 190; 14 id. 542. But it was contended by Chancellor Kent that this was not always so held, and that the English cases were too contradictory to afford a safe guide, and he held (practically the converse of the English rule) that she could exercise only such power, to be exercised in such manner as was prescribed by the instrument creating the estate; 3 Johns. Ch. 77. But this decision was reversed; 17 Johns. 548, in which the English doctrine substantially was adopted.

The course of subsequent New York decisions is neither clear nor consistent, but may, probably, on the whole, be considered as following the last cited case with a qualification that the married woman is not to be charged unless her intention to charge her separate estate is sufficiently indicated in the contract or implied from some benefit to be derived by her separate estate from the consideration. See 18 N. Y. 265; 22 id. 451; 58 id. 80; 63 id. 639; 64 id. 217; 68 id. 329.

Most of the states adopt, in the main, the English doctrine of power to charge the separate estate, but many jurisdictions follow what is known as the American doctrine—that a married woman, as to her separate estate, is feme sole in so far as the instrument has expressly conferred on her the power to act as such, and that she is confined to the particular mode of disposition prescribed in the instrument, if any, and the estate is not liable for her contracts, bonds, and notes, unless the instrument expressly declares that it shall be charged. It was first established in South Carolina and adhered to, as above stated, by Chancellor Kent. See 1 Rawle 231; 65 Pa. 430; 2 R. I. 355; 1 Swan. 499; 8 Humph. 209; 7 Ired. Eq. 311; 74 N. C. 442; 42 id. 458; 26 Miss. 275; 42 id. 585. See Kelly, Cont. M. W. 259, n. 6, and a critical annotation by the same author; 23 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 321; Stew. H. & W. § 203.

An instrument creating such an estate is excepted from the rule which makes void clauses in restraint of alienation, provided only that the rule against perpetuities is not violated; id. § 204.

Under Statutes. Superimposed upon this complex combination of common-law disability and equitable protection for separate estate, there is now, both in England and in the United States, a mass of statute law, as to most of which a classification to be relied on is impossible, and of which it has been truly said that, "To attempt a useful summary of laws so incongruous, so purely local, and so constantly changing, is useless." Schoul. H. & W. 254. For questions arising under the statutes of any state they should be resorted to directly, it being only possible here (and nothing more is intended) to give an impression of the general course of legislation which has so changed the status and rights of married women.

The course of legislation in the United States has been such as almost entirely to remove the common-law disabilities of a married woman, and to secure to her the management and control of her own property with power to contract concerning it, and also largely to increase both her individual rights and liabilities. It has been said that the protection and the disability of marriage have been linked together, and the wife when deprived of the one has been released from the other; 66 Tex. 494; but this broad statement does not seem to express the rule of construction generally adopted; see supra. The first tendency of the married woman's acts was to emancipate her property both from control and from any liability for obligations naturally springing from the marriage relation. In this country, however, there has been lately a strong current in the direction of creating and enforcing liability for such debts against both husband and wife.

In all the states and territories and the District of Columbia the real property of a married woman remains her separate property, generally free from the control or interference of her husband or liability for his debts; and in most of the states her personal property is equally so. In Connecticut, however, her personal property acquired either before or after marriage, and the proceeds, if sold, vest in the husband in trust to receive the income or so much as may be necessary to be expended for the support of the wife and children, and on the death of the husband to pass to the wife or subject to her will. In Maine, Connecticut, and Iowa the husband acquires no rights in property of the wife, and in Connecticut the wife none in that of the husband, while in California, Nevada, and the Dakotas neither husband nor wife has an interest in the property of the other, and in Missouri the husband may acquire title to personal property reduced to his possession with his wife's written consent to property acquired after the marriage independently of the husband, both real and personal property is usually secured to the wife for her separate use, the statutes varying in the specification in the different states; some states, including the others, by devise or descent, the one by purchase or gift or the result of her own labor. For a classification of the statutes on this point both as to real and personal property, see Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6422.

In New York and West Virginia special protection is given to the property of a married woman, her own inventions; in Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Kansas, Nebraska, Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas, Alabama, and Delaware, in the proceeds of stocks sold, and in the last named state, of any separate estate sold.

In Minnesota and Missouri, savings from the income of her separate estate, and in several states the rents and profits of her real estate are separate property. In some states, including New York, the Dakotas, California, and Nevada, the husband and wife may hold property in joint tenancy or tenancy in common, or in the two last named states as community property. As to Louisiana, see COMMUNITY.

For reference to the statutes of the several states on this general subject, see Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6410-34.

As to the statutory liability of a married woman and her property for necessities and family expenses and also for her own torts, see infra. The separate property of a married woman is not liable in most states for the debts of the husband, nor bound by judgment or execution against him, and in Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Tennessee his curtesy or other interest in her real estate is not affected. Generally under the state statutes debts of the wife contracted before marriage are enforceable against her separate property after marriage. For these in Maine and Delaware a judgment may be recovered against her in her own name, but in Rhode Island, New York, Indiana, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and Nevada, the husband, not the wife, must be against husband and wife jointly. Debts contracted by the wife after marriage may generally be enforced against her and her separate property. A judgment may be recovered against her individually in Rhode Island, Ohio, and Maine, and in the last named state, Rhode Island, Maryland, and Alabama she may be sued jointly with the husband. In Vermont, Ohio, and Arkansas a judgment against a married woman may be enforced against her own property as if she were sole.

By legislation since 1880: In New Jersey if the husband and wife have lived apart seven years either may convey separate real estate without the other. In Rhode Island married women may contract as if single. In Louisiana they may keep bank accounts. In Virginia their real estate is liable on their contract, but cannot be sold if the rents and profits will discharge the debt in five years. In New Jersey insurance, if payable to a married woman, is free from any claim of the husband, his representatives or creditors, except as to amount of premiums paid in fraud of creditors. In Wisconsin a married woman may receive from any person inheritance, gifts, or bequests as if unmarried, and conveyances between the husband and wife are valid. So in New York she may contract with the husband as to all matters excepted from alteration or dissolution of the marriage relation or to relieve the husband from liability for her support. In California the debts of a married woman are made and acknowledged as if unmarried. In Arkansas she may make executory contracts, and in that state, as also in California and West Virginia, she may give a power of attorney to sell land. In Alabama contracts of a non-resident married woman have the same force as those of residents. In South Dakota her liability for necessities is the same as the husband's, and in New Jersey she may become liable upon indenture, guarantee, or promise to pay the debt of another; but in South Carolina she cannot contract as surety for the debt of another. In Missouri her separate property is not subject to levy for debt. In Vermont she may be appointed executrix, administratrix, guardian, or trustee, and the marriage of a single woman will not affect the authority of her previous appointment. In Texas limitation does not run against her until she becomes twenty-one. In Delaware married women abandoned by their husbands may sell real estate held in their own right. In West Virginia married women living separate and apart from their husbands may carry on business, and separate property of the wife acquired by the husband is subject to the payment of her debts. In Pennsylvania husband and wife may sue and testify against each other in certain cases, and by the act of 1893 her capacity to acquire and dispose of property and to sue and be sued is practically absolute. In North Carolina the wife loses her interest in her husband's property when she abandons him, or if divorce is granted on his application; and he may then convey his real estate as if unmarried, and the same provisions apply conversely to the husband in like cases.

English legislation has been much more according to a definite plan, commencing with 22 & 23 Vict. c. 85, which enabled a married woman deserted or judicially separated from her husband to obtain orders of protection against his creditors. Married Women's Property Acts of 1870, 1874, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 95, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 59, secured to married women several specific property rights, but these acts were repealed and supplied by the Married Women's Property Act of 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 75, under which a married woman could acquire and hold separate property in her own name, and sue and be sued separately; the husband, however, remaining liable for her torts. The purpose of this act was thus stated by Willis, J., to be, not destructive of the "doctrine of the common law by which there was what has been called a unity of person between husband and wife, but to confer in cases specified certain powers upon the wife, and in others new powers upon the husband, and gives them in certain specified cases new remedies against one another." 14 Q. B. Div. 835. This act is still the married woman's property law of England, the only subsequent act of importance being 49 & 50 Vict. c. 85, under which women who were deserted may summon their husbands for maintenance.

For provisions of the English statute in detail, see an interesting comparison between English and American legislation on this subject, 22 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 791; Brit. L. Com. Mod. Eq. 99; 1 Brit. Com. ch. 18, at the end of which may be found a list of the English statutes; 7 So. L. Rev. 68; 11 Cent. L. J. 41; 27 id. 379.

While the legislation of England and the United States with respect to married women has been mainly in the direction of giving to her property interests such a legal status as had been secured to her in equity in spite of her common law footing, there has, at the same time, been secured to her in both countries, by judicial emancipation, the person to the extent of practically abrogating the common-law rule on that subject. An interesting review by Edward Manson of the cases on the marital authority of the husband shows that the right to beat wife was a part of the common law, and that the 7 Law Mag. Rev. thought chancery early intervened for her protection; still later there remained the husband's control over his wife's person; but this theory ceased to be acted upon early in the eighteenth century, and Jackson's case is said to have simply emphasized the recognition of the wife's right to her personal liberty; even to compel them to live together is beyond the reach of the law, and the policy of compelling cohabitation was abandoned in the Matrimonial Clauses Act, 1834. The conclusion reached is: "Moulded by the social forces of successive centuries, the law of England as to married women is rapidly following the course of Roman law. They began in subjugation, they end in entire emancipation. The protection of a wife's person is simply assured, so is the protection of her property (though we still cling to the absurdity of making her capacity to control depend on her possession of separate property). The advocates of women's rights have really hardly a grievance left. Whether all this is for good or evil, whether woman is destined to realize her highest freedom or to freedom of freedom, is a matter on which opinions will differ, and which time only can solve. Jurisprudence, as such, has nothing to do with it. It has only to do with the law as it is, and the law in its most recent interpretation." 7 L. Quar. Rev. 214. As to the right of custody of the wife, see 35 Ir. L. T. 188.

The effect of this modern legislation is to create what has been termed a statutory separate estate, which is not to be confused with the equitable separate estate; Stew. H. & W. § 217; the two may exist side by side; id.; 51 Miss. 172. The word property in these acts has been held to include money; 85 Miss. 108; choses in action ex contractu; 16 N. J. Eq. 512; 75 Va. 890; 33 Id. 212; and ex delicto; 34 Ohio St. 621; 37 Id. 10; 27 Mich. 145; 54 Mo. 158; 43 Wis. 23; corporeal and incorporeal interests; 69 Pa. 424; 35 Ala. 89; animate and inanimate; 62 Ala. 41 (but not mere contingent interests; L. R. 6 Eq. 210); a mining interest in a lead; 4 G. Greene 281. In England married woman's property does not include a general power of appointment under a deed or will of which she is donee; 17 Q. B. Div. 521. Most of the acts define the mode of acquisition of property which shall be affected by it, and such specification excludes all others; 2 Bish. M. W. § 17. The most common methods of acquisition are, purchase, gift or grant, devise, bequest, descent, distribution, exchange, increase, trade or service, contract, and tort; Stew. H. & W. §§ 223-230, where the cases, as to each, are collected.

Where a husband employs his wife and pays her wages otherwise payable to some other employee, she cannot be deprived of the money or of her property in which she has invested it; 42 N. J. L. 198; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 867; 44 N. Y. 298; 27 Miss. 830; 37 Me. 94.

The marriage of a woman to a man to whom she is indebted does not extinguish the debt; 49 Ill. App. 163.

A grant or devise to a married woman and her husband as tenants by entireties, is not abrogated by the married women's property acts even where they provide that she shall hold real estate as if sole; 92 N. Y. 152; 156 Pa. 628; 159 Mass. 415; 92 Tenn. 707; 23 Ore. 4; 38 S. C. 84, contra, 56 N. H. 105; 88 Me. 17; but a married woman may, under those acts, without joining her husband, sue for and recover land conveyed to her and him in fee; 31 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 342; and the husband is not exclusively entitled to the use and benefit of lands held in entirety or as joint tenant with his wife; 144 N. Y. 306. In England, since the married women's property act, a conveyance to both creates the same estate as if they were not married; L. R. 39 Ch. D. 148; 27 id. 166; 1 Brett, Com. 62. In some states a conveyance to a married woman and her husband is unaffected by these statutes, either because tenancy by entireties and joint tenancy have not been adopted; 11 Conn. 537; or not recognized by the courts; 13 Ohio 68; 28 la. 802; or are abolished by statute; 69 Miss. 795. Where a married woman was a tenant by entirety it has been held that a divorce changed it into a tenancy in common; 118 Ind. 36; 80 Tex. 645; 80 Ill. 197; 92 Tenn. 697; 123 Mo. 235. See 22 J. R. A. 594; 30 id. 805.

In most of the states the deed of a married woman is ineffectual to pass a title, unless when her husband is a party; and generally a separate acknowledgment and private examination of the wife is required; and if signed by her alone without her husband it is absolutely void; 112 Pa. 99; 69 Ala. 318; and so by statute is a mortgage; 117 Ind. 9. For the statutory requirements with respect to acknowledgments in the several states, see ACKNOWLEDGMENT. See, also, as to separate acknowledgment, 80 Cent. L. J. 515. The deed of a married woman without the separate examination will pass neither her interest nor that of the husband; 94 Mo. 511. Where her acknowledgment is not made in compliance with the statute she is presumed to have acted under the coercion of her husband; 12 Pet. 845; 94 Mo. 511.

In Indiana the deed of a married woman to which her husband is not joined gives color of title; 104 Ind. 223. If the deed of a married woman be void by reason of a defective acknowledgment it may be ratified by her after her husband's death, and such ratification may be shown by parol evidence; 9 S. & R. 268.

A deed purporting to be an absolute conveyance of lands of a married woman will not be construed as a release of dower because her husband's name appears first therein; 155 Ill. 514. The common-law disability, incident to the relation of husband and wife with respect to conveyances of real property, still exists in so far as it has not been swept away by express legislative enactments; 119 N. Y. 540. Where a married woman, at the time an infant, had executed a note and a mortgage intended to convey her separate estate, the mortgage being void, because not executed in accordance with the statutes, she was not estopped to assert the invalidity of the mortgage, by representations at the time of its execution that she was twenty-one years of age, although such representations were material inducements towards the making of the loan; 25 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 975.

Mere silence by a married woman who knows her conveyance to be void does not estop her from asserting it; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 444; but in that state it is held that by statute a married woman may be bound by an estoppel in pais; 140 Ind. 256. The wife joining her husband in conveyances of his land is not bound by his covenants in the deed and is not estopped to assert a paramount lien in favor of herself; 107 Ala. 429.

Where the husband leased his wife's lands for a year with a privilege of four years more, the receipt of a share of the farm products reserved did not estop her from asserting that the lease was void, because not assented to in writing by her; 57 N. J. L. 242.

Where a married woman is unable to convey her separate estate without a deed in which her husband is joined, she cannot make a valid deed to him of such property; 85 Ala. 842. Gifts by a wife to a husband are to be closely scrutinized, but if fairly made and free from coercion and undue influence they ought to be sustained; 39 N. J. Eq. 216. The evidence must be clear and unequivocal, and the intention free from doubt; 82 Ga. 329; 124 Ind. 103. A conveyance by the husband directly to the wife creates in her an equitable estate, but is inoperative to pass a legal title; and he is left a trustee for her; 83 Ala. 408; 84 id. 193; 35 Fed. Rep. 677; 17 Or. 423. He may settle property upon his wife if it does not impair the claims of existing creditors and is not intended as a cover for future schemes of fraud; 122 U. S. 446.

An assignment by a married woman of her separate estate to pay a note in which she has been joined with her husband for his debt has been held void; 30 S. C. 159. Mortgages by a wife of her separate estate for the husband's benefit have been held null and void; 94 U. S. 767; 11 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 351; contra, 3 MacArthur 118; 128 U. S. 236; 64 N. H. 595; 112 Pa. 284.

In the absence of an enabling act the contracts of a married woman are cognizable only in equity, and cannot be enforced at law, except as affected by the so-called Married Women's Acts; 95 Wis. 881. The right to contract conferred by these acts has been held to give her not a general contractual capacity, but only ability to make such contracts as have direct relation to the improvement of her separate property; 22 Mich. 255; 44 id. 80; and her property must not merely be incidentally benefited, but there must be a direct relation between it and the contract; 39 id. 671. See 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 727. Such is the general construction of such statutes destroying the common-law rights of the husband in his wife's property; 18 Wall. 141; 99 U. S. 325; 26 N. J. Eq. 504; 33 N. J. L. 266; 1 Marvel Del. —. Generally her contracts are binding when necessary or convenient to the use and enjoyment of her separate estate; 10 Wis. 880. A paper indorsed to enable her husband to raise money does not charge her property; 30 Ohio St. 147, where there is an exhaustive examination of the subject. For extreme cases, see 8 Kan. 525; 9 id. 80; 62 Mo. 338. See a full discussion of the effect of these statutes conferring contractual power upon a married woman; Stew. H. & W. §§ 369, 378 a.

Where a married woman performs her part of a contract, she may enforce performance against the other party, though she could not have been compelled to perform her part of the agreement; 127 Mo. 232; and if she make a contract, not enforceable against her, to purchase real estate and fail to pay for the same, it may be sold for the unpaid purchase money; 95 Tenn. 67. In some states provision is made for a conveyance of land by a married woman abandoned by her husband, under permission of court or otherwise; and under such statute it has been held that, having conveyed without compliance with the statute, she may not rescind the deed long afterwards on account of coverture without returning the consideration; 30 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 402.

Threats of prosecution and imprisonment against her husband constitute duress sufficient to make void the deed or contract of a married woman; 18 Md. 805; 62 Ia. 42; 98 Mich. 163; 59 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 564; 62 L. T. N. s. 376.

Generally it is held that a married woman cannot become a partner with her husband, even under statutes which would authorize her to enter into partnership with any one else; 67 How. Pr. 292; 65 Tex. 131; 14 Abb. N. C. 341; 31 Ind. 113; 44 Ohio St. 192; 4 Wash. 263, contra, 3 Biss. 405; 90 Ala. 525; 122 N. Y. 308 (see as to conflicting New York cases 16 L. R. A. 526, n.); nor ordinarily with any one else; 23 Fla. 63; 41 Md. 19; if she have no separate estate; 87 Mo. 282. If, without capacity to become a partner, she does so, the property remains hers and the husband cannot assign it; 52 Miss. 239; nor can his creditors; 15 Wis. 195; 11 Paige 9. Where her partnership is a nullity the other partner may be sued alone; 20 W. Va. 571. Where her husband borrows her separate property and uses it in a firm, she is the creditor of the firm; 86 Ind. 224; 4 Del. Ch. 580; and her debt is provable in bankruptcy; 11 Paige 9. If a married woman carries on a business under the assumed name of a partnership she may be sued in that name, and cannot plead her coverture; 81 Ala. 123; nor can her co-partners deny her capacity to sue alone for a dissolution; 61 N. Y. 512. As to married women as partners, see, generally, 2 L. R. A. 343; 32 Cent. L. J. 128; 31 Am. St. Rep. 934; and as to partnerships between husband and wife, see 16 id. 526, n.; 35 Cent. L. J. 328; 24 Am. L. Reg. 659.

The capacity of a married woman to become surety or guarantor will depend upon the construction of the state statutes, and the questions most frequently arise with respect to efforts to become surety for the husband. In some states this is expressly forbidden, and the prohibition has been held to prevent her from mortgaging her real estate to one who is surety for her husband or co-surety with him; 105 Ala. 657. In other states she may bind her separate estate as surety for her husband; 40 W. Va. 184; 42 Neb. 869; and where she makes a valid contract as surety she is entitled to all the rights of a surety; 91 Va. 458.

A married woman is frequently held to have certain rights growing out of the insanity of her husband, as, to be regarded as the head of the family and to control the domicile of the husband; 54 Vt. 105; 32 Tex. 195; to receive income belonging to him; 4 Bro. C. C. 100; 2 McN. & G. 134. In such case it has also been held that the wife is entitled to act with respect to her separate property as if her husband were civilly dead; 51 Vt. 585; 37 N. H. 437. The husband's insanity does not affect her right to bar her dower by joining in a deed with her husband which by reason of his insanity is invalid; 99 Mo. 19; 84 Wis. 381; 111 Mass. 308; but in some states, as Delaware, this contingency is provided for by statute; 14 Del. Laws, ch. 78.

A married woman has been held authorized to dispose of community property to supply the necessary wants of herself and children; 32 Tex. 195; and see 63 id. 287. With respect to the property and rights of the husband the relation of the wife to it appears not to be changed by the insanity of the husband; L. R. 5 Q. B. 51; she may bind the estate of the husband for necessities; 4 E. L. & Eq. 523; 1 DeG. J. & S. 465; 3 J. J. Marsh. 658; but not for the payment of debts generally; 23 Vt. 496; 16 Pa. 215; nor can she sue for a debt due to him; 7 Dowl. P. C. 22.

A personal judgment against a married woman at common law was void; 66 Mo. 617; 18 Md. 457; 29 W. Va. 385; 80 Ky. 368; if rendered by default it is in some jurisdictions held absolutely void; 121 Pa. 248; 78 Mo. 53; 83 Ky. 305; 41 Cal. 78; 52 Miss. 921; in others merely voidable; 8 B. & C. 421; 61 Ga. 512; 43 Ohio St. 78; 42 Mich. 112; 55 Ind. 419; and she is not estopped by a failure to plead coverture; 83 Ky. 305. In the absence of fraud a consent decree is binding on a married woman; 79 Ala. 481; 126 Mo. 89; and a judgment might be obtained against her for a debt contracted dum sola; 2 Cow. 581; 28 Ga. 71; 4 East 521; 55 Miss. 557. Generally provision is made for such suits in the married woman's acts, and in some the husband and wife must be sued jointly, and in others, judgment may be recovered against her separately to bind her separate estate.

In Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Oregon, Washington, Alabama, and New Mexico, the husband and wife are equally liable for expenses and children's education, and a married woman is liable for necessities for herself and children in Montana (see infra); and such a debt is enforceable against her property after execution against the husband unsatisfied in Pennsylvania and Alabama, while in Vermont, Missouri, and Arkansas a judgment for necessities against the husband may be enforced against the separate property of the wife, and for expenses incurred in the improvement of her separate property in Vermont and Missouri. Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6410 (c).

In many states there are statutory provisions authorizing the assumption of liability by a married woman for the family expenses; and in others, such liability has been held to arise under the statutes without her express consent; thus, in Illinois, Iowa, and Oregon such expenses are made a charge upon the property of the husband and wife, or either of them, either jointly or severally. This is held to be a personal liability and not merely a property charge; 52 Ia. 725; 22 Ill. App. 557; but her property may be pursued without obtaining a personal judgment against her; 65 Ia. 180; and her liability is not dependent upon consent; 15 Ore. 574. Within these statutes family expenses include whatever is actually used in the family; 55 Ia. 702; rent of a house; 33 Ill. App. 394; medical attendance; 63 Ia. 22; whether necessary or not; 80 id. 243; the servants' wages; 11 Ill. App. 637; a piano; 41 Ia. 588; an organ; 65 id. 180; a cook stove and crockery; 12 id. 565; the husband's clothing; 23 Ill. App. 118; jewelry purchased by the husband and presented to the wife; 60 Ia. 148. The wife has been held not liable for money borrowed by the husband for household supplies; 55 Ia. 719; a reaping machine; 49 id. 536; a breaking plough; 52 id. 250; a light farm wagon occasionally used by the family to ride to church and other places; 24 Ill. App. 423; payments for the care of an insane husband; 46 Ia. 170.

Where the separate estate of the wife is made liable for necessities by statute she must be a party to the suit to enforce payment; 30 Mo. App. 464. In Alabama a constitutional provision is not violated by a statute making the separate estate of the wife liable for necessities; 55 Ala. 576; see 2 Bish. Mar. W. § 610. In suits under such statute the existence of the separate estate must be alleged; 30 Mo. App. 464; 52 Ala. 181. The separate estate of a married woman is liable for medical service to herself and children but not to children of her husband by a former marriage, though all live together; 48 Ala. 485.

A married woman and her separate property are liable for her torts in Maine, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Washington, and New Mexico, and in Connecticut if not under her husband's coercion. When so committed in Indiana they are jointly liable, and in Pennsylvania and Wyoming a judgment against the husband for the wife's tort must be first enforced against her separate property. Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 6414. See as to liability for torts, 55 Conn. 397; 74 Ia. 589; 29 S. C. 108; 42 Fed. Rep. 317; 25 Fla. 927; 103 Ind. 328; 29 Mich. 260; 61 Tex. 458; 471; 16 West. Jur. 425. Such is also the tendency with respect to fraud, in view of the statutes authorizing married women to transact business independently; 45 N. J. Eq. 330. In New York the husband must be joined in an action for the tort of the wife unless it is in relation to her separate property; 109 N. Y. 441. See 7 L. R. A. 640, n.

As to a married woman's liability connected with the use of premises owned by her there is a difference of opinion. Where the husband and wife resided on the premises she could not be convicted of keeping a gambling house; 16 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 307; but under similar circumstances the husband was held liable for violation of liquor laws; 194 Mass. 80; 126 id. 463; and for keeping a brothel; 97 id. 235. In New York the wife was held liable for injuries resulting from harboring a vicious dog belonging to her husband; 186 N. Y. 201, contra, 101 Ala. 667. In other cases they have been held jointly liable; 4 Colo. App. 93; and in Massachusetts it was held to be a question for the jury of the ownership of the animal; 153 Mass. 7. Where a married woman set fire to a house owned by her and let to a tenant, the husband was not liable; 58 How. Pr. 449; and where the husband and wife were domiciled on premises which were the separate property of the latter, he was held not to be in control of the premises so as to be responsible for injury to a stranger resulting from carelessly leaving a pit uncovered; 45 N. Y. 330. The husband was also held not liable for torts committed on his wife's premises in 118 Mass. 58, and 65 Mich. 31.

A husband is not entitled to alimony. The latter is based upon the common-law requirement, to which the husband was subject, of providing his wife with necessities, and there is no reciprocal obligation on her; 80 Kan. 132; 66 N. W. Rep. 947. In some states there are statutes providing that alimony, or an allowance out of the wife's estate, in the nature of alimony, may be granted the husband. In Kansas alimony was denied the husband because no authority could be found to authorize it; 30 Kan. 132; 66 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 947. See on this subject, 55 Alb. L. J. 15.

The estate of a married woman is primarily liable for her funeral expenses, and where her husband pays them, he may recover them from her executor; 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 407. See 146 Mass. 281.

As to the citizenship of married women, the effect of marriage upon the status of a woman as an alien, or her expatriation see ALIEN; CITIZEN; NATURALIZATION. See also an annotation on the subject in 22 L.R. A. 148.

MARSHAL. An officer of the United States, whose duty it is to execute the process of the courts of the United States. His duties within the district for which he is appointed are very similar to those of a sheriff. See Serg. Const. Law, ch. 25; 2 Dall. 402; Burr's Trial 365; 1 Mas. 100; 2 Gall. 101; 4 Cra. 96; 7 id. 276; 9 id. 96, 212; 6 Wheat. 194; 9 id. 645. He is authorized to protect a federal judge from assault and murder; 135 U. S. 1. See JUDGE.

A marshal who has process in his hands against one person and seizes the goods of another, is liable by virtue of his office and his sureties are bound; 111 U. S. 17, 181; though the authorities differ; 84 Fed. Rep. 409. He is liable in damages where he refuses to surrender property which he has taken unlawfully; 124 U. S. 131.

MARSHAL. To arrange; put in proper order; e. g. "the law will marshal words, ut res magis valeat." Hill, B., Hardr. 92.

MARSHAL, EARL. See EARL MARSHAL.

MARSHAL, KNIGHT. See KNIGHT MARSHAL.

MARSHAL OF THE QUEEN'S BENCH. An officer who had the custody of the queen's bench prison. Abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22 and an officer called keeper of the queen's prison substituted.

MARSHALLING ASSETS. An equitable principle upon which the legal rights of creditors are controlled in order to accomplish an equitable distribution of funds in accordance with the superior equities of different parties entitled to share therein. It springs from the principle that one who is entitled to satisfaction of his demand from either of two funds shall not so exercise his election as to exclude a party who is entitled to resort to only one of the funds. For example, where one creditor has a mortgage upon two parcels of land upon one of which there is a junior incumbrance not otherwise secured, the first mortgagee may be compelled to exhaust in the first instance that parcel of land which is otherwise unencumbered in order that the security of the junior incumbrancer may not be entirely destroyed. In such case, however, the indisposition of equity to interfere with the legal rights of a creditor results in working out the equity of the junior incumbrancer through a substitution to the right of the paramount mortgagee as against the other property; Bishp. Eq. § 27, 340; 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 739.

Marshalling assets is a pure equity and does not rest at all upon contract, and will not be enforced to the prejudice of either the dominant creditor or third persons, or even so as to do an injustice to the debtor; 85 Tenn. 597. See 1 Johns. Ch. 409; 7 W. & S. 269; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 260; 51 Neb. 146; 114 Cal. 537.

The equity of marshalling seems capable of being carried into effect in one of two ways: either, first, by restraining the parties against whom it exists from using a security to the injury of another; or, secondly, by giving the party entitled to the protection of this equity the benefit of another security in lieu of the one of which he has been disappointed. In other words, the right might be enforced either by injunction against the paramount creditor, or by subrogation in favor of the junior creditor. In practice, however, the latter of these two methods is the one usually employed, and the sounder doctrine seems to be that the first of the two ought not to be resorted to except under very peculiar circumstances. But there are decisions to the contrary; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 260. Of course, when both funds are in court or under its immediate control, the case is different.

One whose securities have been re-hypothecated by a pledgee, together with securities belonging to the latter, has a right to compel the application of the latter securities to the payment of the debt before resort is had to those wrongfully re-hypothecated; 78 Fed. Rep. 216.

A common application of this doctrine is where mortgaged real property is subject to sale under the mortgage in the inverse order of alienation. The leading English case was Barnes v. Racer, 1 Y. & C. Ch. 401, and the rule in that country has been termed the rule of ratable contribution; Sto. Eq. Jur. § 1233; while the American rule was first settled by Kent, Ch., in Clowes v. Dickinson, 5 Johns. Ch. 235, where the doctrine of exoneration in the inverse order of conveyance was adopted. It has been noted that in this case a statement in fact obiter has been generally adopted and followed in the United States. See a valuable article by J. M. Gest in 27 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 739, for a critical view of the English and American authorities.

In a recent case the rule was held not to apply to a purchase merely of the equity of redemption in a portion of the mortgaged premises so as to relieve the purchaser upon taking an assignment of the mortgage from his proportion of it and entitling him to enforce the law against the remaining portion; 68 Mo. App. 67. See 20 Pa. 222; 62 Ala. 271; 2 Johns. Ch. 125; 11 Paige 30. It is said that on a sale of a part of mortgaged lands the unsold portion is primarily liable to the mortgage debt; 38 Fla. 257.

The term marshalling has been used to express the application of the particular equity just referred to, being said to mean "the ranking or ordering of several estates or parcels of land, for the satisfaction of a judgment or mortgage to which all are liable, though successively conveyed away by the debtor." 1 Black, Judgm. § 440. It would seem, however, that the phrase is not an apt one in the application made of it, as the case put is the most ordinary one of marshalling assets, though as a matter of course there is always a marshalling of liens, in a certain sense, whenever a fund is distributed to lien creditors, as, even in an ordinary case of the application of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale. This is not, however, to be confused with the great equitable doctrine under consideration.

Another phrase, sometimes used, is marshalling securities, which is an expression for the same practice of equity to secure a class of creditors having but one fund available from having their security exhausted by another class who have two.

This equitable doctrine cannot be invoked as against those who have superior equities, and in this light the right of a wife to her own property is superior to that of her husband's creditors; 16 Conn. 504; 11 Md. 465; 119 N. C. 450; nor is it applied in favor of a creditor of the debtor; 4 Johns. Ch. 17; 13 Ill. 41; 17 Ves. 520; unless the creditor is a mere surety; 8 Sandf. Ch. 192; 13 Ill. 41; but it does not apply where the exclusive fund is the property of the surety for the debt for which such fund is bound; 58 Ohio St. 256. The doctrine cannot be made available to create a fund, the two must exist; L. R. 8 Eq. 668; but once existing it cannot be affected by the intervention of subsequent creditors; 2 Watts 205; 4 Gratt. 407. A mortgagee having double security for his debt is not required by the existence of subsequent judgments against the mortgagor, of which he has no knowledge, to shape his action in the collection of his demand in accordance with the principle of marshalling the assets; 85 Md. 505.

The doctrine of marshalling is applied to an infinite variety of cases, and is liable to be resorted to wherever there is necessity for the distribution of two funds among creditors, some of whom have claims on both. In the settlement of decedents' estates, five classes of persons are sometimes mentioned to whom it may be applied: (1) Creditors, (2) Legatees, (3) Between creditors and legatees, (4) Between legatees and vendors, (5) Between widows and legatees.

As to its application in cases of successive purchasers, see 27 Am. L. Reg. 739; partnership; 20 id. 465; 21 id. 600; 24 Alb. L. J. 305; 34 id. 344, 364; devisees and legatees; 24 Ir. L. T. 239; homestead cases; 16 W. Jurist 23; 9 Ins. L. J. 677. See generally, 2 Wh. & Tud. L. Cas. Eq. 228; Bishp. Eq. §§ 341-350 and cases cited; Tied. Eq. Jur. 532. See ASSETS; LIEN.

MARSHALLING LIENS. See last title.

MARSHALLING SECURITIES.

The general rule is that, if one creditor, by virtue of a lien or interest, can resort to two funds, and another to one of them only, as, for example, where a mortgagee holds a prior mortgage on two parcels of land, and a subsequent mortgage on but one of the parcels is given to another, the former must seek satisfaction out of that fund which the latter cannot touch. If, therefore, the prior creditor resorts to the doubly charged fund, the subsequent creditor will be substituted, as far as possible, to his rights. These rules must be taken with the modifications and exceptions that in their application the paramount incumbrancer shall not be delayed or inconvenienced in the collection of his debt, for it would be unreasonable that he should suffer because someone else has taken imperfect security; that the rights of third parties shall not be prejudiced; and that the parties themselves are creditors of the same debtor. 66 S. W. 2. See MARSHALLING ASSETS.

MARSHALSEA. In English Law. A prison belonging to the king's bench. It has now been consolidated with others, under the name of the queen's prison.

MARSHALSEA, COURT OF. See COURT OF THE MARSHALSEA.

MART. A place of public traffic or sale. See MARKET.

MARTIAL LAW. That military rule and authority which exists in time of war, and is conferred by the laws of war, in relation to persons and things under and within the scope of active military operations, in carrying on the war, and which extinguishes or suspends civil rights and the remedies founded upon them, for the time being, so far as it may appear to be necessary in order to the full accomplishment of the purposes of the war. Prof. Joel Parker, in N. A. Rev., Oct. 1861.

Martial law is not mentioned by that name in the constitution or statutes of the United States; practically the essence of martial law is the suspension of the privilege of habeas corpus, and the two have been practically regarded as the same thing. See 1 Halleck, Int. L. 549; HABEAS CORPUS.

The instructions for the government of the United States army, 1863, define martial law as "simply military authority exercised in accordance with the laws and usages of war." It is proclaimed by the presence of a hostile army, and is the immediate and direct effect of occupation or conquest; suspending the civil and criminal law and the domestic government of the occupied place.

It supersedes all civil proceedings which conflict with it; Benet, Mil. Law; but does not necessarily supersede all such proceedings.

It extends, at least, to the camp, environs, and near field of military operations; 7 How. 83; 3 Mart. L. 530; 6 Am. Arch. 180; and see, also, 2 H. Bla. 165; 1 Term 549; 1 Knapp, P. C. 318; 13 How. 115; but does not extend to a neutral country; 1 Hill 877; 25 Wend. 483, 512, n. Nor in time of insurrection can it be applied to citizens in states in which the courts are open and their process unobstructed; 4 Wall. 2. It is founded on paramount necessity, and imposed by a military chief; 1 Kent 377, n. For any excess or abuse of the authority, the officer ordering and the person committing the act are liable as trespassers; 13 How. 115, 154; 1 Cowp. 180.

Martial law must be distinguished from military law. The latter is a rule of government for persons in military service only, but the former, when in force, is indiscriminately applied to all persons whatsoever; De Hart, Mil. Law. 17. See Benet; Hopwood, Mil. and Mart. Law; Birkheimer, Mil. L.; Hall, Int. Law; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 347; 1 Lieb. Civ. Lib. 180; McArthur, Courts Mart. 34; 29 L. Mag. & Rev. 24; Tytl. L. 531; 7 How. 89; 15 id. 115; 10 Johns. 398; COURT MARTIAL; MILITARY LAW.

A type of military jurisdiction under the Constitution of the United States to be exercised in time of invasion or insurrection within the limits of the United States, or during rebellion within the limits of states maintaining adhesion to the National Government, when the public danger requires its exercise. Martial law is called into action by Congress, or temporarily, when the action of Congress cannot be invited, and in the case of justifying or excusing peril, by the President, in times of insurrection or invasion, or of civil or foreign war, within districts or localities where ordinary law no longer adequately secures public safety and private rights. 4 Wall. MARYLAND. One of the thirteen original states of the Union.

The territory of Maryland was included in the grants previously made to companies formed for the settlement of Virginia. Out of these Virginia grants Maryland was granted by Charles the First, on the 20th of June, 1632, to Cecilius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore. The first settlement under the authority of Lord Baltimore was made on the 27th of March, 1634, in what is now St. Mary's county. Some settlements were previously made on Kent Island, under the authority of Virginia.

During its colonial period, Maryland was governed, with slight interruptions, by the lord proprietary, under its charter, and, in 1776, in Cromwell's time the government of Maryland was assumed by commissioners acting under the commonwealth of England; but in a few years Lord Baltimore was restored to his full powers, and remained undisturbed until the revolution of 1788, when the government was seized by the crown, and not restored to the proprietary till 1795. From this period there was no interruption to the proprietary rule until the revolution.

The territorial limits of Maryland were somewhat obscurely described in the charter; and long disputes arose about the boundaries, in the adjustment of which this state was reduced to her present limits.

The lines dividing Maryland from Pennsylvania and Delaware were fixed under an agreement between Thomas and Richard Penn and Lord Baltimore. See DELAWARE.

By this agreement, the rights of grantees under the respective charters were fixed, and provision made for confirming the titles by the government in whose jurisdiction the lands granted were situated. The boundary between Maryland and Virginia has never been finally settled. Maryland claimed to the south branch of the Potomac; but Virginia has held to the north branch, and exercised jurisdiction up to that line. The rights of the citizens of the respective states to fish and navigate the waters which divide Maryland and Virginia were fixed by compact between the two states in 1785.

The first constitution of this state was adopted on the eighth day of November, 1776.

Mash. Mash used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor and not potable is not an intoxicating liquor. (225 Ill. App. 610.) However its possession is prohibited under section 25 of the National Prohibition Act, if designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violating the Act, or if it has been so used. Thorpe, National and State Prohibition, 154.

MASOCHISM. A form of sex perversion which is the gratification of the sexual instinct by suffering pain, in contrast to sadism which is the gratification of sexual desire by inflicting pain. In both cases the pain may be physical resulting in the mutilation of the victim or the subject; or psychical resulting in the so-called "symbolic" sadism or masochism. Masochism in religion is shown in self-mutilation, penance, martyrdom, asceticism, and the emphasis upon meekness, resignation and self-abnegation. Bridges, Outline Abn. Psych., 73, 83. See SADISM.

MASON AND DIXON'S LINE. The boundary line between Pennsylvania on the north and Maryland on the south, celebrated before the extinction of slavery as the line of demarcation between the slave and the free states. See DELAWARE.

It was named after two Englishmen who surveyed it in 1763-87. English.

MASSACHUSETTS. One of the original thirteen states of the United States of America.

The first important settlement on the territory of Massachusetts was made by the sect of Brownists or Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth in 1620. On March 4, 1629, Charles granted a charter to the Puritans under the name of "The Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England." This charter did not include the Plymouth colony which remained separate until 1691. The charter of 1629 continued till 1694, when it was adjudged forfeited. From this time till 1691, governors appointed by the king ruled the colony. In 1691, William and Mary granted a new charter, by which the colonies of Massachusetts Bay and New Plymouth, the province of Maine, and the territory called Nova Scotia, and the tract lying between Nova Scotia and Maine were incorporated into one government, by the name of the Province of Massachusetts Bay. 1 Story, Const. § 71. This charter, amended in 1726, continued until the adoption of the state constitution in 1780, which was drafted by John Adams. 4 Adams, Life and Works 218. It contained a provision for calling a convention for its revision or amendment in 1795, if two-thirds of the voters at an election held for this purpose should be in favor of it. Const. Mass. c. 8, art. x. But at that time a majority of the voters opposed any revision; Bradford's Hist. Mass. 294; and the constitution continued without amendment till 1820, when a convention was called for revising or amending it. Mass. Stat. 1820, c. 15. This convention proposed fourteen amendments, nine of which were accepted by the people.

The constitution, as originally drafted, consists of two parts, one entitled A Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the other The Frame of Government.

The name of the state is the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

MASS. Religious ceremonies or observances of the Roman Catholic Church.

The celebration of the eucharist of Lord's Supper as a sacrament instituted by Christ and as a sacrifice presenting the true body and blood of Christ under the appearance of bread and wine; the holy communion and its celebration; the name used in the Roman Catholic Church. Stand. Dict.

The "mass" is the sacrifice in the sacrament of the Eucharist, or the consecration and oblation of the Host. It is a public service, a public act of worship, by which, according to the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, the priest who celebrates it helps the living and obtains rest for the dead. 114 Ky. 388, 70 S. W. 1074.

Under a will devising the residue of an estate for charitable purposes, masses were held to come within the religious or pious uses which are upheld as public charities. [1897] 2 I. R. 426; 134 Mass. 427; 14 Allen 553; but see 108 N. Y. 316, where a bequest to be applied for the purpose of having prayers offered in any Roman Catholic church selected by the executors was held void because there was no defined beneficiary. See, generally, 82 Alb. L. J. 387.

MASTER AND SERVANT. The relation of master and servant exists between one who not only prescribes to the workman the end of his work, but directs, or at any moment may direct the means also, or retains the power of controlling the work; 4 E. & B. 570; 24 L. J. Q. B. 138; and one who is engaged, "not merely in doing work or service for him, but who is in his service, usually upon or about the premises of his employer, and subject to his direction and control therein, and who is, generally, liable to be dismissed"; 59 Ala. 51; for misconduct or disobedience of orders; 50 Ill. App. 513.

Where the hiring is for a definite term of service the master is entitled to the labor of the servants during the whole term, and may recover damages against anyone who entices them away or harbors them knowing them to be in his service; Sm. M. & S. 156; 6 Term 221; 13 Johns. 822; 2 E. & B. 216; 107 Mass. 555. See ENTICER.

A master may justify an assault in defence of his servant and a servant of his master; the master because he has an interest in his servant not to be deprived of his service; the servant because it is a part of his duty, for which he receives his wages, to stand by and defend his master; 1 Bla. Com. 429; Loft 215. A master may give moderate corporal punishment to his menial servant while under age; 2 Kent 261. See ASSAULT; APPRENTICESHIP; CORRECTION.

The master may dismiss a servant before the expiration of the term for which he is hired, for immoral conduct, wilful disobedience, or habitual neglect, and the servant will not in such case be entitled to his wages; 4 C. & P. 518; 155 Pa. 87; 159 id. 579; 82 Mo. 599; 7 Fed. Rep. 642; 11 Q. B. 742; 34 La. Ann. 426; 42 Wis. 311; 63 Ga. 755; but if the dismissal be without reasonable cause, the servant may recover damages from his master therefor, to such an amount as will indemnify him for the loss of wages during the time necessarily spent in obtaining a fresh situation, and for the loss of the excess of any wages contracted for above the usual rate; 2 H. L. 607; 20 E. L. & Eq. 157; 110 N. C. 858; see 13 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 72. Any adequate cause for the dismissal of an employee known to the employer at the time thereof will justify the same, whether assigned or not, or though a different cause is assigned; 40 Ill. App. 840; or the cause may not have been known at the time of discharge; 70 Miss. 234. The statute 5 Eliz. c. 4, required a master, in certain cases, to satisfy two justices of the peace that he had reasonable and sufficient cause for putting away his servant. It was repealed by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, s. 17.

Where a servant, after being discharged, sues for a breach of the contract of hiring before the termination of the period covered thereby, he can recover damages, up to, but not after, the time of the trial; 139 Ill. 67; see 81 Fed. Rep. 284; and such recovery will be a bar to any subsequent action upon the same contract; 38 Mo. 312.

When a servant becomes disabled from performing the duties of his contract, such contract is dissolved and the master may discharge him; 13 Misc. Rep. 115; 29 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 522. An express agreement in the contract of employment that the work must be done to the satisfaction of the master, entitles him to discharge the servant for bad work at his discretion and constitutes the master the sole judge of the sufficiency or the quality of the work; 94 Mich. 496; 53 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1156; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 362; and the testimony of the master that he is dissatisfied is decisive against evidence that he should be satisfied; 29 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 219; but see 16 N. Y. Suppl. 853. The retention of the servant after his work becomes unsatisfactory is not a condonation and will not prevent a subsequent discharge for the same cause; 59 Ill. App. 236; and where such improperly performed services are accepted by the master as not in full compliance with the contract, but as the best he can get toward a performance, he may in a subsequent action by the employee for services recoup damages for breach of the contract; 21 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 430. The question whether such services are accepted as a full compliance with the contract is for the jury; id.; as is the question whether the discharge of the servant is for a reasonable cause; 42 Ill. App. 230. Where the servant was discharged for conduct which did not justify his dismissal, but there was other sufficient ground therefor, not known to the master at the time, it was held that the dismissal could be justified by proof of the after-discovered fact; 39 Ch. Div. 339.

Where the facts are undisputed, the right of the master to discharge his servant is a question of law; 83 Hun 168. A contract of employment for an indefinite period may be terminated by either party at any time; 23 N. Y. Suppl. 1009; 27 id. 351; but one employed for a definite period cannot be discharged through a mere caprice, but only on fair and reasonable grounds; 23 id. 119; 143 Pa. 406; 44 Ill. App. 359. Merely because business was dull was held not to be a just cause for dismissal when the services were properly performed; 18 N. Y. Suppl. 596; nor were slight deviations from the master's instructions in immaterial matters after the master had retained his servant for a considerable length of time thereafter without complaint; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 873; nor was the destruction by fire of the master's factory; 63 L. T. 756. Where a servant was illegally discharged and voluntarily sent in a written resignation which was accepted by his employer, it was held that he could not afterwards sue on the contract of service, even though his resignation were solely because of his illegal discharge; 53 N. J. L. 607. One cannot by a decree of court be compelled to retain another in his service; 62 Ill. App. 334; and equity will not compel a master to keep a servant in his employment who for any cause is not acceptable to him, nor will it compel employees to continue in the employment of their master; 24 U. S. App. 229.

When the employment contract requires notice before leaving, under penalty of forfeiture of wages, the return of the employee on the day following does not oblige the master to restore the employment and will not enable the servant to recover the forfeited wages; 18 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 262; and the master has been held entitled to substantial damages for a refusal of his servants to perform their duties under a contract providing for two weeks' notice on either side; 70 L. T. R. 116. By statute in many of the states it is enacted that where the contract of employment requires notice by the employee under penalty of forfeiture of wages, the employer shall be liable for a like amount for dismissal of the servant without the same notice, unless in case of a general suspension of labor in his shop or factory, and in Massachusetts by act of 1895 the latter clause has been stricken out of the law. See FORFEITURE; WAGES.

Where four partners agreed to employ the plaintiff as manager for a certain time and before the end of the period two of the partners retired and the other two were not willing to continue the employment, it was held that the dissolution of the partners amounted to a wrongful dismissal of the servant but that he was only entitled to nominal damages; [1895] 2 Q. B. 353.

In Minnesota and Wyoming a master may not require the surrender of any of the rights of citizenship of his servants, or discharge them because of their nomination for an election, or interfere in the matter of their nomination in any way; and in nearly all of the states it is a criminal offense for the master to threaten to discharge his servant, or to reduce his wages, or to promise to give him higher wages, or otherwise to attempt to influence a voter to give or withhold his vote. In Tennessee absence for voting is declared no violation of the employment contract for personal services, and every contract designed to keep employees from the polls is declared void; Stimson, Lab. L. 117 and statutes there cited.

The master is bound to provide necessities for an infant servant unable to provide for himself; 2 Campb. 630; 1 Leach 187; 1 Bla. Com. 427, n.; but not to furnish him with medical attendance and medicines during the illness; 4 C. & P. 80; 7 Vt. 76.

The master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed by him in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved; L. R. 2 Ex. 259; 80 L. J. Ex. 147. Such liability springs out of the relation itself and does not depend on the stipulations of their contract. Within the scope of his authority, the servant may be said to be the medium through which the master acts; it follows, as a general rule, that for the tortious acts of the servant, the master is liable; 42 Ark. 458; 118 U. S. 824; 2 Wheat. 345; 11 Bush 465; 25 Ill. App. 521; 19 Wend. 345; 40 E. L. & Eq. 329; 26 Vt. 178; 155 Mass. 104; 75 Hun 68; 160 Pa. 300; 63 Conn. 155; 98 Mich. 1; although contrary to his express orders, if not done in wilful disobedience of those orders; 14 How. 468; 7 Cush. 385; 10 Ill. 509; 132 U. S. 518; see 65 Hun 619.

The reason for this rule has been ably expounded by Shaw, C. J., in the leading American case on this subject: "Every man, in the management of his own affairs, whether by himself or by his agents or servants, shall so conduct them as not to injure another; and if he does not, and another thereby sustains damage, he must answer for it." 4 Metc. 49; followed in 3 Macq. 316. But this case was decided on another point involving the question of the liability of a master for the negligence of a fellow servant, as to which see infra.

The master is not liable for acts committed out of the course of his employment; 20 Conn. 284; 17 Mass. 508; 150 id. 319; 69 Miss. 723; 37 W. Va. 606; 16 E. L. & Eq. 448; 83 Hun 8; nor for the wilful trespasses of his servants; 1 East 106; 24 Conn. 40; 1 Sm. Ind. 455; 3 Mich. 519; unless committed by his command or with his assent; 8 Ind. 312; 2 Stra. 985.

The master is bound to furnish suitable means and resources to accomplish the work; 73 Wis. 406; 136 Ind. 445; 79 Me. 404; 110 Mass. 240; 120 id. 268; 95 Pa. 211; 69 N. Y. 878; 81 Ohio St. 479; 72 N. Y. 607; 53 Tex. 206; 65 Mo. 223; 100 U. S. 218; 37 E. L. & Eq. 281; to exercise ordinary care to provide his servants a reasonably safe place for work; 85 Fed. Rep. 333; 81 id. 679; 81 Kan. 596; 66 Wis. 520; 34 Minn. 321; 60 Mich. 501; 143 Mass. 197; 48 N. Y. Supr. Ct. 156; 84 Wis. 418; to use ordinary care to keep machinery in a safe condition, and he is not relieved from that obligation by delegating the management of a machine to a servant; 146 Mass. 586. But it has been held that he is only bound to furnish means and resources which to his own knowledge are not defective; 16 C. B. N. S. 669; 33 L. J. C. P. 329; and that he is not bound to furnish the newest, safest, and best appliances for the use of his employees, nor is he an insurer of their safety; he may furnish such appliances as are ordinarily sufficient for the purpose intended, and such as can, with reasonable care, be used without danger; 79 Me. 404; 50 Conn. 488; 74 Ind. 440; 84 Mich. 289; 65 Cal. 96; 123 N. Y. 276; 92 Pa. 376; 171 id. 581; 109 Ill. 814; 186 Mass. 1. He is not liable for hidden defects of which he had no knowledge; 4 Ill. App. 533; nor for known defects, unless they are such as, by the exercise of due care, he might have known to be dangerous; 1 id. 510; and the mere fact of injury received by the servant raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the master; 86 W. Va. 232; see 113 Mo. 170; 69 Miss. 648; but it has been held that an employee has a right to suppose that his master has used reasonable care in guarding against defects in appliances furnished for his use; 88 W. Va. 546; and see 128 Pa. 294, where it was held that though better machinery existed, yet, if the machine by which the servant was injured was in general use and if reasonably safe when prudently used, the master was not liable; 92 id. 276. In order to hold an employer liable for injuries caused by the dangerous condition of a building, the servant must allege distinctly both that the master knew of the danger and the servant was ignorant of it; 13 Q. B. D. 259; 18 id. 685; 56 L. J. Q. B. 340. In an action by an employee for damages resulting from the negligence of his employer in furnishing defective appliances, it is no defence to show that he might have been injured in the same manner if the appliances had been in good condition; 48 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 681. If the servant knows that he is running a risk, through defective machinery or otherwise, he cannot recover for injuries; 39 Ill. App. 642; 58 id. 83, 250; 59 id. 260; 112 U. S. 377; 71 Fed. Rep. 143; 148 N. Y. 373, reversing 26 N. Y. S. 1010; Vann, J., dissenting; 48 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 961; 34 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 872; 46 Neb. 556; 34 S. W. (Tex.) 298; 72 Fed. Rep. 250; 165 Mass. 267, 368; 164 id. 282; 91 Wis. 208; 65 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 667; 142 Ind. 596; 165 Mass. 233; 38 N. Y. Suppl. 591; 74 Fed. Rep. 186; but see 21 Can. S. C. R. 581; 98 Ala. 578. An employee assumes the ordinary risks of his employment; 68 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1053; 89 Ga. 318; and also risks arising from unsafe premises which are known to him or apparent and obvious to persons of his experience and understanding if he voluntarily enters into the employment or after he enters makes no complaint or objection; 68 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1058. "The adult servant is presumed to possess ordinary intelligence, judgment, and discretion to appreciate such dangers incident to his employment as are open and obvious, and knowledge of them on his part will be presumed or imputed to him as matter of law; 88 Wis. 442; and the master is not bound to warn him of such danger;" 47 N. Y. S. 521.

This presumption is strengthened when the servant is also an expert in his employment; 76 Wis. 136, where the whole subject is considered and the authorities collected. An employee who under such circumstances is injured by reason of a defect in a tube easily discoverable, is guilty of contributory negligence; 88 id. 442; if he have a thorough knowledge of the risk and voluntarily undertakes it; 63 L. T. 287.

Where a person without fault is placed in a situation of danger, he is not to be held to the exercise of the same care and caution that prudent persons would exercise where no danger was present, nor is he guilty of contributory negligence because he fails to make the most judicious choice between hazards presented; the question is not what a careful person would do under ordinary circumstances, but what he might reasonably be expected to do in the presence of the peril, and is for the jury; 45 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 559; as is the question of contributory negligence and of whether one had assumed the risk who is injured whilst obeying the order of a foreman; 12 U. S. App. 534.

The mere knowledge and assent of an immediate superior, to a violation by an employee of a known rule of a company, will not as a matter of law relieve the employee from the consequences of such violation; 19 U. S. App. 586. See 63 Fed. Rep. 231; but one obeying orders of a superior does not assume the risk of the latter's negligence; 21 S. W. Rep. (Ala.) 440. If the servant, knowing a defect existed, gave notice to his employer of it, and was promised that it would be remedied, and continued his work in reliance on this promise, he is not, in law, guilty of contributory negligence; 100 U. S. 213; 17 Col. 280; 1 U. S. App. 96; 7 id. 359; 44 Ill. App. 466. See 185 U. S. 554; 65 Ark. 483.

Fellow Servant. The relation of the fellow servant has been defined thus: "Those who engage in the same common pursuit under the same general control." Cooley, Torts 541, n. 1. All who serve the same master; work under the same control; derive authority and compensation from the same common source; are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it. 32 Ind. 411; L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 326; 39 N. Y. 468; 2 Thomp. Negl. 1026. "All servants in the employ of the same master, subject to the same general control, paid from a common fund, and engaged in promoting or accomplishing the same common object." Beach, Contrib. Neg. 338. Those who have in view a general common object. L. R. 1 Q. B. 149, 155; 35 L. J. Q. B. 23. By the Texas act of 1893 the essential requirements are: 1. That they be engaged in the common service; 2, in the same grade of employment; 3, be working together at the same time and place; 4, be working for a common purpose. See FELLOW SERVANT.

Where a master uses due diligence in the selection of competent and trusty servants, and furnishes them with suitable means to perform the service in which he employs them, he is not answerable to one of them for an injury received by him in consequence of the carelessness of another while both are engaged in the same service; 4 Metc. 49; 3 M. & W. 1; 100 U. S. 213; 154 Pa. 130; 88 N. Y. 146; 46 N. Y. Supp. 137; 59 Fed. Rep. 626; 84 Ky. 79; 56 Ga. 645; 27 W. Va. 145; 59 Tex. 334; 68 Cal. 225; 46 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 624; 3 Col. 499. The reasons for the rule have been thus stated: "In considering the rights and obligations arising out of particular relations, it is competent for courts of justice to regard considerations of policy and general convenience, and to draw from them such rules as will, in their practical application, best promote the safety and security of all parties concerned. Where several persons are employed in the conduct of one common enterprise or undertaking, and the safety of each depends to a great extent on the care and skill with which each other shall perform his appropriate duty, each is generally an observer of the conduct of the others, can give notice of any misconduct, incapacity, or neglect of duty, and leave the service if the common employer will not take such precautions and employ such agents as the safety of the whole party may require. By these means the safety of each will be more effectually secured than could be done by a resort to the common employer for indemnity in case of loss by the negligence of each other." 4 Metc. 49. The rule does not extend to the exemption of the servants from liability to a fellow servant for his negligence; 22 Minn. 185; 58 Ind. 121; 130 Mass. 102; 11 Ex. 832; L. R. 3 Exch. D. 341. See 112 U. S. 377, for a review of the origin of the doctrine as to fellow servants.

If the master is negligent, the concurring negligence of a fellow servant is no defence; 40 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1080. Where the employer knew, or ought to have known, that a servant was incompetent, the former is liable to a fellow servant for the negligence of the incompetent servant; 181 Pa. 497.

Vice Principal. If the master entrusts the entire supervision of his business, or of a distinct department, to his employee, such an employee may be termed a general vice principal, for whose negligence the master is liable; but if he entrusts only the discharge of his absolute personal duties, such as to employ competent co-workers, to an employee, the latter may be termed a special vice principal, for whose negligence only in the discharge of these absolute personal duties the master becomes liable; 19 U. S. App. 245.

The "shift boss" in a mine whose business it is to direct miners where to work, when performing that duty, acts in the capacity of master or vice principal and if he knows of a concealed danger, such as an unexploded blast, at the place where he sets a miner to work, of the existence of which the latter is ignorant and unable with ordinary care to ascertain and does not inform him thereof, the master is liable; 95 Wis. 308.

The test in determining what is a vice principal seems to be not from the grade or rank of the service, but from the character of the act performed; 53 N. Y. 549; 110 Mass. 240; McKenney, Fellow Serv. § 23. It has been held by some courts that a servant who is a vice principal, or who acts in the place of the master, is not a fellow servant with those beneath him, or, in other words, that the master is responsible to inferior servants for the act of their superiors; 19 U. S. App. 245; 88 Mo. 360; 85 Tenn. 227; 84 N. C. 309; 36 Ohio St. 221; 3 id. 201; 78 Va. 745; 69 Ga. 137; 44 Ia. 134; 103 Ill. 288; 9 Bush 81; 93 Ill. 302; s. c. 34 Am. Rep. 168; 19 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 652; 59 Fed. Rep. 394; 65 Vt. 553; 6 C. C. App. 205, 636; 100 U. S. 214; 112 id. 377; 48 Fed. Rep. 62; 51 id. 182. On the other hand this broad doctrine has been denied in some jurisdictions; 88 N. Y. 511; 78 Me. 217; 96 Pa. 240; 112 id. 72; 129 Mass. 268; 48 Kan. 120; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 326; L. R. 10 Q. B. 62; 20 Md. 212; 98 Ind. 282; 42 Mich. 84; 32 Minn. 54; 51 Cal. 255. Another rule, established in some jurisdictions, is that in any extensive business, divided into distinct departments, a laborer in one department is not a fellow servant with a laborer in another and separate department; 30 Ga. 150; 9 Heisk. 37; 77 Ill. 391. And this rule has also been denied by some courts, except in cases where the master has surrendered the oversight of the department and put it in the hands of an agent; 67 Tex. 597; 129 Mass. 268; 112 Pa. 400; 65 Md. 438; 42 Mich. 84; 14 Minn. 360.

The rule as to fellow servants depends on the law of the place where the accident occurs; 79 Fed. Rep. 934; 32 id. 893; 41 id. 667; but see 51 id. 182. The decisions on the whole subject are said to be in inextricable confusion; 30 Am. L. Rev. 840.

Who are fellow servants. The following are held to be fellow servants: Baggage master and switch tender; 83 Minn. 218; boatswain and stevedore; 30 Fed. Rep. 878; brakeman and car inspector; 46 Ark. 555; brakeman and conductor taking engineer's place on a locomotive; 53 Mich. 57; laborer in a tunnel and an employee who provided him with tools; 39 N. J. L. 117; brakeman and fireman; 49 Mich. 497; director of brakeman and brakeman; 71 Mo. 104; brakeman and station master; 119 Mass. 419; brakeman and station agent; 69 Wis. 188; fireman and switch tender; 88 N. Y. 481; brakeman and train despatcher; 73 Ind. 77, brakeman and conductor; 186 Mass. 1 (contra, 71 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 776); 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 70; mate and common sailor; 17 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 517; captain and the crew; [1892] 1 Q. B. 58; snow shoveller and conductor; 54 Wis. 226; tunnel repairer and trainman; 103 Ind. 305; agent and manager of express company and an ordinary employee; 35 Wis. 458; mine boss and a driver boy; 112 Pa. 567; mine boss and miner; id. 72; runner of an hoisting engine and men in shaft; 14 Fed. Rep. 833; engineer and brakeman; 15 Lea 145; brakeman on a regular train and the conductor on a wild train; 167 U. S. 48; a winchman and a man working in the hold of a vessel; 79 Fed. Rep. 979; conductor and engineer of a railroad train and an employee of the same company riding on a hand car; 90 id. 260; conductor and train hand; 27 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 278; a section hand unloading ties from a train and a section foreman temporarily in charge of a train; 71 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 464; gang boss on a railroad and those employed under him; 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843 (reversing 51 Fed. Rep. 162, Fuller, C. J., and Field and Harlan, JJ., dissenting); a motorman and a track repairer; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 1006; motor man and track foreman; 26 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 923; an engineer and a switchman; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 564; though employed and discharged by different superiors; id.

Where a mining corporation is under the control of a manager, and is divided into three departments, each with a superintendent under the general manager, and in one of the departments there are several gangs of workmen, the foreman of one of these gangs, whether he has or has not authority to engage and discharge the men under him, is a fellow servant with them; 168 U. S. 86.

The following have been held not to be fellow servants: Wheel-inspector and baggage man and train hands; 34 Fed. Rep. 616; engineer and boiler repairer; 109 Pa. 296; brakeman and road master; 31 Kan. 197; brakeman and track repairer; 4 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 339; captain and sailor; 47 Wis. 602; pilot and servants on a vessel; 10 Q. B. 125; mate and deck hand; 18 Fed. Rep. 625; pilot and deck hand; 23 id. 413; mining captain and laborer; 50 Mich. 179; superintendent and employee; 57 Cal. 20; general manager and train despatcher and brakeman; 23 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 453; train despatcher and conductor; 8 id. 162; a floor man in charge of work and a man working under him; 45 N. Y. Supp. 234; a conductor and train hand; 7 Ohio Dec. 206; an engineer and a porter; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 199; engineer and brakeman; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 70; the foreman of a section crew and an engineer of a train not connected with the work of the section men; 67 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 447; the trainmen of a railroad company and the employees of another company over whose road the train is run; 32 N. Y. Supp. 627; the conductor of a train and trainmen; 112 U. S. 377; conductor and engineer; id. Bradley, Matthews, Gray, and Blatchford, JJ., dissenting.

The sending of one's servant to work for another and to be under the immediate control of the latter's foreman, does not thereby make him a fellow servant of the other employees, and he can have no recovery for injuries occasioned by their negligence; 44 N. Y. Supp. 234.

See 30 Am. L. Rev. 840; 2 Harv. L. Rev. 212; 40 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 766.

The English "Employers Liability Act" of 1890 has been a model for many similar acts in America, and is as follows:

"Where, after the commencement of this act, personal injury is caused to a workman—

(1) By reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant, connected with or used in the business of the employer; or (2) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence; or (3) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer, to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed, or (4) by reason of the act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to the rules or by-laws of the employer, or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf; or (5) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, points, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway, the workman, or in case the injury results in his death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman, or in the service of the employer, or engaged in his work."

The statutes passed in many of the states are usually not so sweeping as the English Act. Such acts are now in force in Alabama, Arkansas, California, the Dakotas, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Rhode Island, Texas, Wisconsin, Wyoming. There are also provisions to the same effect in the Constitutions of Mississippi and South Carolina.

The Prussian law up to June, 1881, recognized the doctrine of the non-liability of the employer, but the commercial code has made the employer liable in case of carriage by land or water. As to the liability of the master on the continent of Europe, generally, see 9 Jurid. Rev. 249.

MASTER IN CHANCERY. An officer of a court of chancery, who acts as an assistant to the chancellor. 3 Edw. Ch. 458; 19 Ill. 131.

A master in chancery is an officer appointed by a court to assist it in various proceedings incidental to the progress of the case before it, and is usually employed to take and state accounts, to take and report testimony, and to perform such duties as require computation of interest, the value of annuities, the amount of damages in particular cases, the auditing and ascertaining of liens upon property involved, and similar services. The information which he may communicate by his findings in such cases, upon the evidence presented to him, is merely advisory to the court, which it may accept and act upon, or disregard in whole or in part, according to its own judgment as to the weight of the evidence; 104 U. S. 420.

The masters were originally clerks associated with the chancellor, to discharge some of the more mechanical duties of his office. They were called preceptors, and gradually increased in number until there were twelve of them. They obtained the title of master in the reign of Edw. III. Their office was mainly judicial in its character, but sometimes included ministerial offices. See 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 390-397; 1 Harr. Ch. 436; 1 Bail. Ch. 77; 1 Des. Ch. 357. The office was abolished in England by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 26, and the United States officers of this name exist in many of the states with similar powers to those exercised by the English masters, but variously modified, restricted, and enlarged by statute, and in some of the states similar officers are called commissioners and by other titles.

The master's office is a branch of the court and he has power to control the proceedings of parties before him; 3 Edw. Ch. 458.

It is not within the general province of a master to pass upon all the issues in an equity case, nor is it competent for the court to refer the entire decision of a case to him without the consent of the parties. It cannot, of its own motion, or upon the request of one party, abdicate its duty to determine by its own judgment the controversy presented, and devolve that duty upon any of its officers; Field, J., in 129 U. S. 524. But when the parties consent to the reference of a case to a master to hear and decide all the issues therein and such reference is entered as a rule of the court, the determinations of the master are not subject to be set aside and disregarded at the mere discretion of the court. A reference by consent of parties of an entire case, though not strictly a submission of the controversy to arbitration—a proceeding which is governed by special rule—is a submission of the controversy to a tribunal of the parties' own selection, to be governed in its conduct by the rules applicable to the administration of justice in tribunals established by law. Its findings, like those of an independent tribunal, are to be taken as presumptively correct, to be reviewed under the reservation contained in the consent and order of the court, when there has been manifest error in the consideration given to the evidence, or in the application of the law, but not otherwise; id.

The reference of a whole case to a master has become in late years a matter of more common occurrence than formerly, though it has always been within the power of a court of chancery, with the consent of both parties, to order such a reference; 1 Sim. 134. The power is incident to all courts of superior jurisdiction; 97 U. S. 581; and is covered in most of the states by statutes; 129 U. S. 525, followed in 144 U. S. 585; 145 U. S. 132; 155 U. S. 637.

In most jurisdictions, where an action is properly in equity, the court has a right to refer it to a master, without consent of parties; 25 La. 380; and such was the regular practice in Pennsylvania until recent rules, made by the supreme court, required equity cases to be tried by the judges in open court on voir dire testimony.

The duties of the masters are, generally; first, to take accounts and make computations; 18 How. 295; 2 Munf. 129; 14 Vt. 501; Walk. Ch. 532; second, to make inquiries and report facts; 3 W. & M. 238; 3 Paige 303; 23 Conn. 529; 1 Stockt. Ch. 809; 2 Jones, Eq. 238; 5 Gray 423; 5 Cal. 90; third, to perform some special ministerial acts directed by the court, such as the sale of property; 11 Humphr. 278; 25 Barb. 440; settlement of deeds; see 1 Cow. 711; appointment of new trustees, and the like; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 488; fourth, to discharge such duties as are specially charged upon them by statute.

In the federal courts the judges are prohibited by statute from appointing as masters any relation within the degree of first cousin; 1 Fed. Rep. 81; or except when special reasons exist therefor, a clerk of a federal court; 20 Stat. L. ch. 415; but consent of parties is held to be sufficient special reason; 3 Cliff. 146; 1 Fed. Rep. 91; Rule 75.

Cases in which reference to the master should be ordered are: Where inquiries as to compensation or damages do not involve such complexity of facts or amounts as to require an issue; 17 Ala. 295; to ascertain what are "usual covenants" according to local usages; 17 N. J. Eq. 216; where plaintiff in a bill for specific performance, shows his right to a conveyance, but the defendant by sale or otherwise, has put it out of his power to convey; 1 Cow. 711; to settle the account in cases involving mixed questions of law and fact; 1 Hall 590; to inquire into the true value of the property at the time of sale, where an application was to reform a deed made by trustees in relation to trust property where the rights of infants were concerned; 18 How. Pr. 512; to ascertain the damages suffered by defendant by reason of an injunction, where the plaintiff failed to maintain his cause or discontinued it; 19 How. Pr. 413; to ascertain whether property given to a child on marriage was intended as an advancement in marriage, or as payment of a legacy; 2 M'Cord, Ch. 268; to ascertain the intention of the parties where the main issue was a latent ambiguity in a lease of coal lands, and a decree was reversed after but little inquiry below upon this point; 18 Gratt. 304. Where a controversy in equity turns upon facts and involves a variety of circumstances, it should be referred to a master to sift the testimony and collate and report the facts; 58 Pa. 186; and a court of chancery ought not to decide upon accounts mutually existing and controverted between the parties without reference to a master; 1 Hen. & M. 543.

A court of chancery may direct the reference of a case to the master with authority to examine the defendant on oath, and such an examination will have the effect of an answer; 3 Rand. 434.

Cases which should not be referred to a master are: Where, on the settlement of a long account between the parties, the court has facts enough before it to strike the true balance, and both parties do not agree to or ask for reference; 3 Woodb. & M. 277; where the evidence is all written, and a decree can be rendered without difficulty; 9 Port. 79; where it was sought to charge the heirs with a debt of their father, and it was necessary to decide whether the heirs had received assets; 18 Ark. 118; to ascertain the amount due on a promissory note; 3 Ill. 545; where the issue is distinctly raised by the pleadings and testimony taken; 1 Hoffm. Ch. 312; on a bill for a specific performance of a contract of sale where the nature of the title distinctly appears; 4 Dessaus. 536.

Orders of reference to a master should specify the principles on which the accounts are to be taken, or the inquiry proceeds, so far as the court shall have decided thereon; and the examinations before the master should be limited to such matters within the order as the principles of the decree or order shall render necessary; 2 Johns. Ch. 495. In an order of reference to a master, the defendant may be directed to produce before the master "all books, papers and writings, in his custody or power," and may be examined on oath upon such interrogatories as the master may direct, relative to the subject-matters of the reference; 2 Johns. Ch. 513. Where upon an order to deliver over books, papers, etc., the court intends to permit it to be done upon his own ex parte affidavit merely, he is directed, generally, "to produce and deliver the same on oath," but when the party is directed to produce and deliver them on oath "before a master" or "under the direction of a master," it is that all parties interested may examine as to the full and fair compliance with the order; 2 Paige 432. And the master should, in such a case, afford reasonable time for such examination to be made, and interrogatories to the party to be framed; id. Where an order of reference to make preliminary inquiries preparatory to a hearing upon the merits is not an order of course, under some rule of court, and is not assented to by all parties interested, such order can be obtained only by special application to the court upon due notice to all parties who have appeared and have an interest in the subject-matter; 6 Paige 178.

Where a case has been referred to a master, the consent of parties will not confer upon him authority to examine into a matter not charged in the bill; 2 Stor. 243; and if he report as to a matter not referred to him the report quoad hoc is a nullity; 5 Fla. 478.

It is his duty to report the facts, and not the mere evidence of facts, it being the province of the court to apply the law to the facts found and not to draw inferences of facts from the evidence; 26 Conn. 204. A master appointed to report the sum due on a mortgage is not authorized to decide on the title; 38 Me. 115.

A report of a master on facts submitted to him will be presumed to be true, and will not be reconsidered or set aside for an alleged mistake or abuse of authority, unless it is clearly shown and the correction is required in equity; 36 Me. 115.

It is improper for a master to perform any official act, as master, in a cause in which he is solicitor or a partner of the solicitor; Walk. Ch. Cas. 453. Where a question before the master is as to the value of certain property, he should form an independent judgment of his own, and the method of taking an average of estimates as a conclusion is tolerated only from necessity; 2 Jonas, Eq. 238.

A master cannot reopen a cause for further testimony after the closing of the proofs and the submission of his draft report to the parties, without special order from the court, which will be granted only on the ground of surprise, and under the same circumstances that would induce the court to make such an order before the hearing; 7 R. I. 81. Where a master has reported back a case in which he was or dared to take testimony, it is res adjudicata and the case will not be recommitted unless specific errors can be designated; 8 Woodb. & M. 157.

After the report is prepared, it is proper for the master to hear exceptions and correct his report, or if he disallows them, to report them to the court with the evidence; 12 Ill. 277; but he need not report all the testimony where the decretal order under which he acts does not require it; 52 Me. 182, 147. As to reporting evidence, see 6 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 872.

A matter may be referred to a master and his report received and confirmed all at the same term of the court; 3 Ala. 83; but the general practice is to permit the report to lie over to the term following on motion of either party; 1 Brock. 529.

A court of equity is not bound by the report of a master, but may confirm, modify, or reject it, as the issues in the suit must be decided by the court itself; 19 U. S. App. 477; but this finding both of fact and of law will be presumed to be correct; 155 U. S. 631; and will stand unless there is some obvious error in the application of the law or serious mistake in the consideration of the evidence; 144 U. S. 585; id. 104; 36 W. Va. 454. See 151 U. S. 285.

In practice it is not usual for the court to reject the report of a master, with his findings upon the matter referred to him, unless exceptions are taken to them and brought to its attention, and, upon examination, the findings are found unsupported or defective in some essential particular; 128 U. S. 617.

The court will not interfere with a report of a master upon a question of fact depending upon the credibility of witnesses, unless an error is clearly made to appear; 9 N. J. Eq. 309, 659; the report has not the position of a verdict on a motion for a new trial at law, but on exceptions on a question of fact it is only necessary to review and weigh the evidence; 18 N. J. Eq. 144; and it will not be overruled because the evidence is vague and conflicting, unless the conclusion is unwarranted by the evidence; id. The theory that it stands as a verdict obtains only when the findings are deductions from incorporated facts; 152 Pa. 42.

As to sales by masters, see 7 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 63, note.

As to when a decree founded on a master's report will be opened, see 4 Edw. C. 249; 6 Allen 457; and when reviewed, 6 N. Y. Chy. Reprint 527, note.

MASTER OF THE CROWN OFFICE. The queen's coroner and attorney in the criminal department of the court of queen's bench, who prosecutes at the relation of some private person or common informer, the crown being the nominal prosecutor. Stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20; Whart. Dict.

MASTER OF THE FACULTIES. An officer under the archbishop, who grants licenses, dispensations, etc. See COURT OF ARCHES. FACULTIES

MASTER OF THE HORSE. In England, this official was originally in actual charge of the royal stables. That, however, is now entrusted to a permanent official known as the Crown Equerry and Secretary to the Master of the Horse. The Master of the Horse, who is always a peer of high rank, is one of the three principal officers of the household, the first being the Lord Steward and when that functionary exists, and the second being the Lord Chamberlain. The Master of the Horse, like the Lord Chamberlain and other chief officers of the household, goes in and out with the Ministry. His chief present function is to attend the king on state occasions. Byrne.

MASTER OF THE MINT. In English Law. An officer who superintends everything belonging to the mint.

MASTER OF THE ORDNANCE. An officer, in England, to whose care all the royal ordnance and artillery were committed.

MASTER OF THE REVELS. See REVELS.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS. In English Law. An officer of chancery, who has the keeping of the rolls and grants which pass the great seal and the records of the chancery. He formerly exercised extensive judicial functions in a court ranking next to that of the lord chancellor.

An officer with this title existed in the time of the Conqueror. He had from most ancient times an office in chancery, with distinct clerks. In early times no judicial authority was conferred by an appointment as master of the rolls. In the reigns of Hen. VI. and Edw. IV. he was found sitting in a judicial capacity, and from 1683 to 1673, had the regulation of some branches of the business of the court. He was the chief of the masters in chancery; and his judicial functions, except those specially conferred by commission, appear to have properly belonged to him in this character. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 100, 287.

All orders and decrees made by him, except those appropriate to the great seal alone, were valid, unless discharged or altered by the lord chancellor; but had to be signed by him before enrolment; and he was especially directed to hear motions, pleas, demurrers, and the like. Stat. 3 Geo. II. c. 30; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 94; 3 Bla. Com. 442.

Under the Judicature Acts, the court of the master of the rolls has been abolished, but he is a judge of the high court, and sits as the head of one of the divisions of the court of appeal. He is no longer, of necessity, a chancery lawyer.

Provision is made for the abolition of this office when it shall become vacant, by order in council, on the recommendation of the council of judges, provided that such order in council be laid before the houses of parliament for thirty days, and during that time neither house address her majesty against it; Stat. 26 & 27 Vict. c. 60, §§ 4, 31, 32; Mozl. & W. Law Dict.

MASTER OF A SHIP. In Maritime Law. The commander or first officer of a merchant-ship; a captain.

Under the English Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the term master includes "every person (except a pilot) having command or charge of any ship."

A distinction is noted between the two-fold duties and functions of the master, those in which as shipmaster he is entrusted with the management and navigation of the ship, either as the co-partner of the owners or their confidential agent; MacLachlan, Merch. Ship. 184-186; and those in which as master mariner he is the officer in command on board; id. 203, 215.

The master of an American ship must be a citizen of the United States; 1 Stat. L. 287; and a similar requirement exists in most maritime states. In some countries their qualifications in point of skill and experience must be attested by examination by proper authorities. This is provided for in England under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, but in the United States the civil responsibility of the owners for their acts is deemed sufficient, although a license is required for the master of a steam vessel; U. S. Rev. Stat. § 436.

A vessel sailing without a competent master is deemed unseaworthy, and the owners are liable for any loss of cargo which may occur, but cannot recover on a policy of insurance in case of disaster; 21 How. 7, 23; 6 Cow. 270; 12 Johns. 128, 130; 21 N. Y. 378; Dexty, Sh. & Adm. § 232. One to whom the navigation, discipline, and control of a vessel is entrusted, must be considered as master, although another is registered as such; 59 Fed. Rep. 630. The owner of one half the legal title of a steamboat, who is the master in possession, and who is by written agreement entitled to such possession as master, is not liable to removal from his position as master; 133 U. S. 599.

The master is selected by the owners and is their confidential agent; 1 Wheat. 96; in case of his death or disability during the voyage, the mate succeeds; if he also dies in a foreign country, the consignee of the vessel, or the consul of the nation, may, in a case of necessity and in the absence of other authority, appoint a master; 49 Fed. Rep. 463. The master himself may, in similar circumstances of necessity and distance from the owners, appoint a substitute; 1 Pars. Mar. Law 387; 2 Sumn. 206; 13 Pet. 387. See 34 Barb. 419. During a temporary absence of the master, the mate succeeds; 2 Sumn. 588.

He must, at the commencement of the voyage, see that his ship is seaworthy and fully provided with the necessary ship's papers, and with all the necessary and customary requisites for navigation, as well as with a proper supply of provisions, stores, etc.; Bee 80; 2 Paine 291; 1 Pet. Adm. 219; Ware 454; for the voyage; 1 Pet. Adm. 407; 1 W. & M. 338. He must also make a contract with the seamen, if the voyage be a foreign one from the United States; 1 U. S. Stat. at L. 181; 2 id. 208. He must store safely under deck all goods shipped on board, unless by well-established custom or by express contract they are to be carried on deck; and he must stow them in the accustomed manner in order to prevent liability in case of damage. In respect to the lading or carriage of goods shipped as freight, he is required to use the greatest diligence; and his responsibility attaches from the moment of their receipt, whether on board, in his boat, or at the quay or beach; 3 Kent 206; Abb. Shipp. 424. He should acquaint himself with the laws of the country with which he is trading; 22 How. 491.

He must proceed on the voyage in which his vessel may be engaged by direction of the owners, must obey faithfully his instructions, and by all legal means promote the interest of the owners of the ship and cargo; 3 Cra. 242. On his arrival at a foreign port, he must at once deposit, with the United States consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, his ship's papers, which are returned to him when he receives his clearance; U. S. R. S. § 4309. This does not apply, however, to those vessels merely touching for advice; 9 How. 372. He must govern his crew and prevent improper exercise of authority by his subordinates; 2 Sumn. 1, 584; 14 Johns. 19. He must take all possible care of the cargo during the voyage, and, in case of stranding, shipwreck, or other disaster, must do all lawful acts which the safety of the ship and the interest of the owners of the ship and cargo require; Fland. Shipp. 190; 19 How. 150; 13 Pet. 387. It is proper, but not indispensable, in case of an accident, to note a protest thereof at the first port afterwards reached; 6 McLean 76; and to give information to the owners of the loss of the vessel as soon as he reasonably can; 4 Mas. 74. After stranding he must take all possible care of the cargo; 9 Wall. 682. In a port of refuge, he is not authorized to sell the cargo as damaged unless necessity be shown; but where it is so much injured as to endanger the ship, or will become utterly worthless, it is his duty to sell it at the place where the necessity arises; 1 Blatch. 357; 1 Story 342. When possible, he is bound to notify the owners before selling; 30 Me. 302; but he cannot sell after the completion of the voyage, when the owners of the cargo can be communicated with or readily reached; 38 Fed. Rep. 380. He may contract for definite salvage in case of emergency; 48 Fed. Rep. 925. And under certain circumstances he may even sell the vessel where she is in danger of destruction; 37 Fed. Rep. 371; but vessel and cargo can only be sold in case of urgent necessity; 13 Moo. P. C. 144; L. R. 6 C. P. 319. He should consult the owners if possible; failing that he should consult disinterested persons of skill and experience whose advice to sell would be strong evidence in justification of a sale; 6 Hall 27. While the master of a stranded vessel may, in case of urgent necessity, throw overboard or otherwise sacrifice his cargo to obtain the release of his vessel, he has no right to give it away; if he does, the donee takes no title to the property, but is liable therefor as bailee, and is bound to surrender it upon demand; 44 Fed. Rep. 481.

In time of war, he must avoid acts which will expose his vessel and cargo to seizure and confiscation, and must do all acts required for the safety of the vessel and cargo and the interests of their owners. In case of capture, he is bound to remain by the vessel until condemnation, or until recovery is hopeless; 3 Mas. 161. He must bring home from foreign ports destitute seamen; Act of Congr. Feb. 28, 1803, § 4; R. S. § 4578; and must retain from the wages of his crew hospital-money; Act of Congr. Mar. 3, 1875; R. S. § 4585. He is personally liable to seamen for their wages; 133 Mass. 135.

He is liable to the owners, and he and they to all others whose interests are affected by his acts, for want of reasonable skill, care, or prudence in the navigation or management of the vessel; 1 Wash. C. C. 142; including injuries done to the cargo by the crew; 1 Mas. 104; and this rule includes the improper discharge of a seaman; Ware 65.

His authority on shipboard is very great; Ware 506; but is of a civil character. He has a right to control and direct the efforts of the crew, and to use such force as may be necessary to enforce obedience to his lawful commands. He may even take life, if necessary, to suppress a mutiny. He may degrade officers; 1 Blatchf. & H. 195, 366; 1 Pet. Adm. 244; 4 Wash. C. C. 338; 2 C. Rob. 261. He may punish acts of insolence, disobedience, and insubordination, and such other offences, when he is required to do so for the safety and discipline of the ship. Flogging is, however, prohibited on merchant vessels; R. S. § 4611; and for any unreasonable, arbitrary, or brutal exercise of authority towards a seaman or passenger he is liable, criminally and in a civil suit; 4 U. S. Stat. L. 776, 1235. In all cases which will admit of the proper delay for inquiry, due inquiry should precede the act of punishment; 1 Hagg. 274, per Lord Stowell. He has a right to exact from his officers and crew not only a strict observance of all his lawful orders, but also a respectful demeanor towards himself; 22 Fed. Rep. 927. He may also restrain or even confine a passenger who refuses to submit to the necessary discipline of the ship; 3 Mas. 242; but, without conferring with the officers and entering the facts in the log-book, he can inflict no higher punishment on a passenger than a reprimand; 7 Pa. L. J. 77; 6 C. & P. 472; 1 Conkl. Adm. 430; 14 Johns. 119; Desty, Adm. § 129.

If the master has not funds for the necessary supplies, repairs, and uses of his ship when abroad, he may borrow money for that purpose on the credit of his owners; 3 Wash. C. C. 434; and if it cannot be procured on his and their personal credit, he may take up money on bottomry, or in extreme cases may pledge his cargo; 3 Mas. 235. His authority to act as the owner's agent is based on necessity and ceases when the latter is within reach of instructions; [1893] A. C. 38; 67 Mich. 264. He cannot bind owners to pay for repairs done at the home port without special authority; 47 Me. 254; 19 How. 22; nor when they or their agents are so near that communication can be had with them without delay; 81 Conn. 51; Abb. Shipp. 162; 3 Kent 49. The extent of his contracts must be confined to the necessities of the case; 38 Fed. Rep. 447. He has no authority to execute bottomry or any express hypothecation of the ship for differences in freights in favor of the charterer, or for his advances of charter money; 37 id. 436; 36 id. 919. See BOTTOMRY; RESPONDENTIA.

Generally, when contracting within the ordinary scope of his powers and duties, he is personally responsible, as well as his owners, when they are personally liable. On bottomry loans, however, there is ordinarily no personal liability in this country or in England, beyond the funds which come to the hands of the master or owners from the subject of the pledge; 6 Ben. 1; Abb. Sh. 90; Story, Ag. § 116, 123, 294. See 37 Fed. Rep. 436.

In most cases, too, the ship is bound for the performance of the master's contract; Ware 329; but all contracts of the master in chartering or freighting his vessel do not give such a lien; 19 How. 82.

Where the master of a ship is without fault during a period of detention resulting from seizure of the ship by legal process against the owner, he is entitled to wages on the terms of his contract, unless it stipulate to the contrary; 89 Ga. 660.

MASTER OF THE TEMPLE. The founder of the order of Knight Templars, and his successors, were called Magni Templi Magistri; and probably from hence he was the spiritual guide and director of the Temple.

The chief minister of the Temple Church in London is now called Master of the Temple. Jacob; Dugd. War. 706.

MASTERS AT COMMON LAW. In English Law. Officers of the superior courts of common law, whose duty is to tax costs, compute damages, take affidavits and the like. They are five in number in each court. See stat. 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vict. c. 90.

MASTERS' LIABILITY. (1) The liability of masters for injuries occurring to servants in the course of their employment, unless a servant assumes his own risk, or by his own act contributes to his injury, or unless the injury is due to the negligence of a fellow servant, in which case the fellow-servant is liable. 20 A. & E. Ency. 2nd ed., 54; vol. 12, p. 903. (2) Their liability for all injuries to third persons or to property, caused by the negligence of servants, if the act which results in the injury is done while a servant is acting within the scope of his employment in the master's service, though the act is not necessary to the performance of the servant's duties, and is not expressly authorized by the master, or known to him. See however, SERVANT'S LIABILITY. Id. vol. 20, p. 163. See EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY INSURANCE; ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

MATE. In Maritime Law. The officer next in rank to the master on board a merchant ship or vessel.

In such vessels there is always one mate, and sometimes a second, third, and fourth mate, according to the vessel's size and the trade in which she may be engaged. When the word mate is used without qualification, it always denotes the first mate; and the others are designated as above. On large ships the mate is frequently styled first officer, and the second and third mates, second and third officers. Pariah, Sea Off. Man. 68.

The mate, as well as the inferior officers and seamen, is a mariner, and entitled to sue in admiralty for his wages; and he has a lien on the vessel for his security. Even when he acts as master in consequence of the death of the appointed master, he can sue in the admiralty for his proper wages as mate, but not for the increased compensation to which he is entitled as acting master. And he is entitled, when sick, to be cured at the expense of the ship. The mate should possess a sufficient knowledge of navigation to take command of the ship and carry on the voyage in case of the death of the master; and it may well be doubted whether a vessel be seaworthy for a long voyage at sea when only the master is competent to navigate her; Blount, Com. Dig. 32; Dana, Seaman's Friend 146; Curtis, Rights and Duties of Merchant Seamen 96, note. It is the special duty of the mate to keep the log-book. The mate takes charge of the larboard watch at sea, and in port superintends the storage and breaking out of the cargo.

The mate succeeds, of course, to the station, rights, and authorities of the captain or master on the death of the latter, and he also has command, with the authority required by the exigencies of the case, during the temporary absence of the master. See Dana, Seaman's Friend; Pariah, Sea-Officer's Manual; Curtis, Rights and Duties of Merchant Seamen; Parsons, Maritime Law; Desty, Shipp. & Adm.; MASTER OF A SHIP.

MATELOTAGE. The hire of a ship or boat.

MATER FAMILIAS. In Civil Law. The mother of a family; the mistress of a family.

A chaste woman, married or single. Calvinus, Lex.

MATERIAL ALLEGATION. A "material allegation" is one essential to the claim or defense, and which could not be stricken from the pleading without leaving it insufficient. 12 Bush. (Ky.) 600.

A "material allegation" is one necessary to support the cause of action. Civil Code of Kentucky, § 127; 130 Ky. 41, 112 S. W. 328.

MATERIAL ALTERATION. See ALTERATION.

MATERIAL MEN. Persons who furnish materials to be used in the construction or erection of ships, houses, or buildings.

By the general maritime law, material men have a lien on a foreign ship for supplies or materials furnished for such ship; which may be enforced in the admiralty; Bened. Adm. 266; 9 Wheat. 409; 19 How. 359; 55 Fed. Rep. 523; 56 id. 237; but no such lien exists in the case of domestic ships; 4 Wheat. 438; 20 How. 393; 21 id. 248; except when authorized by statute. See LIEN.

By statutory provisions, material men have a lien on ships and buildings, in some of the states. See LIEN.

The term is now much used in connection with those who furnished supplies to railroad companies, as to which see RECEIVERS.

MATERIALITY. The property of substantial importance or influence, especially as distinguished from formal requirement. Capability of properly influencing the result of the trial.

MATERIALS. Matter which is intended to be used in the creation of a mechanical structure. 71 Pa. 293; 38 Wisc. 29. The physical part of that which has a physical existence.

The general property in materials furnished to a workman remains in the bailor where the contract is merely one for the employment of labor and services; otherwise where it is a sale. See BAILMENT; MANDATE; TROVER; TRESPASS.

MATERNA MATERNIS (Lat. from the mother to the mother's).

In French Law. A term denoting the descent of property of a deceased person derived from his mother to the relations on the mother's side.

MATERNAL. That which belongs to, or comes from, the mother: as, maternal authority, maternal relation, maternal estate, maternal line. See LINE.

MATERNITY. The state or condition of a mother.

It is either legitimate or natural. The former is the condition of the mother who has given birth to legitimate children; while the latter is the condition of her who has given birth to illegitimate children. Maternity is always certain; while the paternity is only presumed.

MATERTERA. A mother's sister.

MATERTERA MAGNA. A grandmother's sister.

MATERTERA MAJOR. A great-grandmother's sister.

MATIMA. A godmother.

MATRICIDE. The murder of one's mother.

MATRICULA. In Civil Law. A register in which are inscribed the names of persons who become members of an association or society. Dig. 50. 8. 1. In the ancient church there was matricula clericorum, which was a catalogue of the officiating clergy, and matricula pauperum, a list of the poor to be relieved; hence, to be entered in a university is to be matriculated.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. In the English ecclesiastical courts there are five kinds of causes which are classed under this head, viz.: causes for a malicious jactitation; suits for nullity of marriage, on account of fraud, incest, or other bar to the marriage; 2 Hagg. Cons. 433; suits for restitution of conjugal rights; suits for divorce on account of cruelty or adultery, or causes which have arisen since the marriage; suits for alimony.

Matrimonial causes were formerly a branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. By the Divorces Act of 1857, they passed under the cognizance of the court for divorce and matrimonial causes created by that act. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACTS. A series of English statutes relating to divorce and matrimonial causes. See Brett, Eng. Com. 958; 4 Chitty, Stat.

MATRIMONIAL DOMICIL. See DOMICIL; ALIEN; and see also 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 330; 2 Brett, Com. 957.

MATRIMONIUM. In Civil Law. A legal marriage. A marriage celebrated in conformity with the rules of the civil law was called justum matrimonium; the husband vir, the wife uxor. It was exclusively confined to Roman citizens, and to those to whom the conubium had been conceded. It alone produced the paternal power over the children, and the marital power—manus—over the wife. The farreum, the coemptio, or the usus, was indispensable for the formation of this marriage. See PATERFAMILIAS.

MATRIMONY. Marriage; the nuptial state. See MARRIAGE.

MATRIX ECCLESIA. The mother church.

A cathedral church, in respect of the parochial churches within the same diocese, or a parochial church, in respect of the chapels depending on her. Burrill; Cowell.

MATRON. A married woman.

MATRONS, JURY OF. See JURY OF WOMEN.

Whatever is perceptible by the senses; any material. Anderson. The subject of legal action, consideration, complaint or defence. Id. Some substantial or essential thing; opposed to form. Id.; 40 Ala. 148.

MATTER IN CONTROVERSY, OR IN DISPUTE. The subject of litigation, in the matter for which a suit is brought and upon which issue is joined. 1 Wall. 387.

To ascertain the matter in dispute we must recur to the foundation of the original controversy; the thing demanded, not the thing found; 8 Dall. 405. An appeal will not lie on a claim insufficient in amount to give jurisdiction when suit was instituted, but which has been brought within the limitation by the after-acquired interest; 3 La. Ann. 798; id. 911; 13 id. 87. See 3 Cra. 159; 1 S. & R. 269.

MATTER IN DEED. Such matter as may be proved or established by a deed or specialty. Matter of fact, in contradistinction to matter of law. Co. Litt. 320; Steph. Pl. 197.

MATTER OF FACT. In Pleading. Matter, the existence or truth of which is determined by the senses or by reasoning based upon their evidence. The decision of such matters is referred to the jury. Hob. 127; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 49.

MATTER OF FORM. That which relates merely to the form of an instrument or to its language, arrangement, or technicality, without affecting its substance.

An important distinction, in determining the sufficiency of pleadings and proceedings, is taken between matters of form and matters of substance. No definite general rule can be given for discriminating between these. The general principle is that whatever pertains to the purpose of the instrument, to the objects to be accomplished by it, or to any right involved or affected, is matter of substance; while what relates merely to the language or expression, without affecting the issue presented, the evidence requisite, the rights presented, the rights of either party, or the steps necessary to be taken in furtherance of the proceedings, is matter of form. The importance of this distinction relates chiefly to the effect attributable to errors and defects, which, in matters of form, may be amended or disregarded much more readily than when in the substance. Abbott.

MATTER IN ISSUE. That matter upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action, and which the defendant controverts by his pleadings. 15 N. H. 1. That ultimate fact or state of facts in dispute upon which the verdict or finding is predicated. 4 Fed. Rep. 396.

The disputed point or question. Anderson; 97 Ind. 432. A single, certain, and material point, arising out of the allegations or pleadings of the parties, and generally made by an affirmative and a negative. Id.; 5 Fet. (U. S.) * 149. When the parties come to a point which is affirmed on one side, and denied on the other, they are said to be "at issue." All debate is then contracted into a single point, which must be determined in favor of one of the parties. Id.; 3 Bl. Com. 313.

MATTER OF LAW. In Pleading. Matter, the truth or falsity of which is determined by the established rules of law or by reasoning based upon them. The decision of such matters is referred to the court. Where special pleading prevails, it is a rule that matter of law must be pleaded specially. The phrase here means matter which, if established as true, goes to defeat the plaintiff's charges by the effect of some rule of law, as distinguished from that which operates as a direct negative. See 70 N. C. 167.

MATTER IN PAIS (literally, matter in the country). Matter of fact, as distinguished from matter of law or matter of record.

MATTER OF RECORD. Those facts which may be proved by the production of a record. It differs from matter in deed, which consists of facts which may be proved by specialty.

MATTER SUBSEQUENT, IMPOSSIBLE BY. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

MATTER OF SUBSISTENCE FOR MAN. All articles or things, whether animal or vegetable, living or dead, which are used for food, and whether they are consumed in the form in which they are bought from the producer or only after undergoing a process of preparation. 19 Gratt. 818.

MATTER OF SUBSTANCE. That which goes to the merits.

See MATTER OF FORM.

MATURITY. The time when a bill or note becomes due. See DAYS OF GRACE.

MAXIM. An established principle or proposition. A principle of law universally admitted as being just and consonant with reason.

Maxims are said to have been of comparatively late origin in the Roman law. There are none in the Twelve Tables, and they appear but rarely in Gaius and the ante-Justinian fragments, or in the older English text-books and reports. The word maxim or maxima does not occur in the Corpus Juris in any meaning resembling that now borne by it; the nearest word in classical Roman law is regula; Fortescue identifies the two terms, and Du Cange defines maxima as recepta sententia, regula vulgo nostris et Anglie maxime. Doctor and Student defines maxims as "the foundations of the Law and the conclusions of reason, and therefore they ought not to be impugned, but always to be admitted." Coke says they are "a sure foundation or ground of art and a conclusion of reason, so sure and uncontrolled that they ought not to be questioned," and that a maxim is so called "quia maxima ejus dignitas et certissima auctoritas, atque quod maxime omnibus probetur." Co. Litt. 11a. He says in another place: "A maxim is a proposition to be of all men confessed and granted without proof, argument, or discourse." See 20 L. Quart. & Rev. 283.

Regula appears not to be quite the same thing as maxim. The Digest makes the line between regula, definitio, et sententia a narrow one. Sententia is used in several texts as equivalent to regula. Definitio, in Labeo, is really a rule of law. In Papinian it is more like responsa prudentis. In some editions of the Corpus Juris, maxims are given under the name of Regulae et Sententiae Juris. See 20 L. Mag. & Rev. 283. Maxims in law are said to be somewhat like axioms in geometry. 1 Bla. Com. 68. They are principles and authorities, and part of the general customs or common law of the land, and are of the same strength as acts of parliament, when the judges have determined what is a maxim. This determination belongs to the court and not the jury; Termes de la Ley Doct. & Stud. Dial. 1, c. 8; they prove themselves; id. Maxims of the law are holden for law, and all other cases that may be applied to them shall be taken for granted; Co. Litt. 11, 67. See Plowd. 27 b.

The alteration of any of the maxims of the common law is dangerous; 2 Inst. 210. See the introduction by W. F. Cooper to Barton's Maxims.

Later writers place less value on maxims; thus: "It seems to me that legal maxims in general are little more than pert headings of chapters. They are rather minims than maxims, for they give not a particularly great, but a particularly small, amount of information. As often as not the exceptions and qualifications to them are more important than the so-called rules." 2 Steph. Hist. of Cr. L. 94.

"We believe that not a single law maxim can be pointed out which is not obnoxious to objection." Towns. Sl. & Lib. § 88.

"Many of the sayings that are dignified by the name of maxims are nothing but the obiter dicta of ancient judges who were fond of sententious phrases, and sometimes sacrificed accuracy of definition to terseness of expression; and some have no definite meaning at all." E. Q. Keasbey, in 8 N. J. L. J. 160.

"Maxims are not all of equal value; some ought to be amended and others discarded altogether; they are neither definitions nor treatises; they require the test of careful analysis; they are in many instances merely guide-posts pointing to the right road, but not the road itself." Prof. Jeremiah Smith, in 9 Harv. L. Rev. 26.

"I need hardly repeat that I detest the attempt to fetter the law by maxims. They are almost invariably misleading; they are for the most part so large and general in their language that they always include something which really is not intended to be included in them." Lord Esher, M. R., in 19 Q. B. D. 653.

Maxims have been divided, as to their origin, into three classes: Roman, Roman modified, and indigenous; 20 L. Mag. & Rev. 383.

The application of the maxim to the case before the court is generally the only difficulty. The true method of making the application is to ascertain how the maxim arose, and to consider whether the case to which it is sought to be applied is of the same character, or whether it is an exception to an apparently general rule. This requires extended discussion, which it has received (so far as the more important maxims are concerned) in the able treatise on Legal Maxims by Broom.

Non ex regula ius sumatur, sed ex jure quod est regula fiat. The law should not be taken from maxims, but maxims from the law; 9 Jurid. Rev. 307.

The earliest work on maxims appears to have been that of Bacon (1630), followed by Noy (1641), Wingate (1658), Heath (Pleading, 1694), Francis (1728), Grounds and Rudiments of Law and Equity (anonymous, 1751, of which Francis was the author), Branch (1753), Loft (1770, in his Reports). In the present century, Broom (1845), Trayner (1872, 1883), Cotterell (1881, 1894), and Wharton's Dictionary (1848, 1892), Lawson (1883), Bell's Dictionary (Scotch, 1890), Peloubet (New York, 1890), Barton, Stimson, Morgan, Tayler, Hening, Halkerton, Jackson (Law Latin), and Hughes. See the various Law Dictionaries; also 15 West. Jur. 337; 13 Cr. L. Mag. 832; 5 L. Quart. Rev. 444.

The following list comprises, it is believed, all the legal maxims, commonly so called, together with some that are in reality nothing more than legal phrases, accompanied by a translation, and, in most cases, a reference to one or more authorities which are intended to show the origin or application of the rule. It is obvious that many of them are of slight value and that many of them are open to objections, so far as they can be considered to be statements of principles of law.

One may not innocently maim himself, and where he procures another to maim him, both are guilty; Co. Litt. 127 a; 17 Wend. 351, 352. The cutting or disabling or weakening a man's hand or finger, or striking out his eye or foretooth, or depriving him of those parts the loss of which abates his courage, are held to be mayhems; 7 Humphr. 161; Cl. Cr. L. 183. But cutting off the ear or nose, or the like, are not held to be mayhems at common law; 4 Bla. Com. 205; but see 9 Ala. 928. The injury must be permanent; 8 Port. 473; 30 La. Ann. 11, 1359; and if inflicted on an assailant in self-defence, it is not mayhem; 4 Blackf. 546.

Cr. L. § 432. Maim as used in the statutes is not equivalent to mayhem but to mutilate; McCl. Cr. L. § 432.

In London, York, and Dublin, he is called lord mayor. Wharton, Lex. But the power and authority which mayors possess, being given to them by local regulations, vary in different places.

By a resolution of congress, of the 14th of June, 1836, the secretary of the treasury is directed to cause a complete set of all weights and measures adopted as standards, and now either made or in the progress of manufacture, for the use of the several custom-houses and for other purposes, to be delivered to the governor of each state in the Union, or to such person as he may appoint, for the use of the states respectively, to the end that a uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the United States. The act of March 3, 1891, requires the same to be furnished to such agricultural colleges in every state as have received grants of land from the United States. The act of July 26, 1896, authorized the use of the French metric system of weights and measures in this country, and provided that no contract or dealing, or pleading in any court, shall be deemed invalid or liable to objection, because the weights or measures expressed or referred to therein are weights or measures of the metric system; Rev. Stat. § 3506. Annexed to § 3570, q. v., is a schedule which shall be recognized in the construction of contracts, and in all legal proceedings, as establishing, in terms of the weights and measures now in use in the United States, the equivalent of the weights and measures expressed therein in terms of the metric system. See infra, MEASURE.

METRIC SYSTEM. The fundamental, invariable, and standard measure, by which all weights and measures are formed, is called the mètre, a word derived from the Greek, which signifies measure. It is a linear measure, and is equal to 3 feet, 0 inches, 11 44-1000th lines, or 39.37 inches, or 39.37 centimeters, English. This unit is divided into ten parts; each tenth, into ten hundredths; each hundredth, into ten thousandths, etc. These divisions, as well as those of all other measures, are infinite. As the standard measure, something has been sought from which to make it, which is not variable or subject to any change. The fundamental base of the mètre is the quarter of the terrestrial meridian, or the distance from the pole to the equator, which has been divided into ten millions of equal parts, one of which is the length of the mètre. All the other measures are formed from the mètre, as follows:—

CAPACITY. The litre. This is the cubic decimètre, or the cube of one-tenth part of a mètre. This is divided by tenths, as the mètre. The measures which amount to more than a single litre are counted by tens, hundreds, thousands, etc., of litres.

WEIGHT. The gramme. This is the weight of a cubic centimetre of distilled water at the temperature of 4° above zero Centigrade.

SURFACE. The are, used in surveying. This is a square, the sides of which are of the length of ten mètres, or what is equal to one hundred square mètres. Its divisions are the same as in the preceding measure, and are to be indicated as follows:—

SOLIDITY. The stère, used in measuring firewood. It is a cubic mètre. Its subdivisions are similar to the preceding. For the measure of other things, the term cube mètre, or cubic mètre, is used, or the tenth, hundredth, etc., of such a cube.

MONEY. The franc weighs five grammes. It is made out of nine-tenths of silver and one-tenth of copper. Its tenth part is called a decime, and its hundredth part a centime.

As already stated, the divisions of these measures are all uniform, namely, by tens, or decimal fractions; they may, therefore, be written as such, instead of writing,

1 mètre and 1-tenth of a mètre, we may write, 1 m. 1.

2 mètres and 8-tenths, —2 m. 8.

10 mètres and 4-hundredths, —10 m. 04.

7 litres, 1-tenth, and 3-hundredths, —7 lit. 12, etc.

Names have been given to each of these divisions of the principal unit; but these names always indicate the value of the fraction and the unit from which it is derived. To the name of the unit have been prefixed deci, for tenth, centi, for hundredth, and milli, for thousandth. They are thus expressed: a decimètre, a décillitre, a décigramme, a décistère, a décare, a centimètre, a centillitre, a centigramme, etc. The facility with which the divisions of the unit are reduced to the same expression is very apparent; this cannot be done with any other kind of measures.

As it may sometimes be necessary to express great quantities of units, collections have been made of them in tens, hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, etc., to which prefixes derived from the Greek have been given, namely, deca, for tens; hecto, for hundreds; kilo, for thousands; and myria, for tens of thousands; they are thus expressed: a decimètre, a decistère, etc.; a hectare, a hectogramme, etc.; a kilomètre, a kilogramme, etc.

The above act of congress gives the equivalents thus:—

The Mètre is 39.37 in.

Litre is .068 quart, dry measure, or 1.0667 quart, wine measure.

Are is 119.6 square yards.

Gramme is 15.432 grains avoirdupois.

The Stère is 35.317 cubic feet.

As to certain measures under Mexican grants, see 161 U. S. 219.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES. In Practice. A rule or method by which the damage sustained is to be estimated or measured. Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 29.

It is the duty of the judge to explain to the jurors, as a matter of law, the footing upon which they should calculate their damages, if their verdict is for the plaintiff. This footing or scheme is called the "measure of damages;" Poll. Torts 27.

The defendant is to make compensation for all the natural and proximate consequences of his wrong, but not for secondary or remote consequences. There are cases in which this principle of compensation is departed from; as, where exemplary damages are awarded, or double or treble damages are allowed by statute. But, in general, the law seeks to give compensation.

Value is in most cases the real measure of compensation and it is a fundamental principle that market value is resorted to not as a test, but only as an aid in getting at the real value, the latter being the true measure of a recovery, whether it be property, time, labor, or service which were affected by the contract or tort which is the subject matter of the action; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. §§ 242, 243.

The compensation awarded may be based upon, (1) pecuniary loss, direct or indirect; (2) physical pain; (3) mental suffering; to which have been added the value of the time required for the enforcement of the plaintiff's rights and his actual expenses incurred in so doing. There may be also in the case of injuries resulting from design, malice, or fraud, the sense of wrong or injury to one's feelings which is in some cases taken into consideration as a proper subject of compensation. See Hale, Dam. 86; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 37. The injuries for which compensation may be recovered are stated generally to include all those which affect any right protected by the common law where they are the direct result of actionable wrong. They may be to property, family relations, reputation, or the person,—whether affecting the body or mind or personal freedom of action; id. § 39.

Pecuniary compensation includes every kind of damage which can be measured by money value; 71 Md. 185. Such loss is almost always an element to be considered and in most cases the primary one; Hale, Dam. 87. So important is the idea of compensation that it is laid down as the fundamental rule of the measure of damages that the recovery must be "by way of compensation for loss and not to punish the wrong doer;" 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 380. The test is compensation, not restitution, and beyond this it is rarely possible to lay down any general rule; Poll. Torts 180. This idea of compensation which lies at the root of the subject, may be illustrated by cases of the most diverse character. The measure of damages for failing to fulfil a covenant which the other party performs, is what it cost to fulfil it; 123 Pa. 381; in a trespass for an injury to the realty, by the inadvertent removal of part of coal, it is its value as part of the realty, and not as a chattel after its removal; 20 So. Rep. (Ala.) 918; for illegal diversion of water by an upper riparian owner, it is the cost of enough water to take the place of that unlawfully diverted; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 563; for a breach of contract to return borrowed stock, it is the price of the stock at the time of the refusal to return it; 184 Pa. 318. In an action of replevin for wrongful detention, the value of its use during detention may be recovered, although ordinarily the damages would be the interest on its value while detained; 38 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 482. Where an attorney undertakes for a client a search of records for liens and overlooks a lien, his client, a mortgagee, who has thereupon loaned money on what was supposed to be a first lien upon real estate, may recover from the attorney the difference in value between a first lien and the lien which the client got; 180 Pa. 532. The amount stolen from a safe, warranted burglar proof, may be recovered in an action for breach of the warranty; 69 Ill. App. 106. Breach of contract to make a loan on a demand note secured by mortgage, to take up an existing lien, renders the lender liable for damages caused by foreclosure of the latter, although ordinarily there is no recovery for breach of contract to make a demand loan; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 375; and where a reasonable sum was stipulated for as liquidated damages for the breach of agreement to loan money, such stipulation will be enforced; 21 id. 94. The compensation is not necessarily for actual loss or expense. In many cases there may be a recovery for the amount of expenditure proper to be made and charged where the service was, in fact, gratuitous, as in the case of services of physicians and nurses which cost the plaintiff nothing, and for which he is held entitled to recover upon the ground that he recovers not for their cost but for their value; 127 Ind. 1; 79 Fed. Rep. 291; contra, 61 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 79, where it was held that the recovery could only be for expense incurred.

The other essential requisite is that the amount is determined, not by the actual loss, but only that which is the natural result of the act complained of, or as its consequence may be presumed to have been in contemplation of the parties. This rule was established by the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, in which the application of the principle was to a suit against a carrier; 9 Exch. 841; 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 502; 8 id. 405. Remote, contingent, or speculative damages will not be allowed, but only such as naturally flow from the breach of the contract; 46 Fed. Rep. 40. The principle of Hadley v. Baxendale, however, is held to cover damages resulting from the failure of the plaintiff to comply with other contracts, made upon the faith of his contract with the defendant, for the breach of which he sues, where the fact of his having made such other contracts was known to the defendant; 20 Q. B. D. 96. See CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR, which is particularly to be noted in connection with claims for damages based upon physical pain and inconvenience.

As to mental suffering, see that title.

With regard to the measure of damages, the same principles are, to a great extent, applicable to cases of contract and tort; Poll. Torts 529; 9 P. Div. 113. Where the action is for breach of contract, the damages are limited to what may reasonably be considered to have been contemplated by the parties at the time of making it as likely to arise from a breach; 94 Wis. 44. They may include, however, gains prevented, as well as losses sustained, if certain, and reasonably to be expected; 48 Neb. 910. They are measured by the loss which results from the breach and not the sum of money or property involved in the transaction; [1897] 1 Q. B. 692. As a general rule, the contract itself furnishes the measure of damages.

In an action of tort based upon negligence in the performance of a contractual obligation without malice, the damages would be substantially the same as for breach of contract under the same circumstances; 9 App. D. C. 455.

There are dicta to the effect that a more liberal rule of damages should be applied in cases of tort than of contract; 42 Wis. 23; 11 Mich. 542; but they are contrary to the general current of authority which is in favor of applying the same principles to both classes of cases; 53 N. Y. 211, 210; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 429, note a.

While the rule which affords the measure of damages is to be supplied by the court, the amount is a question for the jury, and unless the damages are so excessive as to lead to the conclusion of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury, the court cannot interfere with their verdict; 52 Fed. Rep. 87.

Damages should not exceed the amount claimed; but cases have been known in which the verdict was in excess of the amount claimed, and the court has amended the statement of claim to enable it to enter judgment on the verdict; Poll. Torts 180; but this is said to be an extreme use of the power of the court; id.; 43 Ch. Div.

327. Where there is uncertainty as to the measure of damages, the rule is to give the lowest sum; 63 Pa. 324.

"Estimates of value made by friendly witnesses, with no practical illustrations to support them, are too unsafe, as a rule, to be made the basis of a judicial award." 166 U. S. 134.

The measure of compensation allowed as damages has been somewhat definitely fixed, as to many classes of cases, by rules of decision, many of which are important and well established.

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT. The right of action in this case is entirely statutory. At common law no civil action could be maintained, but such an action was given in England in 1846 by Lord Campbell's Act, and similar statutes exist in most of the United States. For a collation of statutes see Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act c. 9.

These statutes are held constitutional even where applicable to one class of corporations; 93 Ky. 233; 33 N. H. 215. See 75 Ala. 449; 4 Col. 162; 24 Ga. 358. By some courts they are construed strictly as being remedial; in others strictly as in derogation of common law; Hale, Dam. § 129; Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act c. 2, § 72, where the cases are collected. These statutes are said to operate not by way of exception or repeal of the common law, but to create an action totally new in species, quality, principle; Blackburn, L. J., in 10 App. Cas. 59. This bears upon the measure of damages. It has been said that life is to be regarded as property to be compensated for "without regard to past earnings or capacity to earn at time of death;" 67 Pa. 300; but this case is severely criticised as unsound reasoning; 2 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 572, where it is remarked that at common law life was not property, and no civil action lay for its loss, which "rule has only been modified by this statute, under which juries are allowed to give, in most states, damages for pecuniary injuries only." These pecuniary damages embrace: (1) Present pecuniary loss; (2) prospective pecuniary loss; (3) the interest of one who would presumably derive pecuniary benefit from the services of the deceased. Any case may involve one or all of these elements. Present pecuniary loss is based upon actual compensation for loss to the time of action, and although the action is maintainable only where it might have been brought by the deceased if he survived, the measure of damages rests upon different principles. The deceased might have recovered both for pecuniary loss and his pain and suffering, physical and mental, while his representatives recover only for the injury to his family resulting from his death; 18 Q. B. 93; 23 N. Y. 465; and not for his suffering, medical attendance, funeral expenses, loss of society of husband or wife, and the like; 2 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 573, citing cases. See 83 Fed. Rep. 82. Prospective pecuniary loss is based on a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the life of the deceased; 8 H. & N. 211; 60 Md. 449; 66 N. C. 154; 74 Wis. 562. It is what the deceased would have probably earned during the residue of his life, taking into consideration his age, condition, ability, disposition, habits, and expenditures, without any solatium for distress of mind; Sharswood, J., in 57 Pa. 335, 358; 86 Tenn. 348; 29 Gratt. 431; 86 N. Y. 641; and no account can be taken of income from investments; 47 N. J. L. 28.

In the third class of cases damages are allowed to a husband for the loss of a wife's services, not her society; 11 Can. 422; to a wife for the loss of support; id.; for the same reason to a child during minority; 47 N. Y. 317; 89 Wis. 613; 85 Minn. 84; 129 Ill. 91; 76 Cal. 240; and on the weight of authority, for the expectation of pecuniary benefit after majority; 110 N. Y. 504; 84 Cal. 515; 83 Minn. 518; and if the statute is in favor of the estate of the deceased, the damages are not limited to the minority of a child; 73 Ind. 253; 85 Ia. 468; to a parent for the loss of a child to the extent of the pecuniary value of his services during minority; 71 Md. 573; 97 Mo. 253; 82 W. Va. 370; to the next of kin if dependent on the deceased for support; 43 Ill. 338; but not otherwise for nominal damages; 83 Kan. 543; 7 Ohio St. 836; 71 Md. 578. Exemplary damages cannot generally be given, but in some states they are expressly authorized, either generally or under special circumstances set forth in the act. Hale, Meas. Dam. § 128.

In estimating the damages in these cases, the expectation of life may be reckoned; 91 Ala. 543; 19 Kan. 88; 85 Ia. 167. See LIFE TABLES.

As to the measure of damages in this action, generally, see 60 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 178, 219; 1 C. C. A. 83; 28 Am. L. Reg. 385, 518, 577; for the death of a child; 29 Cent. L. J. 253; value of human limbs; 27 Can. L. J. 417.

NEGOTIABLE PAPER. In suits on negotiable paper the measure of damages is its face value with interest from the breach. Sedg. Elem. Dam. 240; 6 Cow. 484; 38 Ind. 360; 9 Wis. 503. The value of a note is prima facie the amount secured; 120 N. Y. 134; 69 Me. 484; 23 Mo. 252; 31 Vt. 570. Formerly it was said that interest was only recoverable as damages allowable at the discretion of the jury; 2 B. & Ald. 305; 3 Campb. 296; W. N. (1887) 184. It was early settled that interest, as a matter of law, could not be given without an express or implied contract for its payment; 2 B. & C. 348. The present rule is said to be that in England it is allowed on commercial paper; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 291; and that in the United States the jury should be instructed to give it; 2 id. § 699; id. § 325; 5 Cow. 587, 610; 79 N. C. 122. Where interest is provided for in the paper the recovery is under the contract and not as damages, and there has been much conflict as to whether in case of non-payment at maturity interest thereafter is payable as interest at the contract rate or as damages at the statutory rate. The former view is supported upon the doctrine of an implied contract to pay the stipulated rate after maturity; 74 Ind. 158; 94 id. 178; 144 Mass. 448; 88 Ohio St. 575; 38 Mich. 662. Following the latter view—the statutory rate; 67 Me. 145; 63 Cal. 503; 42 Conn. 570; 23 Minn. 84; 8 Wend. 550; 43 N. Y. 244 (but contra, 4 Johns. Ch. 436; 19 Hun 87); 63 Md. 484; 5 W. & S. 51; L. R. 7 H. L. 27; 14 Ch. D. 49 (contra, 3 C. B. N. S. 144). See 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 325 n., where the authorities are collected and the conclusion stated that the weight of authority is in favor of the latter position, which is also sustained by the supreme court as its own rule when not controlled by local law; 100 U. S. 72. See 96 id. 51.

If there is an intention expressed it prevails, whatever may be the form of words used; 68 Me. 80; 25 Ch. D. 338; 84 N. Y. 471; 79 Mo. 226; 10 R. I. 299; 2 Kan. 88; 18 S. C. 141; id. 600. Where a higher rate after maturity is expressed it is generally allowed; 91 Ill. 609; 38 Ark. 416; 66 Me. 282; L. R. 2 Eq. 221; 15 U. C. C. P. 360; but not by some courts, on the theory that it is a penalty; 11 Mo. 547; 24 Minn. 48. It is said that the question properly rests upon the doctrine of liquidated damages, but that the courts have not generally so held; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 331.

In most of the states there are statutory provisions for damages upon protested paper, ranging as to foreign bills from five to twenty per cent; and on bills payable in another state there are varying rates, some statutes making discriminations between states or groups of states, based, apparently, upon contiguity, or extent of business relations and the like. For a summary of the provisions of these statutes, see 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 4758.

CARRIERS. Upon a total failure to deliver goods, the carrier is liable for the value of the goods at their place of destination, with interest from the time they should have been delivered, deducting the freight; 12 S. & R. 186; 94 N. H. 297; 1 Cal. 108; 10 La. An. 412; 9 Rich. So. C. 465; 46 N. Y. 463; 74 Ill. 249; 28 Ohio St. 358; 87 Ill. 195; 84 Mo. 47; 27 Wis. 827; 8

Mo. App. 27; 98 Mass. 550; 41 Miss. 671; 36 Ga. 122; 13 Md. 164; 43 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 72. Upon a failure to take the goods at all for transportation, he is liable for the difference between the value at the place of shipment and at the place of destination, less his freight; or, if another conveyance can be found, the difference between the freight agreed on with defendant and the sum (if greater) which the shipper would be compelled to pay another carrier; 1 Abb. Adm. 119; 58 Barb. 216; 56 Penn. 331; 34 Mich. 439. Upon a delay to deliver the goods, the plaintiff is entitled to an indemnity for his loss incurred by the delay, taking into account any fall in the market occurring between the time when the property should have been delivered by the carrier and the time when it actually was; 34 Ill. 58; 1 Disn. 23; 64 Ill. 143; 20 Wis. 594; 106 Mass. 468; 48 N. H. 455; 47 N. Y. 29; 14 Mich. 489; 49 Vt. 255; or, in some cases, the additional price paid for goods required by him to take the place of the delayed goods; 90 Me. 193; 147 U. S. 591; Ang. Carr. § 490 a; in case of property for exhibition at a museum, the probable net profits; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 524; or in case of stock injured, the depreciation measured by market value at the place of destination; 63 Ark. 443; 33 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 704. The value of damaged goods may properly be determined by their sale at auction by the owner; 78 Fed. Rep. 155.

The measure of damages for a breach of a contract to transport freight by vessel, is the difference between the contract and the actual price of freight paid; 6 U. S. App. 581.

In modern times, the conditions which led to the adoption of the common law rule making a carrier an insurer having changed, it is very common to limit, by contract, the amount of the shipper's recovery. The effect of such contracts is to fix a valuation on the goods which shall be the measure of damages in case of loss, and to this the shipper is held; 112 U. S. 332; 70 N. Y. 410; 81 Pa. 315; 137 Mass. 39. Some courts, however, hold such contracts invalid; 88 Tenn. 320; this is upon the theory that it is in fact an exemption from liability for negligence which is not permitted; 17 Wall. 357. It is suggested that the true doctrine is that the carrier cannot himself limit the damages, but that a contract to do so, fairly made by both parties to it, should be sustained; 6 Mich. 242. See 9 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 334; 21 id. 125, 142.

LAND CONTRACTS. In actions for the breach of contracts for the sale of land where the vendor fails to convey, the English rule limits the damages to the amount advanced with interest and expenses incurred in examining the title. The rule dates back to Y. B. 30 Edw. III. 14 b.; but the leading case is Flureau v. Thornhill, 2 W. Bl. 1078. The rule was qualified by an exception, established in Hopkins v. Grazebrook, when the vendor knew of the defect in title; 6 B. & C. 31; but that case was discredited as authority and the earlier rule adhered to by the house of lords; L. R. 7 H. L. 159, affirming L. R. 6 Excheq. 59, which was followed in 88 Ch. D. 619. In American law there is great lack of harmony in the decisions, and a distinction is taken in many cases growing out of the motive of the party in default. The extreme English rule has been followed in Pennsylvania, and, apparently, even where there is fraud; 80 Pa. 413; see 11 id. 127; 67 id. 126. In other states a failure to convey for want of good title does not involve liability for the value of the bargain, unless there be fraud, bad faith, or other misconduct; 2 Bibb 415; 2 Wend. 599; 57 N. Y. 155; 69 id. 201; 9 Lea 111; 9 Md. 250; 54 id. 197; 29 Kan. 506; 5 Ia. 353; 56 id. 139; 17 Fla. 532; see 39 Minn. 326.

Knowledge of the defendant that the title was in a third person has been considered in some cases sufficient to warrant substantial damages; 40 N. Y. 59; and where the failure to convey was the result of the refusal of the wife to sign the deed, the same rule was applied, upon the theory that the vendor knew that it was doubtful if his wife would sign; 84 N. J. L. 858; 78 Ill. 322. In a case of contract by the defendant to sell the lands of another which he had contracted to purchase, and failed to accomplish his object because the real owner could not make title, the judgment was reversed because the judge had charged in favor of substantial damages, and Cooley, J., held, upon a review of the cases, that Flureau v. Thornhill must be considered as established law, but that where a party acted in bad faith or sold what he did not own, such damages should be allowed; 21 Mich. 374.

In many jurisdictions what is sometimes called the rule of the United States Supreme Court is adhered to and the purchaser is held to be entitled to the difference between the amount he has agreed to pay and the value at the time of breach. This is the opposite extreme from the English rule. 6 Wheat. 109; 113 Mass. 538; 3 R. I. 187; 37 Ia. 134; 65 Me. 87; 29 La. Ann. 286; 35 Neb. 429; 37 Fed. Rep. 973; 145 U. S. 522; 37 Ill. App. 463; 7 Utah 113.

When the purchaser refuses to perform, the measure has been held, in England, to be the difference between the price fixed in the contract and the value of the land at the time fixed for the delivery of the deed; 7 M. & W. 474. But the rule does not appear to be well settled in this country.

The English rule has been followed by some courts; 51 N. H. 167; 101 Mass. 409; 67 Pa. 126; 20 Ohio St. 172; 86 Mich. 323. In some states where a deed has been tendered and refused, it is held that the contract price may be recovered in full; 17 Barb. 280 (the question having been left undecided in 5 Cow. 506); 4 Me. 258; 11 Ia. 161; contra, 1 Pugs. 185; see 21 Wend. 457; 18 Vt. 27. A purchaser in possession on an instalment contract of sale on eviction was held entitled to recover instalments made and cost of improvements; 109 Ala. 281; contra, if buildings were erected without the vendor's request; 59 N. J. L. 160.

One who has contracted for the right to purchase public land is entitled on a breach to the difference between the contract price and the saleable value of such right, and it is the vendor's duty to re-sell the right, or, failing this, to show its market value; 145 U. S. 522; evidence of particular sales of other real estate is not admissible to establish market value; 107 Pa. 460.

EVICITION. The damages recoverable for an eviction, in an action for breach of covenants of seisin and warranty in a deed, are the consideration-money, interest thereon, and the costs, if any, of defending the eviction.

This is not in accordance with the fundamental doctrine of the law of damages, but it is the rule in most of the states, and is sometimes termed the New York rule; 3 Cai. 111; 69 N. Y. 434; 4 Dall. 41; 27 Pa. 288; 2 McCord 413 (earlier decisions were contra; 1 Bay 19, 92, 265); 2 Leigh 451 (also after conflicting decisions, 3 Call 320; 1 Munf. 493); 82 Va. 769; 8 Humph. 647; 2 Bibb 273; 4 Dana 258; 8 Ohio 211; 14 id. 118; 1 Ark. 313, 323; 43 id. 439; 24 Ga. 533; 41 Ill. 413; 58 Ind. 392; 122 id. 272; 5 Ia. 287; 44 id. 249; 33 Cal. 299; 39 Cal. 380; 17 N. J. L. 304; 30 N. H. 531; 65 id. 18; 81 Miss. 433; 23 Mo. 437; 88 Minn. 24; 100 N. C. 75; 44 Tex. 400; 36 Md. 129, 150; 18 Nev. 360; 69 Ala. 502; 38 Kan. 765; 3 Ore. 83; 26 W. Va. 447; 64 Wis. 258; 8 U. C. Q. B. 191 (but see 13 U. C. C. P. 146); 18 La. 143; but the value of improvements may be recovered; 13 La. Ann. 512; and see as to Louisiana, 181 U. S. 191; though excludable by the New York rule; 4 Johns. 1. In Mississippi a vendee who has lost land by reason of a title paramount to his remote vendor may recover the amount which such remote vendor received for the land; 68 Miss. 161.

What is known as the New England rule establishes as the measure of damages the value of the land at the time of eviction, together with the expenses of the suit, etc., and this is followed in all the New England states, Quebec, and Michigan; 119 Mass. 500; 66 Me. 537; 14 Conn. 245; 12 Vt. 381; 30 id. 242; 61 Mich. 625; 6 Can. 425; and it is also recognized as the rule in England; 9 Q. B. D. 128.

Where a paramount title is purchased to prevent actual eviction the measure of damages is the price paid with interest; 59 Ark. 699; 61 Hun 427; 21 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 172; and where the breach alleged was the foreclosure of a mortgage, it is the amount paid to redeem the land and expenses of defending the title; 3 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 260; 17 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1014.

INCUMBRANCES. On a breach of a covenant in a deed against incumbrances, the purchaser is entitled to recover his expenses incurred in extinguishing the incumbrance, if that is practicable; 7 Johns. 358; 34 Me. 422; 4 Ind. 130; 109 Mass. 299; 7 R. I. 538; 51 Ill. 373; 41 Ia. 204; 48 N. Y. 532; 59 Mo. 488.

For a permanent incumbrance the compensation should be measured by the decreased value of the land; 20 N. Y. 191; 108 Mass. 175; 44 Conn. 312; but the amount is limited by the sum recoverable for a total loss of the land; 41 Ia. 204; 79 Ala. 346. If the incumbrance causes a total eviction the damages are the same as in other cases of eviction. See supra.

SALES. Where the seller of chattels fails to perform his agreement, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the article at the time and place fixed for delivery; 5 N. Y. 537; 107 id. 674; 3 Mich. 55; 35 id. 478; 4 Tex. 289; 12 Ill. 184; 3 Wheat. 200; 4 Me. 255; 6 McLean 102; 41 Miss. 383; 24 Wend. 322; 3 Col. 373; 48 Pa. 407; 147 id. 372; 33 Vt. 92; 82 Va. 614; 75 Ia. 550; 46 Mo. App. 539; 38 Ill. App. 91; 87 Ga. 333; 98 Cal. 676; 124 U. S. 64; 8 Q. B. 604; Benj. Sales § 758.

The same rule applies as to the deficiency where there is a part-delivery only; 16 Q. B. 941; 23 How. 149; 41 N. H. 86; 51 Pa. 175; 21 Pick. 378; 12 Wis. 276; 5 Hill 472; 2 Minn. 229. Where, however, the purchaser has paid the price in advance, some of the cases, particularly in England and New York, allow the highest market price up to the time of the trial; 27 Barb. 424; 26 Pa. 143; 13 Tex. 324. Where the purchaser refuses to take and pay for the goods, the seller may sell them fairly, and charge the buyer with the difference between the contract price and the best market price obtainable within a reasonable time after the refusal; 45 Ill. 79; 5 S. & R. 19; 30 N. Y. 549; 3 Metc. Ky. 555; 9 B. Mon. 69; 83 Me. 407; 55 Ark. 401; 67 Hun 38; 5 Tex. Civ. App. 415. See 147 Pa. 184. Where the goods are delivered and received, but do not correspond in quality with a warranty given, the vendee may recover the difference between the value of the goods delivered and the value they would have had if they had corresponded with the contract; 4 Gray 457; 5 Harr. 233; 26 Ga. 704; 21 Ill. 180; 29 Md. 142; 39 Me. 287; 14 N. Y. 597; 29 Ala. 538; 20 Ill. 184; 15 U. S. App. 218. But where the article is one which cannot be bought in the market (a machine), and it was not of the warranted capacity, it appearing that the vendee had contracted to supply the products of the machine, which he was unable to do because of the breach, and the facts were known to the vendor, the measure of damages is the difference between what it would have cost to fulfil his contracts and what the vendee would have received if he had not lost them by reason of the defects in the machine; or if the work was done by others, the difference between what it would have cost him to do the work and what he paid for having it done; 3 U. S. App. 631; 49 id. 438.

The measure of damages for breach of a contract to deliver articles, if they have no market value or cannot be had in the market where the delivery was to be made, is the additional cost and expense of obtaining them at the nearest market, or on the most advantageous terms; 117 Ind. 594.

Many courts allow the highest intermediate value between the breach and the end of the trial; 66 Ia. 116; 1 Nott. & McC. 394; 38 Ind. 127; but it is generally denied; 104 Mass. 259; 47 Wis. 406; 44 Md. 47; 119 Ill. 534; Hale, Dam. 186, 194, where the rule is discussed, with the authorities. This rule was originally adopted in New York as to chattel generally; 26 N. Y. 309. It was modified to exclude stock transactions on the ground that the highest intermediate value was not the natural and proximate result; 53 N. Y. 211. The rule of the last cited case is adopted by the United States supreme court; 129 U. S. 193. In Pennsylvania the rule is rejected in its general application; 5 W. & S. 106; but adopted in case of stocks; 53 Pa. 310; see 69 id. 403. In some cases it is left to the jury to allow any value between the highest value and that at the time of conversion; 69 Ala. 581; and in others, where the transaction is free from bad faith, value is taken at the time of conversion, with interest; 40 Miss. 352.

COLLISION. The general principle followed by the courts of admiralty in cases of collision between vessels is that the damages awarded against the offending vessel must be sufficient to restore the other to the condition she was in at the time of the collision, if restoration is practicable. Both damages to vessel and cargo are to be made good. But hypothetical and consequential damages are excluded. The loss of the use of the injured vessel while undergoing repairs is proper to be included. See 37 Fed. Rep. 148. If the injured vessel is a total loss, her market value at the time is the measure of damages. See Olc. 188, 246, 388, 444, 505; 13 How. 106; 17 id. 170; 2 Wall. Jr. 52; 6 McLean 238; 37 Fed. Rep. 270.

If the fault is equal on the part of both vessels, the loss is to be divided between them; 1 Sprague 128; 6 McLean 221; 14 Wall. 345; 21 Wall. 889; 37 Fed. Rep. 716; 60 id. 298; 58 id. 714; 122 U. S. 97.

For a total loss of cargo, its value at the place of shipment, or its cost, including expenses, charges, insurance, and interest, should be allowed; 11 U. S. App. 612; when part is recovered and sold, after expenses are incurred, the rule is to allow the difference between the market value of the goods, if uninjured, and the value in their damaged condition; d. The allowance of interest and costs in case of collision rests in the discretion of the lower court, and will not be disturbed on appeal; 123 U. S. 349.

CONTINUING TORTS. Ordinarily the damages which may be recovered for a tort include only compensation for the injury suffered to the time of suit, and the theory formerly acted upon was that each continuance of a trespass or a nuisance was a fresh one for which a new action would lie; 3 Bla. Com. 220; 1 Den. 257; 21 N. J. L. 469. The only remedy applied in such cases is that exemplary damages will be given, if, after one verdict against him, any one has the hardihood to continue it; 2 Selw. N. P. 1130. In cases, however, where the injury is of a nature to be permanent, it is held that entire damages may be recovered in one action; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 924; as where the trespass was the insertion of girders into a wall; 105 Pa. 400; or maintaining a brothel next to the plaintiff's dwelling-house; 72 Mo. 129.

The same principle is applied in actions for breach of contract by neglect of a continuing duty imposed by it. Each moment the neglect continues is a separate breach and is often considered and treated as a total breach for which the entire damage, past and prospective, may be recovered in one action, the judgment being a bar to any further suit; Hale, Dam. § 58; but not if the contract be divisible, as was held a contract to issue an annual pass renewable from year to year during the pleasure of the promisee; 51 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 576. Whether a tort is permanent or not is a question of fact to be determined according to circumstances; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 924; the presumption being that a wrong will not continue; 51 Ga. 878.

The question of the right to recover in one action of damage resulting from a continuing trespass, and to be protected by the judgment from further suit, is a very important one in connection with the exercise of the right of eminent domain under those modern constitutions which secure compensation for property damaged as well as for that taken.

As to property taken or injured for public use, see, generally, EMINENT DOMAIN; Sedg. Meas. Dam. ch. xxxvi.; Hale, Dam. 167; Harris, Dam.; 2 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 477; 5 Am. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 352, 366; 14 id. 207; change of grade; 4 Am. Ry. & Corp. Cas. 277; rights of landlords, tenants, and reversioners; 21 L. R. A. 212; 4 Am. Ry. & Corp. Cas. 744; benefit to of abutting property to rebut proof of damage; 129 N. Y. 576; 14 L. R. A. 344; patents, see that title.

Exemplary Damages. Those allowed as a punishment for torts committed with fraud, actual malice, or deliberate violence or oppression.

In nearly all of the states, in such cases, the jury are not confined to a strict compensation for the plaintiff's loss, but may, in assessing damages, allow an additional sum by way of punishment for the wrong done. This allowance is termed "smart money," or "exemplary," "vindictive," or "punitive" damages.

Some courts, however, have declined to recognize the doctrine; 4 Pick. 143; 21 id. 378 (and see 114 Mass. 518); 7 Col. 541; 11 Neb. 261; 64 Mich. 133; 56 N. H. 456, (overruling earlier cases).

Some other courts refuse punitive damages; but allow exemplary damages as compensatory or "indeterminate damages;" 81 W. Va. 220; 1 Wyo. 27; 11 Nev. 350; 2 L. C. J. 96; 20 id. 141; 4 R. I. 871. In some of these jurisdictions they are really allowed under the guise of compensation for mental suffering and the like.

"Whenever the injury complained of is the result of the fraud, malice or wilful or wanton act of the defendant, and the circumstances of the case are such as call for such damages, vindictive damages may be given. The general rule is that, when the injury has been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, and with circumstances of contumely or indignity, the jury are not restricted to actual damages, but may give such damages in addition thereto as the circumstances of the case seem to warrant, to deter others from like offences." Wood's Mayne, Dam. 56; Webb, Plif. Torts 219.

"All rules of damages are referred by the law to one of two heads, either compensation or punishment. Compensation is to make the injured party whole. Exemplary damages are something beyond this, and inflicted with a view not to compensate the plaintiff, but to punish the defendant." Per Dillon, Circ. J., in summing up before the jury; 1 Dill. 71.

It has been said that the distinction between exemplary damages, and damages given as special or extraordinary compensation, is one of words merely; and the effect of allowing the former is the same as that produced upon the theory of compensation, when this is extended to cover injury beyond the pecuniary loss; Hill, Torts 440; Field, Dam. 70.

The propriety of allowing damages to be given by way of punishment under any circumstances has been strenuously denied in many of the cases, and the question has given rise to extensive discussion; but the weight of authority is decidedly that such allowance, in a suitable case, is proper. In 44 Wis. 289, the court said: "The argument and consideration of this case have gone to confirm the present members of this court in their disapprobation of the rule of exemplary damages which they have inherited; but they... do not feel at liberty to change or modify the rule at so late a day, against the general current of authority elsewhere. If a change should now be made, it lies with the legislature, etc." See, also, 7 So. L. Rev. n. s. 675; 7 Jones, L. 64; 20 Am. Law. Reg. n. s. 573; 11 Nev. 360; 6 Cent. L. J. 74.

See note to Wood's Mayne, Dam. 17; Sedg.; Field, Damages; Green, Evidence.

Actual malice need not be shown if the act complained of was wantonly or recklessly done; 51 Ill. 407; 66 Hun 626; 1 Misc. Rep. 148; 61 Mo. App. 820; see 161 Pa. 553; or conceived in a spirit of mischief, or in evident disregard of the rights of others, or of civil or social obligations; 26 Conn. 416; 42 Miss. 607; Wood's Mayne, Dam. 59, note. In an action for slander, however, exemplary damages cannot be recovered without proof of express malice; 48 Mo. App. 193. Where motive may be ground of aggravation of damages, evidence on this score, as of proof of provocation, or of good faith, is admissible in mitigation of damages; Poll. Torts 184. So exemplary damages cannot be recovered where the defendant acted on advice of counsel; 33 Mich. 511; 81 Ga. 466; 78 Ala. 183; 44 Vt. 441; or in good faith; 76 Me. 216; 35 N. Y. 297; 60 Md. 358; 42 Conn. 318; or with a fixed belief that he was acting in the right; 70 Ill. 28; 35 Ia. 306; 76 Ala. 176.

The ground of the doctrine is said to be that society is protected by this species of punishment, while the party is also compensated at the same time and persons are deterred from like offences; 6 Tex. 266; 2 Hill 40.

Mere negligence on the part of the defendant is not enough; 35 Penn. 60; 27 Mo. 28; 5 Bush 206; but see 2 C. C. App. 354; 5 id. 91; 6 Misc. Rep. 162. Malicious motives alone can never constitute a cause of action but, where the allegations are sufficient to sustain the action, malice may be alleged and proved to enhance the damages; 78 Me. 445; 77 Ill. 562; 69 Mich. 380; 115 Mass. 217; 27 Fla. 157; 75 Pa. 467; 75 Ga. 198. See MALICE; MOTIVE.

Exemplary damages as a rule are recoverable only in tort, except that they are allowed for breach of promise of marriage; L. R. 1 C. P. 331; 125 N. Y. 214; 59 Mich. 33; see PROMISE OF MARRIAGE; and where there was a breach of a statutory bond by such tort as would warrant exemplary damages; 57 Ia. 496; 33 Ala. 235; contra, 20 S. C. 514; 84 Ill. 511.

Exemplary damages have been allowed, where one trespassed and cut timber from another's land; 18 Tex. 228; so where armed men broke into a store, carried off the stock, threatened the plaintiff's life, and injured his trade; 36 Mo. 236; in actions for malicious prosecution, when bad faith was shown; 39 Barb. 253; for throwing vitriol in the plaintiff's eyes; 1 Mo. App. 464; for maliciously setting fire to a person's woods, etc.; 84 Ill. 70; against an innkeeper for wrongfully turning a guest out of the inn; 22 Minn. 90; where a newspaper was informed of the falsity of a libellous article before publication; 94 Mich. 114; where a libel was recklessly or carelessly published, as well as one prompted by personal ill will; 66 Hun 626; for an assault and false imprisonment, against the liberty of a subject; 2 Wils. 205; for wilful trespass on land with intemperate behavior; 5 Taunt. 422; for seduction; 3 Wils. 18; adultery with the plaintiff's wife; 50 Pa. 359; 39 Ia. 478; 66 Ill. 206; perhaps for gross defamation; Poll. Torts 182; for negligently pulling down buildings, to an adjacent owner's injury, the defendant's conduct showing a contempt of the plaintiff's rights; 6 H. & N. 54; for injuries which are the result of negligence and accompanied with expressions of insolence; id. 58; where a passenger was improperly required to leave a street car in obedience to an order of a policeman called by the conductor to remove him; 166 Pa. 4; but not against a physician for malpractice unless gross negligence is proved; 13 Ia. 128; nor against a railway company, which, by reason of defective equipment, failed to return a passenger, with a return ticket, to his starting point; 115 N. C. 602, disapproving 108 id. 414.

Exemplary damages for personal injuries are recoverable only for negligence of a gross and flagrant character, evincing a reckless disregard of human life and safety; 30 Fla. 1.

It does not prevent a recovery, that the defendant is criminally liable for his wrongful act, and that he has been criminally punished for it; 45 Vt. 299; 64 id. 593; 10 Ohio St. 277; 41 Ia. 686; 151 Pa. 634; contra, 53 N. H. 343; 4 Cush. 278; 20 Ind. 190; 73 Ill. 69; but see 56 N. H. 456.

A master may be liable in exemplary damages for his servant's wanton act within the scope of his business; 114 Mass. 518; 37 S. C. 877. Wherever the servant would be liable in exemplary damages for an act, the master would be so liable for the same act, if done by the servant within the scope of his employment; 57 Me. 308; 88 Miss. 690; the same rule applies to corporations and their servants; Moraw. Priv. Corp. 788; 88 Ind. 118; s. c. 10 Ann. Rep. 108; 48 N. H. 808. A distinction is made in New York, that the master is liable only when he also has been guilty of misconduct, as by the improper employment or retention of the servant, or by the nature of the orders given him; 56 N. Y. 44. See 6 T. & C. 400. The master would not be liable if the servant acted from an innocent motive and in the supposed discharge of his duty; 1 Miss. Rep. 868.

Exemplary damages must be given as a part of the verdict, and not as a separate finding; 56 N. H. 456; but see 38 Wis. 194; and only in cases where there has been some actual damage; 70 Ill. 26, 496. The jury may consider the defendant's pecuniary condition; 71 Ill. 563; Bull. N. P. 97; Wood's Mayne, Dam. 64; 34 La. 848; 48 Mo. 153. See Hale, Dam. ch. 7; 1 Sedg. Meas. Dam. ch. 11.

Special Damages. The damages recoverable for the actual injury incurred through the peculiar circumstances of the individual case, above and beyond those presumed by law from the general nature of the wrong.

These damages must be specially averred in the declaration, or they cannot be recovered; while damages implied by law are recoverable without any such special averment. Thus, in the case of an action for libel, the law presumes an injury as necessarily involved in the loss of reputation, and will award damages therefor without any distinct averment. But if there was any peculiar loss suffered in the individual case, as the plaintiff's marriage prevented or the plaintiff's business diminished, etc., this must be especially averred; Chit. Pl. 410; 4 Den. 319; 2 Johns. 149. When they are the natural and proximate result of the act or default they are general and are legally imported, otherwise they are special and must be pleaded; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 1262; in equity as well as at law; 69 Ala. 843. A fortiori where the special damage is essential to support the action; 23 Pa. 471; 13 Mass. 393; Sedg. Meas. Dam. § 1262, note b, citing many cases.

Double or Treble Damages. In some actions statutes give double or treble damages; and they have been liberally construed to mean actually treble damages. In these cases the jury find such damages as they think proper, and the court enhances them in their judgment; Brooke, Abr. Damages, pl. 70; Co. 2d Inst. 418; 1 Wils. 426; 1 Mass. 155. For example, if the jury give twenty dollars damages for a forcible entry the court will award forty dollars more, so as to make the total amount of damages sixty dollars; 4 B. & C. 154; M'Cl. 567. The statute must be pleaded; 79 Ky. 48. As to the rule in patent cases, see PATENT.

The construction of the words treble damages is different from that which has been put on the words treble costs; in the case of damages they are actually doubled or trebled, while double or treble costs are assessed. See 6 S. & R. 288; 1 Browne, Pa. 9; 1 Cow. 100, 175, 584; 8 id. 115.

Single damages may be recovered if the claim under the statute is not made out; 36 Mich. 246.

MECHANIC. Any skilled worker with tools; a workman who shapes and applies material in the construction of houses; one actually engaged with his own hands in constructive work. 48 La. Ann. 1180. See 11 La. 517; 18 Pa. 625. It has been held that a painter is not a mechanic; 107 Mich. 270; and that a printer is one; 53 La. 474. A dentist is a mechanic in Michigan; 17 Mich. 332; but not in Mississippi; 31 Miss. 567.

MECHANICAL PURSUIT. One closely allied to or incidental to some kind of manufacturing business. 65 Minn. 203. Mining of iron is a mechanical business; 64. A mechanic who contracts and shapes materials with his hands is engaged in such a pursuit, in the sense of a statute exempting such from taxation; 48 La. Ann. 1180.

MERCHANT'S LIEN. See LIEN.

MEDALS. The word medals in a bequest will pass curious pieces of current coin kept by the testator with his medals. 8 Ark. 202; Wms. Ex. 1905.

MEDIA ANNATA. In Spanish Law. Profits of land received every six months. 5 Tex. 79.

MEDIA CONCLUDENDI. As a general rule, a party asserting a right by suit is barred by a judgment or decree upon the merits as to all media concludendi or grounds for asserting the right, known when the suit was brought. 192 U. S. 355.

A judgment is conclusive as to all the media concludendi. 210 U. S. 230.

MEDIATE POWERS. Those incident to primary powers, given by a principal to his agent. For example: the general authority given to collect, receive, and pay debts due by or to the principal is a primary power. In order to accomplish this, it is frequently required to settle amounts, adjust disputed claims, resist those which are unjust, and answer and defend suits; these subordinate powers are sometimes called mediate powers. Story, Ag. § 58. See 1 Campb. 43, note; 4 id. 163; 6 S. & R. 149.

MEDIATION. In International Law. States which are at war may accept an offer from a third power, or extend an offer to a third power, friendly to both, to mediate in their quarrel. But unless acceptable to both sides, any such interference amounts to intervention (q. v.), and possibly an act of war. Risley, Law of War 60.

It differs from intervention in being purely a friendly act. In the Middle Ages and down to the present time the Pope has been a frequent mediator. Mediation must be distinguished from good offices. The demand of good offices or their acceptance does not confer any right of mediation; 8 Encyc. Laws of Eng. 908.

"A mediator is a common friend who counsels both parties with a weight proportionate to their belief in his integrity and their respect for his power, but he is not an arbitrator, to whose decisions they submit their differences and whose award is binding upon them." Id., quoting Sir James Mackintosh.

MEDIATORS OF QUESTIONS. Six persons authorized, under statute in the reign of Edw. III., to certify and settle, before the mayor and officers of the staple, questions arising among merchants, relating to the wool trade. Toml. Staple.

MEDICAL ATTENDANCE. See MEDICINE.

MEDICAL COLLEGE. The term "medical college" refers to those schools of learning teaching medicine in its different branches at which physicians are educated. 108 Ky. 769, 57 S. W. 501.

MEDICAL EVIDENCE. Testimony given by physicians or surgeons in their professional capacity as experts, or derived from the statements of writers of medical or surgical works.

This kind of evidence was first recognized by Charles V. of Germany, and incorporated in the "Caroline Code," framed at Rastibon in 1532, wherein it was ordained that the opinion of medical men—at first surgeons only—should be received in cases of death by violent or unnatural means, when suspicion existed of a criminal agency. The publication of this code encouraged the members of the medical profession to renewed activity, tending greatly to advance their science and the cause of justice generally. Many books soon appeared on the subject of medical jurisprudence, and the importance of medical evidence was more fully understood. Elwell, Malp. & Med. Ev. 288.

The evidence of the medical witness is strictly that of an expert; Elwell, Malp. & Med. Ev. 275; 10 How. Pr. 289; 2 Conn. 514; 1 Chandl. Wis. 178; 2 Ohio 453; 27 N. H. 157; 17 Wend. 136; 7 Cush. 319; 1 Phill. Ev. 780; 1 Whart. Ev. § 441.

In the case of Rogers, 7 Metc. 808, Shaw, C. J., presiding, the court held that the proper question to be put to the professional witness was: "If the symptoms and indications testified to by other witnesses are proved, and if the jury are satisfied of the truth of them, whether in his [the witness's] opinion the party was insane, and what the nature and character of that insanity; and what state did they indicate, and what he would expect would be the conduct of such a person in any supposed circumstance." Under this ruling the medical witness passes upon the condition of the person whose condition is at issue. To do it correctly he must hear all the evidence that the jury bears; he must judge as to the relevance of the evidence of others, and make an application of the facts that legally and properly bear upon the case to it, and reject all others; in short, he is judge and jury in the case. Since the trial of Rogers, a different rule has been adopted by the courts in Massachusetts. In the case of the United States v. McGlue, reported in 1 Curt., Mr. Justice Curtis instructed the jury that medical experts "were not allowed to give opinions in the case."

MEDICAL EXAMINER. As Agent of Insurance Company. A "medical examiner" appointed by an insurance company to make the medical examination and report is not an agent of the applicant; they are not selected or designated or in any way controlled by him, and when an insurance company appoints and selects a "medical examiner" and the examiner acting for the company makes or induces the applicant to make (when he is acting in good faith and without any intention to deceive) misleading or false answers in the medical report, the company will not be permitted to defeat a recovery upon a policy issued on the faith of these statements upon the ground that they were material and false, when they were in fact made not by the applicant but by one of its agents. 149 Ky. 87, 147 S. W. 882.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE. That science which applies the principles and practice of medicine to the elucidation and settlement of doubtful questions which arise in courts of law.

These questions are properly embraced in five different classes:—

The first includes questions arising out of the relations of sex: as, impotence and sterility, hermaphroditism, rape, pregnancy, legitimacy, delivery.

The second, injuries inflicted upon the living organization: as, infanticide, wounds, poisons, persons found dead.

The third, those arising out of disqualifying diseases: as, the different forms of mental alienation.

The fourth, those arising out of deceptive practice: as, feigned diseases.

The fifth is made up of miscellaneous questions: as, age, identity, presumption of seniorship, life assurance, and medical evidence.

See the several titles.

MEDICINE. The practice of medicine includes the application and use of medicines and drugs for the purpose of curing, mitigating, or alleviating bodily diseases, while the practice of surgery is limited to manual operations usually performed by surgical instruments or appliances. 24 Hun 633.

The primary meaning of the terms medical attendance or medical services is the rendering of professional medical services.

See DRUGGIST; DRUGS; PHYSICIAN.

MEDICINE. Practice of. To open an office, and announce to the public in any way, a readiness to treat the sick or afflicted shall be deemed to engage in the "practice of medicine" within the meaning of a statute. 108 Ky. 769, 57 S. W. 501. See SURGERY.

Allopathic Practice of medicine means the ordinary method commonly adopted by the great body of learned physicians, taught in their institutions, established by their highest authorities, and accepted by the larger portion of the community.

Ecclectic Practice is a different system, unusual and eccentric, not countenanced by the class referred to, but characterized by them as spurious and denounced as dangerous. Anderson; 34 Conn. 453. See CHRISTIAN SCIENCE; PATENT MEDICINE; PRACTICE MEDICINE.

MEDICO-LEGAL. Relating to the law concerning medical questions.

MEDIETAS LINGUÆ (Lat. half tongue). A term denoting that a jury is to be composed of persons one-half of whom speak the English and one-half a foreign language. See JURY.

MEDIO ACQUIETANDO. A judicial writ to distrain a lord for the acquitting of a mesne lord from a rent, which he had acknowledged in court not to belong to him. Reg. Jur. 129.

MEDITATIO FUGÆ. In Scotch Law. If a creditor apprehends that his debtor is about to fly the country, he may appear before a judge and swear that he believes his debtor to be in meditatione fugæ, when a warrant imprisoning him will be granted, which, however, is taken off on the debtor's finding caution, i. e. surety. Bell; Moz. & W.

MEDITERRANEAN PASSPORT. A pass issued by the admiralty of Great Britain under various treaties with the Barbary States in the eighteenth century. They were granted to British built ships and were respected by the Barbary pirates. See 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 100. They were also issued by the United States. The term is still retained in R. S. § 4191 (act of Mar. 2, 1803).

MEEDLEY. An affray; a sudden or casual fighting; a hand-to-hand battle; a mêlée.

MEDSCEAT. A bribe; hush money. Ano. Inst. Eug.

MEETING. A number of people having a common duty or function, who have come together for any legal purpose, or the transaction of business of a common interest; an assembly. One person does not constitute a meeting. 2 Q. B. Div. 26.

An assemblage of the creditors of an insolvent or bankrupt duly summoned in accordance with the statute under which the case is proceeding is known as a creditors' meeting, and under such statutes certain powers are usually devolved upon it by law with respect to the management of the estate and the discharge of the debtor.

In the law of corporations the term applies to every duly convened assembly either of stockholders, or of directors, managers, etc.

A distinction is made between general stated meetings of a corporation and special meetings. The former occur at stated times usually fixed by the constitution and by-laws; the latter are called for special purposes or business. Generally speaking, every member of a corporation has a right to be present at every meeting thereof, and to be notified of the meeting, in some way; 22 N. Y. 128; 2 H. L. C. 789. In the absence of a by-law or a custom to the contrary, at least one full day's notice must be given of a directors' meeting of a corporation; 173 Pa. 80. An omission to give the required notice will generally, though it be accidental, invalidate the proceedings; 7 B. & C. 695; see 55 Ark. 473; but it will not, where the action taken thereat is duly ratified at a subsequent meeting; 85 Fed. Rep. 161. When all who are entitled to be present at a meeting are present, whether notice has been given or not, and no objection is made on account of the want of formalities, there is a waiver of the want of notice; 11 Wend. 604; 7 Ind. 647; 53 Minn. 381; but if any one member is absent or refuses to give his consent, the proceedings are invalidated; 14 Gray 440. Notice should be personal; 7 Conn. 214; in writing, and signed by the proper person; 28 N. J. Eq. 216; should state the time and place of meeting, and, if a special meeting, the business to be transacted; 14 Gray 440; L. E. 2 Ch. 191. Ordinarily, notice of stated meetings is not required; 22 N. Y. 128. A general notice, not specifying the business to be transacted, is all that is necessary to authorize the transaction of the ordinary business affairs of the corporation; 138 N. Y. 537.

All proceedings carried on by the members of a corporation, while sitting outside of the state which created it, are void; 45 Ga. 34; 38 Me. 343; 19 So. Rep. (Fla.) 172; 148 Mass. 249; 64 Md. 85; but this rule does not apply to the meetings of the directors of a corporation; Moraw. Priv. Corp. § 533; 27 Ohio St. 343; 63 Barb. 415; and a corporation created by the laws of two states may hold its meetings and transact its business in either state; 81 Ohio St. 317. See Blackwell, Meetings; 3 Weimer, Corp. Law, App., for an interesting paper on corporate meetings, by Hon. George M. MELANCHOLIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. A name given by the ancients to a species of partial intellectual mania, now more generally known by the name of monomania. It bore this name because it was supposed to be always attended by dejection of mind and gloomy ideas. See MANIA.

MELDFOEH. A recompense given to a person who made discovery of any breach of penal laws committed by another person.

MELIORATIONS. In Scotch Law. Improvements of an estate, other than mere repairs; betterments. 1 Bell, Com. 73.

MELIUS INQUIRENDUM VEL INQUIRENDUM. In Old English Practice. A writ which in certain cases issued after an imperfect inquisition returned on a capias ultigatum in outlawry. This melius inquirendum commanded the sheriff to summon another inquest in order that the value, etc., of lands, etc., might be better or more correctly ascertained.

MEMBER. A limb of the body useful in self-defence. Membrum est pars corporis habens destinatum operationem in corpore. Co. Litt. 126 a.

An individual who belongs to a firm, partnership, company, or corporation. A statutory provision that all the members of a company shall, in certain cases, be liable, is not confined to such as were members when the debts were contracted; 12 Metc. 3. See CORPORATION; PARTNERSHIP; JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

One who belongs to a legislative body, or other branch of the government; as, a member of the house of representatives; a member of the court.

A child living with the father does not necessarily cease to be a member of his family on reaching his majority; 79 Ill. 584.

MEMBER OF CONGRESS. A member of the senate or house of representatives of the United States.

MEMBERS. In English Law. Places where a custom-house has been kept of old time, with officers or deputies in attendance; and they are lawful places of exportation or importation. 1 Chitty, Com. Law, 726.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT. See HOUSE OF COMMONS; HOUSE OF LORDS; PARLIAMENT.

MEMBRANA (Lat.). In Civil and Old English Law. Parchment; a skin of parchment. Vocab. Jur. Utr.; Du Cange. The English rolls were composed of several skins, sometimes as many as forty-seven. Hale, Hist. Comm. Law 17.

MEMOIRE. In French Law. A document in the form of a petition by which appeals to the court of cassation are initiated.

In Diplomacy. A brief statement of an undecided question. English.

MEMORANDUM (Lat. from memoria, to remember). An informal instrument recording some fact or agreement; so called from its beginning, when it was made in Latin. It is sometimes commenced with this word though written in English; as, "Memorandum, that it is agreed;" or it is headed with the words, "Be it remembered that, etc." The term memorandum is also applied to the cause of an instrument.

A note to help the memory. 33 Conn. 517. A letter may be a memorandum. Id.

The word is also used in England to designate the objects for which a trading corporation is formed. The term prospectus is commonly used in the United States. See PROSPECTUS.

In English Practice. The commencement of a record in king's bench, now written in English, "Be it remembered," and which gives name to the whole clause.

It is only used in proceedings by bill, and not in proceedings by original, and was introduced to call attention to what was considered the bye-business of the court. 2 Tidd, Pract. 775. Memorandum is applied, also, to other forms and documents in English practice: e. g. memorandum in error, a document alleging error in fact and accompanied by an affidavit of such matter of fact. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, § 158. Kerr's Act. Law. Proceedings in error are now abolished in civil cases; Jud. Act, 1875. Also, a memorandum of appearance, etc., in the general sense of an informal instrument, recording some fact or agreement.

A memorandum of association is a document subscribed by seven or more persons for the purpose of forming themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability. 8 Steph. Com. 20.

In Contracts. A writing required by the Statute of Frauds. See NOTE OR MEMORANDUM.

In the Law of Evidence. A witness may refresh his memory by referring to a written instrument, memorandum, or entry in a book, and may be compelled to do so, if the writing is in court; 20 Pick. 441; 11 S. C. 195; see 63 Hun 439; 31 Fla. 196; but the memorandum is not competent evidence to prove the facts stated, in itself; 96 Cal. 462; see 40 Minn. 325; nor is the memorandum admitted in evidence merely because the witness uses it to refresh his recollection; 130 U. S. 611. The writing need not be an original or made by the witness himself, provided, after inspecting it, he can speak from his own recollection, not relying wholly upon the writing; 10 N. H. 544; 14 Cent. L. J. 119; 10 N. C. 187; 39 Mich. 103; 87 Ga. 393; 83 Neb. 150; 53 Minn. 360. And a writing may be referred to by a witness, even if inadmissible as evidence itself; 8 East 273; 45 Ill. App. 368. A witness may refer to a writing which he remembers having seen before, and which he knew at that time to be correct, although he has no recollection of the facts contained therein; so, when he neither recognizes the writing nor remembers anything therein, but yet, knowing it to be genuine, his mind is so convinced, that he is enabled to swear to the fact, as where a banker's clerk is shown a bill of exchange with his own writing upon it; Whart. Ev. § 518; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 436-439. See 1 Houst. Cr. C. 476; 76 N. Y. 604; 18 Hun 443; 39 Mich. 405; 25 Minn. 180; 64 Vt. 511. The admission in evidence of a memorandum made by the witness is error if it does not appear that the witness could not have testified from memory; 47 Minn. 403. See 67 Hun 365.

A memorandum book, out of which some of the entries bearing on the cause of action have been torn after the action was commenced, is not admissible in evidence; 88 Va. 695. Memoranda, if admissible at all as independent evidence, cannot be admitted when it is not shown that they were made at the time of the transactions referred to, or why they were made; 151 U. S. 149.

A witness may refresh his memory by reference to a copy of a memorandum made by him, only where it is first shown that the copy is correct; 96 Ala. 863.

In Insurance. A clause in a policy limiting the liability of the insurer.

Policies of insurance on risks of transportation by water generally contain exceptions of all liability from loss on certain articles other than total, or for contributions for general average; and for liability for particular average on certain other articles supposed to be perishable or specially liable to damage, under specified rates on each, varying from three per cent. to twenty, and for any loss whatever under three or five per cent. Some seventy or eighty articles are subject to these exceptions of particular average in the divers forms of policy in use in different places; 1 Phill. Ins. § 54, n. These exceptions were formerly introduced under a "memorandum," or "N. B.," and hence have been called "memorandum articles," and the body of exceptions the "memorandum." The list of articles and rates of exceptions vary much in different places, and from time to time at the same place; 19 N. Y. 272.

The construction of these exceptions has been a pregnant subject in jurisprudence. 1 Stark. 436; 3 Campb. 429; 4 Maule & S. 503; 5 id. 47; 1 Ball & B. 358; 3 B. & Ad. 20; 5 id. 225; 4 B. & C. 736; 7 id. 219; 8 Bingh. 458; 16 E. L. & Eq. 461; 1 Bingh. N. C. 526; 2 id. 383; 3 id. 266; 3 Pick. 46; 5 Mart. La. N. S. 289; 2 Sumn. 366; 16 Me. 207; 31 id. 455; 1 Wheat. 219; 6 Mass. 468; 15 East 559; 9 Gill & J. 337; 7 Cra. 415; 8 id. 84; 1 Stor. 463; Stevens. Ar. p. 214; Benecke, Ar. by Phill. 402; 3 Conn. 357; 19 N. Y. 272; [1893] Prob. 209; id. 164.

MEMORANDUM ARTICLES. A term used to designate the articles of merchandise mentioned in the memorandum clause. See MEMORANDUM.

MEMORANDUM CHECK. It is not unusual among merchants, when one makes a temporary loan to another, to give the lender a check on a bank, with the express or implied agreement that it shall be redeemed by the maker himself, and that it shall not be presented at the bank for payment; such understanding being denoted by the word memorandum upon it. If passed to a third person, it will be valid in his hands like any other check; 4 Du. N. Y. 123; 11 Paige, Ch. 612; 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 200. Being given by the maker to the payee rather as a memorandum of indebtedness than as a payment, between these parties it is considered as a due bill, or an I. O. U. It can be sued upon as a promissory note, without presentment to the bank, whereas the holder of a regular check must first demand its payment at bank, and be refused, before he can maintain an action against the drawer; Van Schaack, Bank Checks 184.

The fact that the word "memorandum" or an abbreviation of it is written on a check makes it a memorandum check, but the bank is not bound to pay any attention to these words, and if such a check is presented for payment and the drawer has sufficient funds to meet it the bank must honor it like any ordinary check; Norton, Bills and Notes 383. If the agreement between the maker and payee is that it shall not be presented for payment, any remedy of the drawer for the breach of such agreement is solely against the payee; Morse, Banks 313. Such a check has all the features of a negotiable instrument in the hands of a bona fide holder for value; id. See CHECK.

MEMORANDUM CLAUSE. A clause inserted in a marine insurance policy to prevent the underwriters from being liable for injury to goods of a peculiarly perishable nature, and for minor damages. Maude & P. Shipp. 371. See MEMORANDUM.

MEMORANDUM IN ERROR. A document alleging error in fact, accompanied by an affidavit of such matter of fact. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 158.

This species of memorandum was entitled in the court and in the cause, and delivered to one of the masters of the court in which the judgment had been given, accompanied by an affidavit of the matter of fact wherein the alleged error consisted. Kerr Act. Law. But proceedings in error have been abolished in civil cases by the judicature acts, and orders under them. Abbott.

MEMORIAL. A petition or representation made by one or more individuals to a legislative or other body. When such instrument is addressed to a court, it is called a petition.

MEMORIZATION. No action will lie for pirating a play by means of memorization alone; 5 Term 245; see 14 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 207, where the subject is discussed in a note by Mr. J. A. Morgan.

MEMORY. Understanding; a capacity to make contracts, a will, or to commit a crime, so far as intention is necessary.

Memory is sometimes employed to express the capacity of the understanding, and sometimes its power; when we speak of a retentive memory, we use it in the former sense; when of a ready memory, in the latter. Shelford, Lun. Intr. 29, 30.

The reputation, good or bad, which a man leaves at his death.

This memory, when good, is highly prized by the relations of the deceased; and it is therefore libellous to throw a shade over the memory of the dead, when the writing has a tendency to create a breach of the peace, by inciting the friends and relations of the deceased to avenge the insult offered to the family. 4 Term 126; 5 Co. 125; Hawkins, Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 73, s. 1. See LIBEL; PRIVACY, RIGHT TO.

As to witness refreshing his memory, see MEMORANDUM.

MEMORY, TIME OF. According to the English common law, which has been altered by 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 71, the time of memory commenced from the reign of Richard the First, A. D. 1189. 2 Bla. Com. 31.

But proof of a regular usage for twenty years, not explained or contradicted, is evidence upon which many public and private rights are held, and sufficient for a jury in finding the existence of an immemorial custom or prescription; 2 Saund. 175 a, d; Peake, Ev. 386; 2 Price, Exch. 450; 4 id. 198.

MEN OF STRAW. Men who used in former days to ply about courts of law, so called from their manner of making known their occupation (i. e. by a straw in one of their shoes), recognized by the name of straw-shoes. An advocate or lawyer who wanted a convenient witness, knew by these signs where to find one, and the colloquy between the parties was brief. "Don't you remember?" said the advocate (the party looked at the fee and gave no sign; but the fee increased, and the powers of memory increased with it)—"To be sure I do." "Then come into court and swear it." And straw-shoes went into court and swore it. Athens abounded in straw-shoes. 13 L. Quart. Rev. 344.

MENACE. A threat; a declaration of an intention to cause evil to happen to another. The word menace is not restricted to threats of violence to person and property nor to threats of accusing a person of crime; it includes a threat to accuse one of immoral conduct; [1895] 1 Q. B. 706.

When menaces to do an injury to another have been made, the party making them may, in general, be held to bail to keep the peace; and when followed by any inconvenience or loss, the injured party has a civil action against the wrong-doer. Webb, Poll. Torts 210. Comyns, Dig. Battery (D); Viner, Abr.; Bacon, Abr. Assault; Co. Litt. 161 a, 162 b, 253 b; 2 Lutw. 1429. See THREAT.

MENTAL. Pertaining to servants or domestic service; servile. This term is applied to servants who live under their master's roof. See stat. 2 Hen. IV. c. 21; 1 Bla. Com. 425. It has been held not applicable to a housekeeper in a large hotel; 1 R. 10 C. L. 188.

MENS REA. A term meaning a guilty intent and commonly used only in connection with the maxim, actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea.

The use of the term and the maxim has been criticised. "Though the phrase is in common use, I think it most unfortunate . . . and actually misleading. . . . It naturally suggests that, apart from all particular definitions of crimes, such a thing exists as a 'mens rea' or 'guilty mind,' which is always expressly or by implication involved in every definition. This is obviously not the case, for the mental elements of different crimes differ widely. 'Mens rea' means, in the case of murder, malice aforethought; in the case of theft, an intention to steal. In some cases it denotes mere inattention. For instance, in the case of manslaughter by negligence it may mean forgetting to notice a signal. It appears confusing to call dissimilar states of mind by one name. . . . To an unlegal mind, it suggests that, by the law of England, no act is a crime which is done from laudable motives; in other words, that immorality is essential to crime." Stephen, J., in L. R. 23 Q. B. D. 196.

The maxim about "mens rea" means no more than that the definition of all, or nearly all, crimes contains not only an outward and visible element, but a mental element, varying according to the different nature of different crimes. To comprehend "mens rea" we must have a detailed examination of the definitions of particular crimes, and therefore the expression is unmeaning. 2 Steph. Hist. Cr. L. 96.

In offences against the acts relating to adulterating food, etc., the defence of mens rea is not good unless the act use the word "wilfully"; (1866) 1 Q. B. 65.

See 18 Cr. L. Mag. 331; 1 Bish. New Cr. L. § 237, 238, 303 a; 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 10; IGNORANCE; MOTIVE.

MENSA (Lat.). An obsolete term, comprehending all goods and necessities for livelihoods.

MENSA ET THORO. See DIVORCE; A MENSA ET THORO.

MENSURA DOMINI REGIS. The measure of our lord the king, being the weights and measures established under King Richard I. in his parliament at Westminster, 1197. 1 Bla. Com. 275; Moz. & W.

MENTAL CONDITION. The mental condition of a person refers to his senses, his perceptions, his consciousness, his ideas. 15 Wall. (U. S.) 588. If his mental condition is perfect, his will, his memory, his understanding are perfect, and connected with a healthy bodily organization. Id.

MENTAL DISEASE. Strictly speaking is always brain disease with mental symptoms. Bridges, Outline Ab. Psych. 127. See PSYCHOSIS; INSANITY; DEMENTIA; AMENIA; PSYCHIATRY.

MENTAL INCAPACITY. See DELIRIUM; DELUSION; DEMENTIA; IDIOCY; IMBECILITY; INSANITY; MANIA.

MENTAL RESERVATION. A silent exception to the general words of a promise or agreement not expressed, on account of a general understanding on the subject. But the word has been applied to an exception existing in the mind of the one party only, and has been degraded to signify a dishonest excuse for evading or infringing a promise. Wharton.

MENTAL SUFFERING. Where mental suffering is the natural and proximate result of a tort or of a breach of contract it is a proper subject of compensation, but standing alone it will not support an action of which actual damages is the basis; Hale, Dam. §§ 39, 40.

It was the common-law rule that mental suffering unconnected with physical injury or other element of damage to person or property, is not a cause of action for which damages may be recovered; 68 Miss. 748; L. R. 10 Q. B. 122; 9 H. L. Cas. 577; 13 App. Div. N. Y. 233; 116 Mo. 34; 61 Mo. App. 586; 49 La. Ann. 1431; 83 Ill. 331; 27 Kan. 544; 6 Nev. 224; 18 R. I. 791; 3 Dak. 315; 32 Fla. 434.

This continues to be the prevailing rule with respect to all actions upon contracts of which the consideration is something having a specific value in money. In such cases mental suffering is treated as not being within the limitations of the doctrine of proximate cause and natural consequence as settled in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Excheq. 341; 6 Tex. Civ. App. 755; 2 id. 323; 107 N. C. 449. A line of cases contra is based upon a decision in 55 Tex. 308.

which has been followed in several states: 99 Ala. 510; 111 id. 135; 86 Tenn. 695; 128 Ind. 294; 97 Tenn. 638; 77 Ia. 54; 71 Mo. 86; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 699; but the doctrine of these cases has been the subject of severe criticism. In 68 Miss. 748, Cooper, J., said:

"The rapid multiplication of cases of this character in the state of Texas, since the case of So Relie, indicates to some extent the field of speculative litigation opened up by that decision. . . . Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, and Alabama have but recently established the rule, the dangers and difficulties of which are becoming apparent in Texas, the intolerable litigation invited and appearing in Texas has not yet fairly commenced in those states. It will, however, appear in due time, and the courts will be forced to resort to refined limitations, as Texas has done, to restrict it. We prefer the safety afforded by the conservatism of the old law, as we understand it to be, and are of the opinion that no recovery for mental suffering can be had in this case."

The federal courts uniformly deny the right to recover damages in such cases: 44 Fed. Rep. 554; 54 id. 634; 55 id. 603; 59 id. 433; 57 id. 471. In the case last cited Pardee, J., after discussing the authorities, said:

"The general rule that mental anguish and sufferings, unattended by any injury to the person, resulting from simple actionable negligence, cannot be sufficient basis for an action for the recovery of damages, is maintained and supported by an unbroken line of English authorities, by the conceded state of the general law prior to the So Relie case, 55 Texas, 308 (1881), and by the uniform decisions of the federal courts and decisions of the supreme courts of Nevada, Dakota, Kansas, Maine, Mississippi, Georgia, Massachusetts, and by the opinions of several text writers of unquestioned standing as expounders of the law."

In the latest federal case the mental suffering complained of was held on demurrer not to be the proximate cause of the injury, and this was said to render it unnecessary to pass upon the question whether it "is in California under any circumstances, a proper element of damages;" 73 Fed. Rep. 273.

It was early settled that substantial damages might be recovered in a class of actions of tort where the only injury suffered is mental, such as cases:—of assault without physical contact; 3 C. & P. 873; 57 Me. 203; 5 Md. 450; 45 Vt. 476; for false imprisonment, where the plaintiff has not been touched by the defendant; 6 C. & P. 774; 4 Bing. N. C. 212; 83 Ill. 473; for the mutilation of a husband's body by dissection; 47 Minn. 307; for wrongful or wanton removal of a child's body from a burial lot; 99 Mass. 281; for wrongful ejection from a train; 77 Ia. 54; for slander and libel; 17 N. Y. 54; for malicious prosecution; 49 Ind. 341; where a conductor kissed a woman passenger against her will; 36 Wis. 657. So also in cases upon contracts, of which the consideration is not pecuniary in its nature, mental suffering has been treated as a proper basis for damages. Exceptions to the general rule upon this footing are, breach of promise of marriage; 102 Mass. 395; 96 Mo. 424; 47 Cal. 194; 33 Md. 288; breach of an undertaker's contract to keep safely the body of a child; 125 Ind. 538; and so also in case of an action by a wife against a railroad company for negligence in transporting her husband's body; 83 Tex. 33; and by one arrested for failure to appear as a witness by reason of negligence of a policeman in signing in blank a warrant of arrest containing a false recital of service of subpoena on the witness; 68 Conn. 892.

Mental suffering accompanying physical pain is a subject of compensation; 4 Q. B. Div. 406; 20 How. 34; 1 Sawy. 539; 39 Fed. Rep. 315; 63 Ala. 286; 76 Ga. 311; 96 Ky. 565; 73 Ia. 241; 99 Mass. 552; 62 Barb. 364; the two cannot be dissociated; 131 U. S. 22; 92 Ala. 210. So is fright caused by apprehension of physical harm; 79 Ala. 828; or nervous shock produced by a false report of a husband's injury; [1897] 2 Q. B. 37; 73 Ia. 241; but see 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 88; so loss of peace of mind and happiness; 21 Ind. 164; sense of insult or indignity, mortification or wounded pride; 5 Sawy. 107; 9 id. 386; 48 Ark. 396; 79 Ala. 328; 79 Ga. 358; 113 Ill. 295; sense of shame and humiliation; 82 Fed. Rep. 66; 131 Mass. 574; 119 Ind. 18; 72 Mo. 407; 36

Wis. 657.

Fright alone is not, in the absence of personal injury, a ground of recovery; 147 Pa. 40; 8 Nev. 324; 60 Fed. Rep. 537; 86 Tex. 402; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1064; though it produced a miscarriage; 47 Hun 855; 151 N. Y. 107; contra, 60 Miss. 906; 36 Wis. 596; 76 Tex. 210. See, as to fright, 14 L. R. A. 666, n.

A nervous shock resulting in bodily illness, and caused by another's negligence, is too remote to enter into the measure of damages; 13 App. Cas. 222; but this point is said to be generally disapproved in England; Poll. Torts 49. Even in cases where mental suffering properly enters into the computation of damages, they are not allowed for such as result from mere disappointment; 8 U. S. App. 118; or apprehension of danger to one's family; 71 Me. 227; of the result of injury to a child from negligence; 8 Tex. Civ. App. 835; 18 R. I. 79.

See, generally, Sedgw. Dam. §§ 42-52; Hale, Dam. §§ 89, 40; Webb, Poll. Torts 54-57; 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 403-419; MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

MENU, LAWS OF. Institutes of Hindu law, dating back probably three thousand years, though the Hindus believe they were promulgated "in the beginning of time, by Menu, son, or grandson, of Brahma, the first of created beings, and not the oldest only, but the holiest of legislators."

"Such rules of the system as relate to man in his social relations will be found singularly wise and just, and not a few of them embodying the substance of important rules, which regulate the complex system of business in our day." Our knowledge of these laws is derived chiefly from the translation of Sir William Jones, and a translation by A. L. Des Longchamps, 1833. See Maine's Anc. L.; 9 Am. Law Reg. o. s. 717; CODE.

MERCANTILE AGENCY. Mercantile or commercial agencies are establishments which make a business of collecting information relating to the credit, character, responsibility, and reputation of merchants, for the purpose of furnishing the information to subscribers. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. 2nd ed., 578; Errant, Mer. Agen. Persons carrying on a mercantile agency are responsible for the damages caused to a person in business when, by culpable negligence, imprudence, or want of skill, false information is supplied concerning his standing, though the information be communicated confidentially to a subscriber to the agency on his application therefor. Id.; 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 222. Such agencies are not such legitimate and useful instruments of commerce or commercial intercourse as to put them exclusively under the regulation of Congress, and free from state control. Id.; 2 S. D. 32. See COMMERCIAL AGENCY; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS; LIBEL.

MERCANTILE LAW. That branch of law which defines and enforces the rights, duties, and liabilities arising out of mercantile transactions and relations. As to the origin of this branch of law, see LAW MERCHANT; and for its various principles, consult the articles upon the various classes of commercial property, relations, and transactions.

MERCANTILE LAW ABROAD. MERCANTILE ACTS. The statutes 19 & 20 Vict. cc. 60 and 97, passed mainly for the purpose of assimilating the mercantile law of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MERCATUM (Lat.). A market. Du Cange. A contract of sale. Id. Supplies for an army (commercium). Id. See Bracton 56; Fleta, l. 4, c. 28, §§ 13, 14.

MERCEN-LAGE. The law of the Mercians. One of the three principal systems of laws which prevailed in England about the beginning of the eleventh century. It was observed in many of the midland counties, and those bordering on the principality of Wales. 1 Bla. Com. 65.

MERCEDES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Reward of labor in money or other things. As distinguished from pensio, it means the rent of farms (procuria rustica). Calvinus, Lex.

MERCHANDISE (Lat. merx). A term including all those things which merchants sell, either wholesale or retail; as, dry goods, hardware, groceries, drugs, etc. It is usually applied to personal chattels only, and to those which are not required for food or immediate support, but such as remain after having been used, or which are used only by a slow consumption. See PARDONUS, n. 8; Dig. 18, 3, 1; 19, 4, 1; 50, 16, 66; 8 Pet. 277; 6 Wend. 835.

It may be and often is used as the synonym of "goods," "wares" and "commodities." If used in an insurance policy to describe the goods of a merchant it may very properly be limited to goods intended for sale. If used for the same purpose to describe the goods of a painter, it may be held to cover property intended for use, and not for sale; 84 Me. 524.

More evidences of value, as bank-bills, are not merchandise. "The fact that a thing is sometimes bought and sold does not make it merchandise." Story, J., 2 Stor. C. C. 10, 53, 54. See 2 Mass. 467; 20 Pick. 9; 3 Metc. Mass. 397; 2 Parsons, Contr. 331, note v.

"Goods, wares, merchandise," has been held to embrace animate, as well as inanimate, property, as oxen; 20 Mich. 383; or horses; 22 Vt. 655. "Merchandise" may include a currier; Anth. N. P. 157; or shares in a joint-stock company; 60 Me. 430; 2 Mo. App. 51; or horses and trucks; 26 Fed. Rep. 766. See STACK.

The word merchandise, as used in the Title including § 2809 of Rev. Stats., may include goods, wares, and chattels of every description capable of being imported. It is argued that "capable of being imported" must mean capable of being imported legally as otherwise the phrase hardly would do more than exclude chattels real, and would want the poignant significance attributed to every word of legislation; and that therefore the merchandise to be included in the manifest does not embrace opium for smoking which the law has done all it can to exclude. 262 U. S. 168.

MERCHANT (Lat. mercator, merx). A man who traffics or carries on trade with foreign countries, or who exports and imports goods and sells them by wholesale. Webster, Dict.; Lex Mercatoria 23. These are known by the name of shipping-merchants. See Comyns, Dig. Merchant (A); Dy. 279 b; Bacon, Abr. Merchant.

One whose business it is to buy and sell merchandise; this applies to all persons who habitually trade in merchandise. 1 W. & S. 469; 2 Salk. 445.

One who is engaged in the purchase and sale of goods; a trafficker; a trader. 4 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 878.

Merchants, in the statute of limitations, means not merely those trading beyond sea, as formerly held; 1 Chanc. Cas. 152; 1 W. & S. 469; but whether it includes common retail tradesmen, quære; 1 Mod. 238; 4 Scott & N. 819; 2 Parsons, Contr. 369, 370. See, also, 5 Cra. 15; 6 Pet. 151; 12 id. 800; 5 Mass. 505; 3 Duv. 107; 9 Bush 569.

The term has been held to include: an ice-dealer; 86 Mo. App. 584; a hotel-keeper; 13 Duv. 107; a banker; 84 La. Ann. 576; the keeper of a boarding stable; 17 Bankr. Rep. 73; and a saloon-keeper; id. 102; but not a brewer; L. R. 7 Ex. 127; a commercial traveller or drummer; 58 Miss. 478; 84 Kan. 434; the superintendent and treasurer of a steamboat corporation; 7 Fed. Rep. 863; a theatrical manager; 4 id. 519; or a speculator in stocks; 5 Ben. 815; 8 id. 563; L. R. 2 Ch. 466; 77 Me. 275; a farmer; 8 T. B. Monr. 380; a druggist; 9 Bush 569; or the principal of a boarding school who provides the students with clothes and books; 5 Humph. 894.

According to an old authority, there were four species of merchants: namely, merchant adventurers, merchants dormant, merchant travellers, and merchant residents. 3 Brownl. 99. See, generally, 98alk. 445; Bacon, Abr.; Comyns, Dig.; 1 Bla. Com. 75, 360; 1 Pardessus, Droit Comm. n. 78; 2 Show. 336; Bracton 334.

See MERCHANT AND SALESMAN, ARTIFICER.

MERCHANT APPRAISERS. Merchants selected, under the revenue laws, to appraise the value of imports, where the importer is dissatisfied with the official appraisement, and there is no appraiser appointed by law. The collector appoints two respectable resident merchants; R. S. § 3609.

MERCHANT AND SALESMAN. The policy of the law is careful to distinguish between the status of a merchant and those beneath that status. A merchant is the owner of the business; a salesman or manager, a servant of it. A merchant is fixed in it and made constant to it by his financial interest; a salesman or manager is but an employee, however else he may be denominated, and may withdraw from his employment at any moment of time and become a competitor in the ranks of labor, using the word in the sense the law implies.

The Immigration Law defines the classes of aliens which shall be excluded from admission to the United States, but provides that the exclusion shall not apply to persons having the "status or occupations" of "merchants." This means, necessarily, having the "status" at the time admission is sought, not a status to come or to be established. 262 U. S. 264.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS. Certain English statutes, beginning with the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 131, whereby a general superintendence of merchant shipping is vested in the board of trade. Provisions are made for the registration, etc., of merchant ships, the discipline and protection of seamen, the regulation of pilotage, etc.

MERCHANTABLE. This word in a contract means, generally, vendible in market. Merchandise is vendible because of its fitness to serve its proper purpose; 11 Ct. Cl. 660; 34 Barb. 204, 206. See, generally, 74 Me. 475; 24 Wis. 340; 2 Q. B. Div. 102; 51 Vt. 490; 37 Ohio St. 236; 102 Mass. 365.

MERCHANTMAN. A ship or vessel employed in the merchant-service.

MERCHANT VESSELS, IMMUNITIES OF. In international law, a merchant vessel in a foreign port is subject to the jurisdiction of the foreign state. In France, however, it is held that acts and offences connected solely with the discipline of the ship are not subject to the local laws; Snow, Int. Law 36. See VESSEL.

MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS. Accounts between merchant and merchant, which must be current, mutual, and unsettled, consisting of debts and credits for merchandise. 6 How. (Mass.) 328; 4 Cra. C. C. 696; 6 Pet. 151.

The statutes of limitation in most of the states contain an exception in favor of such accounts, following the stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 16, § 3, which, however, was repealed in England by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, § 9, and has not been retained in the latest revised acts of limitation in this country. Whether the exception applied to accounts in which there had been no item for six years, has been the subject of conflicting adjudication, but was settled affirmatively in England, in Robinson v. Alexander, 8 Bligh n. 8. 352. See 8 M. & W. 781; 20 Johns. 376; 7 Cra. 350; 61 Ala. 41; 24 Minn. 17; 80 N. J. Eq. 254; Ang. Lim. ch. xv.

MERCHET. A fine or composition paid by inferior tenants to their lord for liberty to dispose of their daughters in marriage. Cow.

The right of concubinage which certain lords had with their tenants' wives on their wedding night. Wharton.

No baron or military tenant could marry his sole daughter and heir without such leave purchased from the king. Many of the servile tenants could neither send their sons to school nor give their daughters in marriage without express license from the superior lord. Jacob; Kennet's Gloss. in Maritagium. See also MARCHET.

MEROHETA. See MERCET.

MEROHAN LAW. A system of law existing in parts of England, about the eleventh century, principally on the borders of Wales. English. See MERCEN LAGE.

MEROHOMATUS ANGLIE. The import of England upon merchandise.

MEROY (Law Fr. merci; Lat. misericordia).

In Practice. The arbitrament of the king or judge in punishing offences not directly censured by law. 2 Hen. VI. c. 2; Jacob, Law Dict. So, to be in mercy, signifies to be liable to punishment at the discretion of the judge.

In Criminal Law. The total or partial remission of a punishment to which a convict is subject. When the whole punishment is remitted, it is called a pardon; when only a part of the punishment is remitted, it is frequently a conditional pardon; or, before sentence, it is called clemency or mercy. Rutherford, Inst. 224; 1 Kent 365; 3 Story, Const. § 1488.

As to the construction of "mercy" in the exception to the Sunday laws in favor of deeds of necessity and mercy, see 2 Pars. Contr. 262, notes. See IN MERCY.

MERE (Fr.). Mother. This word is frequently used, as, in centre sa mere, which signifies a child unborn, or in the womb.

MERE MOTION. See EX MERO MOTU.

MERE RIGHT. A right of property without possession. 2 Bla. Com. 197.

MERE-STONE. A stone for bounding land. Yearb. P. 18 Hen. VI. 5.

MERETRICIOUS. Pertaining to unlawful sexual relations. Anderson, L. Dict. When persons who are under legal disabilities wed it is called a meretricious union; 1 Bla. Com. 436.

MERGER. The absorption of a thing of lesser importance by a greater, whereby the lesser ceases to exist but the greater is not increased.

The annihilation of one estate and its absorption in another by act of law.

The extinction of a security for a debt by the creditor's acquisition either of a higher security, or of the corpus of the property upon which his debt is a lien or charge.

Merger is distinguished from surrender and extinguishment, though in its effects not unlike both. "Strictly speaking" it has been said that it "should be confined to the sinking of one estate in another, or, at most, it should embrace, in addition, the extinction of an incorporeal hereditament through the union of its ownership with that of the land, in, over, or upon which it is exercisable." Ordinarily, however, the Roman doctrine of confusio, which we call extinguishment of a charge or equity, is also denominated merger, and, being governed by the same rules, it is here, and indeed generally, discussed under that title. See 3 Sharsw. & B. L. Cas. R. P. 228.

Of Estates. When a greater estate and less coincide and meet in one and the same person, without any intermediate estate, the less is immediately merged, that is, sunk or drowned, in the latter; but they must be in one and the same person, at one and the same time, in one and the same right; 2 Bla. Com. Sharsw. ed. 177, and note 16; Latch 153; Poph. 166; 6 Madd. 119; 1 Johns. Ch. 417; 8 d. 63; 3 Mass. 172; 83 Gratt. 805; 6 Conn. 873; 11 Ind. 851; 15 Barb. 14. But see 3 Prest. Conv. 277. See, also, 189 Pa. 309; 6 L. E. A. 731.

The estate in which the merger takes place is not enlarged by the accession of the preceding estate; and the greater or only subsisting estate continues, after the merger, precisely of the same quantity and extent of ownership as it was before the accession of the estate which is merged, and the lesser estate is extinguished; Prest. Conv. 7; Wash. R. P. As a general rule, equal estates will not merge in each other.

The merger is produced either from the meeting of an estate of higher degree with an estate of inferior degree or from the meeting of the particular estate and the immediate reversion in the same person; 4 Kent 96. See Wash. R. P. Index; 3 Prest. Conv.; 15 Viner, Abr. 361; 10 Vt. 293; 8 Watts 146.

A merger takes place only when the whole title, equitable as well as legal, unites in the same person; 74 Me. 862.

Merger is held to have taken place in the following cases: An antecedent life estate purchased by the owner of a consequent life estate limited on the former; 6 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 303; life estate of the husband in the fee of the wife, both bought by the same person; 63 Conn. 143; life estate under a will, in remainder in fee, devolved upon the life-tenant by the death of her child, the tenant in remainder; 61 Conn. 844; where a tenant acquires the interest of the landlord, in which case the former cannot recover for breach of contract of the latter to repair; 103 Ala. 583; where the tenant for life acquires the fee; 6 Ohio Dec. 439; estate by the curtesy released to the owner of the fee; 179 Pa. 117. Where a lease for years and an equity of redemption come into the same hands, the legal estate may merge in the equitable, if the parties so intended; 41 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 450; contra, 3 Cra. C. C. 418.

There has been held to be no merger in the following cases: where the tenant in tail acquires the reversion in fee; 2 Co. 61; 6 Conn. 373; a trust estate for life of testator's daughter, undisposed of after her death, in her fee by inheritance; 79 Hun 426; where the co-tenant for years is also the owner of the reversion, there is no merger so as to prevent a separate partition of the leasehold interest; 106 Cal. 682; where a landlord purchases improvements on property on which the lessee has forfeited his lease, it does not merge so as to entitle the holder of a mechanic's lien against the leasehold to enforce it against the fee; 10 Wash. 528; a conveyance in fee to husband and wife by entirety was held not to merge in an estate for life already vested in one of them; 4 Rich. Eq. 90; Co. Litt. 299 b; Litt. 525; contra, 2 Saund. 386 b. A life estate of the father by a conveyance to a trustee for ninety-nine years to secure payment of charges covenanted to be paid by the son, the succeeding tenant for life; 76 L. T. Rep. 499. Unassigned "dower" of husband in his wife's estate does not merge in the inheritance unless required for the promotion of justice; 6 Ohio Dec. 154.

Under the English judicature act of 1873, a life estate in possession conveyed to the next tenant for life in trust to pay a rent charge, and, subject thereto, to the use of the grantee in fee, does not merge the estate per auter vie, it being apparent that no merger was intended; [1892] 3 Ch. 110. See 30 L. R. A. 818 n.

Merger is not favored in equity and is only allowed to promote the intention of parties or for other special reason; 90 Md. 115; 140 Ind. 321; 118 Pa. 6; 118 Ill. 682; 68 Ia. 512; 4 Kent 102; Boone, Mort. 141-143; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 788; Jones, Mort. 370-373; the intention actual or presumed is the criterion; 18 Ves. 390; 40 W. R. 603; if no intention is expressed, equity will examine the circumstances and presume an intention in accordance with the advantage to the acquirer of the two estates; 32 Beav. 244; 18 Ves. 390; 19 R. I. 4, 268; and wherever the legal and equitable estates are united in one owner, so long as his interest requires severance, he will be regarded as holding the titles separately; Jones, Mort. § 873. See 5 Ch. D. 634. And equity will not permit a merger in the case of an easement as against the interest of a third party, with the interest of a mortgagee; 81 Md. 537.

One equity will not swallow up another, hence several equitable claims may be acquired by one person without merger, which will take place when the legal title is acquired because the reason for their existence is then terminated; 140 Ind. 321.

Merger will not be permitted, and it may be prevented, in equity, where it would operate to assist or accomplish the perpetration of a fraud; 158 Ill. 644; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 794; and a merger brought about by a fraudulent deed is destroyed when the deed is set aside; 1 Wend. 478; 49 N. Y. 111; 84 Ind. 144.

In Louisiana one who has once acquired ownership of a thing by one title cannot afterwards acquire it by another title, unless it be to supply a deficiency in the first title; Civ. Code 495; and in other states there are statutes designed to prevent or modify the effects of merger upon third parties. They are collected in 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1403.

Of Liens. The merger of liens is subject to the rule of intention as well as such other general principles, already stated, as are applicable. And it is also to be noted that while separate reference is here made to some classes of liens, the same rules are in the main applicable to all, though usually, for the sake of brevity, only once mentioned. Generally where a lien holder acquires the legal title to the land subject to his lien, and there is no contrary intention expressed or implied, or other circumstance requiring it to be kept alive, the latter is merged; 119 Ill. 312; 69 Ia. 755; 110 N. Y. 33; and the merger cannot be prevented by an assignment of the incumbrance directly to the owner or for his benefit; 10 Allen 466; 13 Gray 360; 13 Cal. 526; 12 N. J. Eq. 515; 32 Md. 501.

Where a mortgagee acquires the legal title, merger will not be applied to defeat the priority of the lien; 104 Mich. 120; 141 Ind. 322. And a mortgage will be continued in favor of a mortgagee, although the parties undertook to discharge it, unless it would work injustice; 31 N. J. L. 325; 44 N. H. 619. There is a presumption that the mortgage was extinguished; 3 Johns. Ch. 393, Kent, C. Probably all that can be said is that it is not so as a matter of course; 62 Ia. 661; and that the rule of intent governs; 3 Pick. 475.

There is no merger where the mortgagee acquires an incomplete equitable title, or only to a portion of the land; 140 Ind. 321; or where he purchases the equity of redemption and by consent of the mortgagor retains the mortgage to cut out subsequent liens by foreclosure; 104 Mich. 120. A purchase by a partner of partnership land sold under a mortgage assumed by the firm operates to satisfy the mortgage; 119 Mo. 280.

A conveyance by a mortgagor to a mortgagee creates no merger as against the assignee of the mortgage; 10 Misc. Rep. 341; 152 N. Y. 159. Where municipal bonds in aid of a railway were disputed, sued upon, and a judgment entered pursuant to a written compromise, for less than the face of the bonds, the town's liability on the bonds was merged in the judgment; 69 Ala. 305.

See as to mortgages, Lawson, Rts. & Rem. §§ 3052-3; 3 Sharsw. & B. L. Cas. R. P. 245.

The question of merger is one which arises frequently, especially in England, with respect to charges. There is a presumption that when the ownership of the fee and of the charge meet, the latter is merged; 18 Ves. 390; if it is of no advantage to the owner to have it kept alive; 10 Hare 79; 29 Beav. 203; or unless he is a limited owner; 7 id. 232; if a charge is paid off by a limited owner, with no expression of intention, he retains the benefit of it against the inheritance; 5 Ch. D. 645; a tenant in tail is not excepted because it is in his power to become absolute owner; 2 S. & S. 345. It results from the rule of intention that in case of an infant tenant in tail there is no merger, as a person not sui juris is not presumed to intend it; 24 Beav.

457; 2 Cow. 246. See 32 Sol. Jr. 397, 418. A charge on land of a husband in favor of his wife and her heirs did not merge in the fee which she took by a devise from the husband, recognizing the charge, to her in trust for her son for life; 49 Hun 608; nor did one created by a testatrix in favor of her children on land devised to their father merge on the fee inherited by the children from the father; 19 R. I. 4.

A mechanic's lien is merged in a conveyance of the land to the lien holder; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 419; but not in a judgment for the debt; 5 Col. App. 385; 40 W. Va. 194; nor by purchase of the property under circumstances from which a contrary intention would be presumed; 160 Ill. 115. Such merger discharges a guarantor of the lien which it destroys; 97 Ia. 77; or a surety for its payment; 77 L. T. Rep. 168. A mechanic's lien assigned to one who took a mortgage on the property affected, the consideration of which was used in the purchase of the lien, did not merge, since it did not appear to be the intention of the parties or required by justice; 37 Neb. 207.

If two foreclosure decrees rendered in the same action on different obligations in favor of different persons, become the property of one person, neither will merge; 62 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 662.

Of Contracts. Oral agreements, proposals, or negotiations by letter merge in a subsequent written contract respecting the same subject-matter; 38 U. S. App. 749; 8 S. C. 74 Fed. Rep. 94; 38 id. 116; 97 Tenn. 469; 165 Ill. 95; 10 Wash. 389; 96 Hun 189; 93 Wis. 23; so a written option to sell land is merged in the subsequent contract of sale; 38 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 601; and the seller of chattels is not liable for any breach of warranties not contained in the written contract; 73 Fed. Rep. 994; but this rule does not apply to a collateral agreement upon which the instrument is silent, not affecting its terms; 117 Cal. 96. A bank check is a contract in the sense that it merges all previous transactions leading up to it; 47 Ia. 671; so is a note; 4 Pa. 317; a charter party; 12 N. Y. 561; a bond of one party to a joint contract debt; 7 Mo. 604.

Generally the provisions of a contract of sale are merged in a deed made in execution thereof; 80 Md. 495; but not so as to prevent the enforcement in equity of a clause in the contract not inserted in the deed; 133 Ill. 385; or where the contract is for the sale of two distinct properties and the conveyance only of one; 172 Pa. 331; 6 Ohio Dec. 273; see 74 Mich. 183; 44 id. 15; but the mere absence from the deed of a provision contained in a contract does not necessarily operate to continue the latter; 26 Can. S. C. 181. A covenant in the contract to deliver possession to the purchaser is not merged in the covenants of title of the deed; 84 Hun 430. A parol agreement between father and son that the latter shall have the property after his parents' death, in consideration of help in carrying on the farm, does not merge as to the undivided half part not conveyed by a subsequent conveyance from the father to the son of an undivided half part of the property made in contemplation of the re-marriage of the father; 69 Vt. 535.

A specialty taken for a simple contract debt merges it; 40 W. Va. 194. A new contract with respect to the subject-matter of a former one, and which appears to be supplementary, does not merge the former; 43 Neb. 584. A note is not merged in a judgment note taken as additional security; 91 Va. 446. See 7 Wait, Act. & Def. 320. As to merger of the original cause of action in a judgment recovered upon it, see JUDGMENT.

In Criminal Law. When a greater crime includes a lesser, the latter is merged in the former; 1 East, P. C. 411; 72 N. C. 447; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 786; Cl. Cr. L. 35, 36; 109 Mass. 349; 7 Misc. Rep. 478. Murder, when committed by blows, necessarily includes an assault and battery; a battery, an assault; a burglary, when accompanied with a felonious taking of personal property, a larceny; in all these and similar cases, the lesser crime is merged in the greater.

Merger of crimes exists only when a misdemeanor is an ingredient of a felony; formerly there was a distinct merger and the trial must be for the felony, but this is no longer, as a general rule; the misdemeanor and the felony must now be a constituent part of the same act in order that acquittal of the latter may be pleaded in bar of prosecution for the former; 1 Whart. Cr. L., 8th ed. §§ 270, 395; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. §§ 804-14; the essential result is thus well expressed: "The same act cannot be punishable both as a felony and as a misdemeanor;" 1 McClain, Cr. L. § 22. In many, probably most, of the states, under an indictment for certain felonies, which include a misdemeanor, there may be conviction of the latter. "When two crimes are of equal grade there can be no technical merger;" as, in the case of a conspiracy to commit a misdemeanor, and the subsequent commission of the misdemeanor in pursuance of the conspiracy; the two crimes being of equal degree, there can be no legal merger; 4 Wend. 265; 26 N. J. L. 313; 29 id. 453; 49 Me. 218; 38 Ind. 280.

The most frequent application of the principle of merger of crimes is in the common law rule which was generally followed in this country (subject to the exception just stated) that a conspiracy to commit a felony is merged in the latter, if it be accomplished; 5 Mass. 106; 5 Am. St. Rep. 900, note; if the felony is not in fact committed, there is no merger, and there may be a conviction of the conspiracy; 28 N. Y. 177; but when the crime is a misdemeanor at common law and a felony by statute, there is still a merger; 4 Park. Cr. Cas. 206. A very late authority considers that "the weight of the more recent cases" is that the conspiracy is not merged even if the crime intended be a felony; 2 McClain, Cr. L. § 979; and this view is strongly supported; 42 Fed. Rep. 829; 64 Mich. 252; 30 Conn. 500; 86 Ia. 216; and is expressly held in England; 11 Q. B. 929; 12 Cox, C. C. 87.

It has been held that where one in an effort to commit a misdemeanor does some act which is itself a felony, he can be punished only for the latter; 2 Moo. & R. 469; 5 C. & P. 553; but in referring to a case which precisely illustrates this point, where one seeking to obtain goods by false pretences, which is a misdemeanor, commits a forgery, which is a felony, Lord Denman considered that an acquittal of the latter ought to be no bar to an indictment for the former; 11 Q. B. 946. See 6 Biss. 259.

Of Rights. Rights are said to be merged when the same person who is bound to pay is also entitled to receive. This is more properly called a confusion of rights, or extinguishment.

When there is a confusion of rights, and the debtor and creditor become the same person, as by marriage, there can be no right to put in execution; but there is an immediate merger; 2 Ves. 264.

In Torts. Where a person in committing a felony also commits a tort against a private person, in this case the wrong is sunk in the felony, at least until after the felon's conviction.

The old rule, that a trespass is merged in a felony, has sometimes been supposed to mean that there is no redress by civil action for an injury which amounts to a felony. But it is now established that the defendant is liable to the party injured either after his conviction; Latch 144; Noy 82; W. Jones 147; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 546; or acquittal; 12 East 409; 2 Hayw. 108. If the civil action be commenced before, the plaintiff will be non-suited; Yelv. 90 a, n. See Ham. N. P. 63; Kel. 48; Cas. temp. Hardw. 350; Loft 88; 9 Me. 458. Buller, J., says this doctrine is not extended beyond actions of trespass or tort; 4 Term 333. See, also, 1 H. Blackst. 583, 588, 594; 15 Mass. 78, 336; 1 Gray 88, 100.

This doctrine doubtless had its origin in the English system of relying on private prosecutors and forfeiture of felons' goods; but it has been repudiated in this country, and the civil remedy and the criminal prosecution go side by side, and neither has any dependence upon the other; 28 Fla. 96; 19 Ohio St. 462; 1 Gray 83; 30 Miss. 423; 6 N. H. 434; 6 B. Monr. 38; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 490; 67 Hun 579. Even in England it is said that "so much doubt has been thrown upon the supposed rule in recent cases that it seems, if not altogether exploded, to be only awaiting a decisive abrogation." Poll. Torts 235.

See, generally, as to this common law doctrine in the United States: 1 Ala. 8; 35 id. 184; 15 Mass. 336; 23 Wend. 288; 1 Cox 115; 1 Miles 313; 6 Rand. 228; 1 Const. S. C. 231; 3 Root 90; 3 Hawks. N. C. 251; 16 Ga. 203; 17 Ind. 105; 19 Greenl. 892; 6 Humph. 433; 8 Tex. 6; 10 Wheat. 473, 494; 1 Hill. Torts 61.

In some states, as New York, it is provided that the right of action of any person injured by any felony shall not, in any case, be merged in such felony, or be in any manner affected thereby.

Of Corporations. Actual corporate union is usually called consolidation in America and amalgamation in England. Railroad corporations are more commonly the subject of such consolidation.

Consolidation requires legislative authority or consent; 101 U. S. 71; 30 Pa. 44; 88 Tenn. 138; 16 Ind. 46. Statutes exist in most, if not all, of the states, for this purpose. Many of them are abstracted in 1 Thomp. Corp. § 305. The state has the same power to authorize a consolidation of two existing corporations as it has to authorize individuals to incorporate; 46 Mich. 324.

A permit given in a charter of a railroad company to connect or unite with other roads, refers merely to physical connection of the tracks and does not authorize the purchase or even the lease of such roads or any union of franchises; 161 U. S. 877.

Where the charters of the constituent companies or some statute to which the charters are subject do not provide otherwise, the consent of all stockholders is required; 53 Tex. 96; 4 Biss. 78; 54 Barb. 42; a state legislature cannot ordinarily compel a stockholder to transfer his stock because the majority have voted to consolidate; 1 Wall. 25; but it has been held that the legislature may, when public necessity requires it, grant authority to consolidate existing connected railways, if it provide just compensation for dissenting stockholders; 24 N. J. Eq. 455. Where statutes existed before a consolidating company was chartered, or one is passed which is binding upon it, provisions in such statutes authorizing consolidation by the vote of a certain proportion of stockholders are binding upon a dissenting minority; such statutes commonly provide for the purchase of dissenting stock by a sale or on an appraisal. If there be no such statute or charter provision, a stockholder is not bound to consent to consolidation, nor to surrender his interest in the original corporation; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 343.

Equity will enjoin a consolidation at the suit of a dissenting stockholder, in cases where he is not bound by the action of the majority; 4 Biss. 78; 29 Vt. 45; it has been held that an injunction will be continued only till the dissenting stockholder's interest has been secured; 30 Pa. 42; 16 Ind. 46, a dictum. These two cases are criticised in 4 Biss. 78, and their doctrine disapproved in 1 Thomp. Corp. § 351. A stockholder's subscription in case of such a consolidation is held to be released; 9 Ind. 58; 4 Biss. 78.

After consolidation has been effected and a de facto corporation formed, only the state can attack the charter; 86 Kan. 121; especially if the new company has acted as a corporation for a considerable time; 51 Kan. 617.

The legal effect of consolidation is to extinguish the constituent companies and create a new corporation, with all the property, liabilities, and stockholders of the old companies; 41 Ark. 509; 64 Ala. 603;

16 Ind. 46; 27 S. C. 385; 128 Ill. 467; and all their franchises, ordinarily; id. Consolidation is not sale, and when two companies are authorized to consolidate their roads, it is to be presumed that the franchises and privileges of each continue to exist in respect to the several roads so consolidated; 109 U. S. 106; 92 U. S. 677; the respective roads and properties of two railroad companies which have been consolidated, retain their respective status towards the public and the state; id. Some cases appear to hold that the old companies continue to exist. See 128 Ill. 467; 42 Mo. 63; 151 Mass. 302 (where the statute so required). It is said in a leading case that "consolidation" has not acquired a recognized judicial construction; it may mean a union by which the old companies cease to exist, or the absorption of one by the other, the former thus securing enlarged powers. Where a statute merely authorizes consolidation upon terms to be agreed upon by the companies, the character of the consolidation is determined by the agreement; 64 Ala. 603.

Where a railroad consolidated with a smaller road, it was held that the former preserved its legal, though not its actual, identity, and that the latter and all its members passed into the former and became members thereof; 30 Pa. 45. The old companies are not of necessity dissolved; it depends upon the language of the statute; 92 U. S. 665, 676.

Technically, the consolidated company is a new corporation, but as regards the business of the old companies and their respective creditors, it is a continuation of the old companies under a new name; 39 Mo. App. 574. The new company is bound to perform the duties of the old companies; 88 Ill. 489; it usually has the powers of both of its constituents; 21 Ill. 451. "As a general rule, the new company succeeds to the rights, duties, obligations, and liabilities of each of the precedent companies, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto. The charter powers, privileges, and immunities of the corporations pass to and become vested in the consolidated company," unless otherwise provided by law; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 365. See 61 Mo. 176.

But it has been held that the powers, etc., of the new company are no greater than those of the constituent company having the fewest privileges; 66 Me. 48; a difficult rule to apply.

The new corporation as an incident of consolidation assumes the debts and liabilities of the constituent companies, and is not an innocent purchaser for value of the property of those companies so as to protect it from liability for taxation; 35 Fla. 625.

Where two roads are consolidated, one of them having a right to exemption from taxes, and the old company being extinguished, its right of exemption does not pass to the new company; 152 U. S. 301. The legislature cannot increase the taxes of the exempt company after consolidation, but may tax that of the other precedent company; and where a taxable corporation is merged into an exempt company, the property of the former is taxable; 92 U. S. 665; 117 U. S. 189. It is held that where an exempt company and a taxable company consolidate, the property of each will continue as it was before, in relation to taxation; 99 Mo. 30; 37 N. J. L. 240; 110 N. C. 137. As to betterments on a consolidated company, one of whose constituents was not taxable, see 92 U. S. 662.

Where two companies were exempt except on net earnings above ten per cent dividends and this was based upon conditions which could only be performed by the constituent companies while operating separate lines (keeping accounts and rendering certain reports to the state), and the new company mingled the assets and ran continuous trains over its lines and could not show the net profits of each road, it was held that the new company had no right to the former exemption; 96 U. S. 508.

Consolidation does not abate a suit pending against one of the companies; 106 Mo.

594; 2 Grant (Pa.) 348; 53 Miss. 159; contra, 40 Kan. 193; 40 Ga. 708. The new company may be substituted under the original process without the issue of process against it; 89 Mo. App. 383.

A railroad company is not relieved from liability on the mortgage bonds of a constituent company by consolidation; 21 N. Y. S. 702. A consolidated company may use a patent under which both of the precedent companies were licensed; 1 Low. 388; and may occupy the streets of a city, if the constituent companies had the power; 53 Fed. Rep. 715. It may sue shareholders of either old company for calls; 18 C. B. 14; 18 Ohio St. 223. Non-assenting subscribers to stock are not released; 23 Kan. 261; contra, 10 Ind. 98. A consolidated company is entitled to a donation made by a town to one of the companies; 5 Ill. App. 579; 94 Ind. 1; but see 69 Mo. 150. The title to lands conveyed to a constituent company vests in the consolidated company; 128 Ind. 266; 67 How. Pr. 439; and its mortgage, secured upon its consolidated property is paramount to the unsecured indebtedness of the constituent companies; 15 Fed. Rep. 763.

A consolidated company is liable for the debts of the constituent companies; 29 Ind. 465; and they can be enforced only against it; 56 Tex. 609; see 106 Mo. 594; even in the absence of an express declaration to that effect; 117 Ind. 501. It is held to be liable in equity for such debts at least to the value of property received; 13 Fed. Rep. 322; and the remedy at law is said to be complete; 81 Ill. 429. It is liable on a judgment against a constituent company; 43 Ill. 199. Bonds that had no lien before consolidation do not acquire a lien by consolidation; 114 U. S. 587; but see 45 Ohio St. 592. The liability of the new company extends to damages due by a constituent company to a riparian owner; 75 Ill. 324; and damages due by a constituent company for breaking into a neighbor's mine; 47 L. J. Ch. 20; and for damages caused by its negligence; 49 Ala. 582; 41 Ark. 542; 62 Ga. 682; for the death of an employee; 17 Md. 489. A cause of action on a constituent company's debt is against the consolidated company alone; 63 N. Y. 307. The necessary facts to establish liability should be averred; 33 Mich. 251.

A railroad corporation is a corporation under the laws of its state, although consolidated with a like corporation created under the laws of another state; 94 U. S. 444; and a state can legislate for that part of a consolidated company which is within its limits, just as if no consolidation had taken place; 94 U. S. 164. A consolidated inter-state corporation has, in each state, all the powers which its constituent company had in that state, but not the powers which the constituent company of the other state had in such other state; 128 Ill. 467; it acts as a unit and may transact its corporate business in one state for both; 45 Fed. Rep. 812. So far as each state has control over the charter it grants, the corporations remain different and separate; 19 Fed. Rep. 804; it dwells in both states and is a corporate entity in each; it has a citizenship identical with each; 45 Fed. Rep. 813. A constituent company consolidated with a corporation of another state remains a citizen of its own state for the purposes of federal jurisdiction; 136 U. S. 358. A railroad extending in several states is not a citizen of each for purposes of federal jurisdiction; 167 U. S. 859.

A practical merger of corporations is sometimes effected by the purchase by one company of the shares of another. This likewise requires legislative authority. See 26 N. J. Eq. 998. Or a merger may be by the purchase of all the corporate property under a statute; 20 Ind. 457. The right to consolidate with another railroad corporation includes the right to make a fair and lawful agreement with it for the interchange of traffic and for the joint use of terminal facilities, the right to buy one-half of its stock for the shareholders of the purchaser and to guarantee the payment of its bonds; 73 Fed. Rep. 933.

As to merger by lease of railroads, see LEASE. Many of the cases depend largely upon the language of statutes and of the consolidating agreement, or articles of consolidation, and should be read in connection therewith.

In many states the merger of parallel and competing lines is prohibited by the constitution. The prohibition has been held not to extend to street railways; 136 Pa. 96. It includes a projected road in process of construction; 7 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 368; and may extend to a case where the competition may arise from other lines owned or controlled by the lines proposing to consolidate; 75 Tex. 534. In Missouri the act applies only to roads within the state and to cases where the competition would have an appreciable effect on rates; 46 Fed. Rep. 88.

The constitution prohibits a scheme by which the control of the competing road is to be placed in the hands of persons named by the other road, which agreed to guarantee bonds of the competing road; 7 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 368; and one where the existing road attempted to purchase the control of a competing road; id. All contracts for leasing or controlling competing roads are held to be void; 66 N. H. 100; and so is a pooling and traffic arrangement between two companies having two hundred miles of parallel tracks; 30 Fed. Rep. 2; and one where a company guarantees the bonds of a competing railroad, receiving half its stock in consideration thereof; 161 U. S. 646.

In Georgia any contract tending to defeat or lessen competition is void; 49 Fed. Rep. 412.

Two street railways are parallel when their directions are substantially the same for two and a-half miles, though their termini and general direction are wide apart; 69 Mo. 85.

Parallel lines are not necessarily competing lines as they may command the traffic of different territories; 161 U. S. 698.

Constitutional prohibitions against the merger of competing railways do not interfere with the power of congress over inter-state commerce; 161 U. S. 677, affirming 31 S. W. Rep. 476.

See, as to consolidation generally, 79 Am. Dec. 492; 2 L. R. A. 584; 13 id. 780; 8 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 647; as to the effect of consolidation; 8 id. 572; 3 L. R. A. 435; as to how far a new corporation is created; 15 id. 82; as to effect on taxation; 17 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 436; 41 id. 702; as to aid bonds; 5 L. R. A. 728; as to lands; 44 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 5; as to inter-state corporations; 16 id. 490; 15 L. R. A. 82, 84; as to liability for rights and obligations of the constituent companies; 5 id. 726; 13 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 138. See REORGANIZATION.

MERINO. See WOOL.

MERITS. The state of facts of deserving; intrinsic ground of consideration or reward. Cent. Dict. The word is used principally in matters of defence.

A defence upon the merits is one that rests upon the justice of the cause, and not upon technical grounds only; there is, therefore, a difference between a good defence, which may be technical or not, and a defence on the merits; 5 B. & Ald. 703, 1 Ashm. 4; 3 Johns. 245, 449; 2 Cow. 281.

In the New York Code of Procedure, it has been held to mean "the strict legal rights of the parties as contra-distinguished from those mere questions of practice which every court regulates for itself, and from all matters which depend upon the discretion or favor of the court." 4 How. Pr. 332. See JURISDICTION.

MERITORIOUS CONSIDERATION. One based upon natural love and affection. 5 Encyc. Laws of Eng. 505. One founded upon some moral obligation; a valuable consideration in the second degree. R. & L. Dict. See CONSIDERATION.

MERITS, AFFIDAVIT OF. An affidavit of merits represents, that upon the substantial facts of the case, justice is with the affiant. Anderson; 18 Pa. 354. Such affidavit is required in support of certain motions of the court; e. g., in order to let in a defendant to defend after judgment signed upon a default. Abbott. In this case the affidavit of merits is an affidavit showing that he has a substantial ground of defense to the action. R. & L. Dict.

MERTON, STATUTE OF. An ancient English ordinance or statute, 20 Hen. III. (1235), which took its name from the place in the county of Surrey where parliament sat when it was enacted. Its provisions related chiefly to dower, usury, legitimacy of children, the right of freeman to make suit by attorney at the lord's or any county court, the inclosure of common lands, wardships. 2 Inst. 79; Barring. Stat. 41, 46; Hale, Hist. Com. Law 9, 10, 18.

MERX. Merchandise.

MESCROYANT. Used in our ancient books. An unbeliever.

MESE. An ancient word used to signify house, probably from the French maison. It is said that by this word the buildings, outillage, orchards, and gardens will pass; Co. Litt. 56. See MEASE.

MESMERISM. See HYPNOTISM.

MESNALT or MESNALITY. A manor held under a superior lord. The estate of a mesne. T. L.; Whart. Dict.; 4 Phila. 71; 14 East 234.

MESNE. Intermediate; the middle between two extremes; that part between the commencement and the end, as it relates to time.

Hence the profits which a man receives between disseisin and recovery of lands are called mesne profits. Process which is issued in a suit between the original and final process is called mesne process.

An assignment made between the original grant and a subsequent assignment, is called a mesne assignment.

Mesne incumbrances are intermediate charges, or incumbrances which have attached to property between two given periods; as, between the purchase and the conveyance of land.

In England, the word mesne also applies to a dignity; those persons who hold lordships or manors of some superior who is called lord paramount, and grant the same to inferior persons, are called mesne lords.

MESNE LORD. See MESNE.

MESNE PROCESS. See MESNE.

See ORIGINAL PROCESS.

MESNE PROFITS. The value of the premises recovered in ejectment, during the time that the lessor of the plaintiff has been illegally kept out of the possession of his estate by the defendant: such are properly recovered by an action of trespass, quare clausum fregit, after a recovery in ejectment. 11 S. & R. 55; Bacon, Abr. Ejectment (H); 3 Bla. Com. 205.

As a general rule, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for such time as he can prove the defendant to have been in possession, provided he does not go back beyond six years; for in that case the defendant may plead the statute of limitations; 3 Yeates 13; Bull. N. P. 88. The value of the use of land during the time it was unlawfully detained by a lessee is the proper measure of lessor's damages; 65 Vt. 485. In an action to recover mesne profits, plaintiff may either prove the profits actually received, or the annual rental value of the land; 70 Md. 172. Defendant in ejectment cannot free himself from liability for mesne profits by permitting a third person to remain in actual possession; 68 Miss. 29. Exemplary damages are allowed in trespass for mesne profits, only when the defendant has acted maliciously or in bad faith; 15 R. I. 82.

The value of improvements made by the defendant may be set off against a claim for mesne profits; Wood. L. & T. 1390; but profits before the demise laid should be first deducted from the value of the improvements; 2 Wash. C. C. 163. See, generally, Wash. R. P.; Bacon, Abr. Ejectment (H); 2 Phill. Ev. 208; Adams, Ej. 13.

MESNE, WRIT OF. The name of an ancient and now obsolete writ, which lies when the lord paramount distrains on the tenant paravail: the latter shall have a writ of mesne against the lord who is mesne. Fitzh. N. B. 316.

MESS BRIEF. In Danish Law. A certificate of admeasurement granted by competent authority at the home-port of a vessel. Jacobsen, Sea-Laws 50.

MESSAGE. See TELEGRAPH.

MESSAGE FROM THE CROWN. The method of communicating between the sovereign and the house of parliament. A written message under the royal sign manual is brought by a member of the house, being a minister of the crown, or one of the royal household. Verbal messages are also sometimes delivered; May, Parl. Pr. ch. 17.

MESSAGE, PRESIDENT'S. The annual communication of the President of the United States to congress, pursuant to art. II. sec. 3, of the constitution. It is usually delivered at the commencement of the session, and embodies the president's views and suggestions concerning the general affairs of the nation. Since Jefferson's time, at least, it has been in writing. Special messages are sent to congress from time to time as the president may deem expedient. A public document edited by James D. Richardson containing all messages and state papers of the president is now in course of publication, having reached the close of the administration of Hayes in the 7th volume.

MESSETHANE. One who said mass; a priest.

MESSENGER. A person appointed to perform certain duties, generally of a ministerial character, such as carriers of messages employed by a secretary of state, or officers of a court of justice, called, in Scotland, messengers at arms. Toml.; Paterson.

The officer who takes possession of an insolvent or bankrupt estate for the judge, commissioner, or other such officer.

The messenger of the English court of chancery has the duty of attending on the great seal, either in person or by deputy, and must be ready to execute all such orders as he shall receive from the lord chancellor, lord keeper, or lords commissioners. Brown.

MESSENGER SERVICE, DISTRICT. See DISTRICT TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.

MESSAGE. A term used in conveyancing, and nearly synonymous with dwelling-house.

A dwelling-house with the adjacent buildings and curtilage. 37 W. Va. 778.

A grant of a message with the appurtenances will not only pass a house, but all the buildings attached or belonging to it, as also its curtilage, garden, and orchard, together with the close on which the house is built; Co. METHOD. The mode of operating, or the means of attaining an object.

It has been questioned whether the method of making a thing can be patented. But it has been considered that a method or mode may be the subject of a patent, because when the object of two patents or effects to be produced is essentially the same, they may both be valid, if the modes of attaining the desired effect are essentially different. Dav. Pat. Cas. 290; 2 B. & Ald. 350; 2 H. Blackst. 492; 8 Term 106; 4 Burr. 2397; Peripigna, Manuel des Inventeurs, etc., c. 1, sect. 5, § 1, p. 22. See PATENT.

The goods in both these cases will be considered in transitu, provided the purchaser has not used the wharfinger's or the packer's warehouse as his own, and have an ulterior place of delivery in view; 4 Esp. 82; 2 B. & P. 457; 3 id. 127, 460; 1 Campb. 282; 1 Atk. 245; 1 H. MILEAGE. A compensation allowed by law to officers for their trouble and expenses in travelling on public business.

It usually signifies an allowance for travelling, as so much by the mile. 7 Mont. 82. In computing mileage, the distance by the road usually travelled is that which must be allowed, whether in fact the officer travels a more or less distant way to suit his own convenience; 16 Me. 431.

An allowance to a district attorney for mileage in the R. S. § 823, is simply a reimbursement for travelling expenses; 158 U. S. 346; irrespective of the amount of his compensation under the law; id.; he is allowed mileage for travelling from his place of abode to the place of examination, though the latter is his official headquarters, if his abode is elsewhere; 4 U. S. App. 886; it should be computed for the most convenient and practicable route and not by the shortest; id.; and will not be allowed one who goes home every Saturday and returns on Monday during a continuous session of the court; 153 U. S. 88.

In England, railway companies were required by the Railways Clauses Act of 1845 to set up such posts. Likewise, the trustees of turnpike roads were required to erect milestones on roads by 3 Geo. 4, c. 27, s. 119. Byrne.

MILITARY. Anything pertaining to war or to the army.

MILITARY BOUNTY LAND. Land granted by the United States to soldiers for services rendered in the army.

Claims for bounty land can be valid only on the following conditions: (1) The soldier must have been regularly mustered into the United States service (2) That his services were paid for by the United States; (3) That he served with the armed forces of the United States, subject to the military orders of a United States officer; 5 P. D. o. s. 92.

Title to bounty land is not impaired by the promotion to a commissioned officer of a private who subsequently continued in the service to the end of the war; 1 L. B. P. 115.

Under act March 3, 1850, title to bounty land is acquired, not only by militia or volunteers serving under the general command of the United States and in time of war, but also by those rendering military service, whether in war or not, and whether under the authority of the United States, or of a state or territory, if the United States has paid for the service. Service rendered in removing the Cherokee Indians is embraced by the act and gives title; 7 Op. Atty. Gen. 600.

was a widow at the date of the passage of the act and of filing her application; and if she be married or dead, the minor children are entitled; 2 L. B. P. 7.

Issuance of a bounty land warrant to a widow under the belief that her husband was dead, cannot be regarded as a satisfaction of his claim should it be shown that he is alive; 2 P. D. O. s. 488.

MILITARY FEUDS. The genuine or original feuds which were in the hands of military men, who performed military duty for their tenures.

MILITARY GOVERNMENT. That type of military jurisdiction under the Constitution of the United States to be exercised in time of foreign war without the boundaries of the United States, or in time of rebellion and civil war within states or districts occupied by rebels treated as belligerents. Military government supercedes, as far as may be deemed expedient, the local law, and is exercised by the military commander under the direction of the President, with the express or implied sanction of Congress. 4 Wall. (U. S.) 141, 142. See MILITARY JURISDICTION; MILITARY LAW, JURISDICTION UNDER; MARTIAL LAW.

MILITARY JURISDICTION. There are under the constitution three kinds of military jurisdiction; one to be exercised both in peace and war; another to be exercised in time of foreign war, without the boundaries of the United States, or in time of rebellion and civil war, within the states or districts occupied by rebels treated as belligerents; and a third to be exercised in time of invasion or insurrection within the limits of the United States, or during rebellion within the limits of states maintaining adhesion to the national government, when the public danger requires its exercise. The first of these may be called jurisdiction under military law, and is found in acts of congress prescribing rules and articles of war, or otherwise providing for the government of the national forces; the second may be distinguished as military government, superceding as far as may be deemed expedient, the local law, and exercised by the military commander under the direction of the president, with the express or implied sanction of congress; while the third may be denominated martial law proper, which title see; 4 Wall. 141.

MILITARY LAW. A system of regulations for the government of an army. 1 Kent 841, n.

That branch of the laws which respects military discipline and the government of persons employed in the military service. De Hart, Courts-Mart. 16.

Military law is to be distinguished from martial law. Martial law extends to all persons; military law to all military persons only, and not to those in a civil capacity. Martial law supercedes and suspends the civil law, but military law is superadded and subordinate to the civil law. Birk. Mil. G. & Mart. L. 1. See 2 Kent 10; 34 Me. 126; MARTIAL LAW; COURT-MARTIAL; MILITARY JURISDICTION.

The body of the military law of the United States is contained in the "act establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States," approved April 30, 1806, and various subsequent acts, some of the more important of which are those of May 29, 1800; August 6, 1846; July 29, 1861; August 3, 1861; August 5, 1861; December 24, 1861;

February 13, 1862; March 13, 1863; March 13, 1865; February 18, 1875. See, also, Act of February 28, 1795; 5 Wheat 1; 3 S. & R. 156, 790; the general regulations, and the orders of the president.

The act of 1806 consists of three sections, the first section containing one hundred and one articles, which describe very minutely the various military offences, the punishments which may be inflicted, the manner of summoning and the organization of courts-martial. These articles are called the articles of war. Their provisions extend to the militia mustered into the United States service, and to marines when serving with the army.

The military law of England was contained in the Mutiny Act, which has been passed annually from April 12, 1689, to 1879, when the Mutiny Act was consolidated with the articles of war, and this act was amended in 1881 by the Army Act (see MUTINY ACT), and the additional articles of war made and established by the sovereign. 2 Steph. Com. 589.

In addition, there are in both countries various usages which constitute an unwritten military law, which applies to those cases where there are no express provisions. 12 Wheat. 19; Benét, Mil. Law 3.

The sovereign, in England, has authority to ordain, by articles of war, with regard to crimes not specified by military law, every punishment not reaching to death or mutilation; the president of the United States cannot ordain any penalty for any military crime not expressly declared by act of congress.

The civil courts have no authority to review, control, or in any manner interfere with the action of the military tribunals, while regularly engaged in the exercise of their appropriate jurisdiction; 30 Fed. Rep. 176.

Consult Benét; De Hart; Cross; Samuels; Tyler, Military Law; Risley, Law of War; see MILITIA.

MILITARY LAW, JURISDICTION UNDER. That type of military jurisdiction under the Constitution of the United States to be exercised both in peace and war. It is found in acts of Congress prescribing rules and articles of war, or otherwise providing for the government of the national forces. 4 Wall. (U. S.) 141, 142. See MILITARY JURISDICTION; MILITARY GOVERNMENT; MARTIAL LAW.

MILITARY OCCUPATION. This at most gives the invader certain partial and limited rights of sovereignty. Until conquest, the sovereign rights of the original owner remain intact. Conquest gives the conqueror full rights of sovereignty and, retroactively, legalizes all acts done by him during military occupation. Its only essential is actual and exclusive possession, which must be effective.

The occupant administers the government and may, strictly speaking, change the municipal law, but it is considered the duty of the occupant to make as few changes in the ordinary administration of the laws as possible, though he may proclaim martial law if necessary. He may occupy public land and buildings; he cannot alienate them so as to pass a good title, but a subsequent conquest would probably complete the title. Ships of war, warlike stores and materials, treasure and like movable property belonging to the state vest in the occupant. State archives and historical records, charitable, etc., institutions, public buildings, museums, monuments, works of art, etc., and public buildings of lesser political subdivisions are safe from seizure; so usually are public vessels engaged in scientific discovery.

Private lands and houses are usually exempt. Private movable property is exempt, though subject to contributions and requisitions. Under the rules of the Brussels conference, the former are payments of money, to be levied only by the Commander-in-Chief. The latter consist in the supply of food or transport, or articles for the immediate use of the troops, and may be exacted by the commander of any detached body of troops, with or without payment. This appears to be a modified species of pillage. Military necessity may require the destruction of private property, and hostile acts of communities or individuals may be punished in the same way. Property may be liable to seizure as booty on the field of battle, or when a town refuses to capitulate and is carried by assault. When military occupation ceases, the state of things which existed previously is restored under the fiction of Postliminium (q. v.) See Risley, Law of War 184; WAR.

See POSTLIMINIUM.

MILITARY TENURE. Tenure in chivalry or knight service. See KNIGHT'S SERVICE.

MILITARY TESTAMENT. A nuncupative will, that is, one made by word of mouth, by which a soldier may dispose of his goods, pay, and other personal chattels, without the forms and solemnities which the law requires in other cases. 1 Vict. c. 12.

MILITES. Knights, and in Scotch law freeholders.

MILITIA. A part of the military force of the nation, consisting of citizens called forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion.

The constitution of the United States provides on this subject that congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of it as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by congress.

In accordance with the provisions of the constitution, congress, in 1792, act of May 8, passed an act relating to the militia, which has remained, with modifications, till the present time. Under these provisions the militia can be used for the suppression of rebellion as well as of insurrection; Birk. Mil. Gov. and Mart. L. 365; R. S. § 1042; 7 Wall. 700; 45 Pa. 288. The president of the United States is to judge when the exigency has arisen which requires the militia to be called out; 12 Wheat. 19; 8 Mass. 548. He may make his request directly to the executive of the state, or by an order directed to any subordinate officer of the state militia; 3 S. & R. 160, as provided by R. S. § 1042; and see 12 Wheat. 19; 5 Phila. 259.

When the militia are called into actual service, they are subject to the same rules and articles of war as the regular troops; R. S. § 1044, but a captain of a company of the National Guard of a state cannot summarily punish by imprisonment a member of his company for refusal to obey his orders when the company is not acting as a military force, unless that authority is conferred by statute; 67 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 999. The president may specify their term of service, not exceeding nine months; R. S. § 1048. When in actual service the militia are entitled to the same pay as the regular troops; R. S. § 1050. The militia, until mustered into the United States service, is considered as a state force; 3 S. & R. 109; 5 Wheat. 1. See 1 Kent 262; Story, Const. §§ 1194-1210. See generally 10 Ill. 123; 116 U. S. 267; MILITARY LAW; MARTIAL LAW.

MILK. In England milk means, commercially speaking, skimmed milk. 14 Q. B. Div. 193, where it was held that the sale of milk which had been deprived of sixty per cent of its butter fat was not an offence under § 6, Sale of Food and other Drugs Act, although under § 9 of the same act the sale of skimmed milk as milk is an offence; 24 Q. B. Div. 333; 59 L. J. M. C. 45.

A milk standard may be established by law; 101 N. Y. 634; 64 N. H. 404; 11 Allen 364; and a state may by statute authorize inspectors of milk to enter all carriages used for its conveyance, and wherever they have reason to believe the milk to be adulterated, to take specimens to be analyzed or tested; 133 Mass. 18; and vendors of milk must furnish samples gratuitously; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 502. If upon inspection milk is found to be adulterated, the vendor may be compelled to pour it upon the ground, or return it to the person who supplied it; 45 N. J. L. 469; 10 Hun 435. Such ordinances and statutes do not deprive persons of property without due process of law; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 502; 118 U. S. 81; 113 Mo. 395. See ADULTERATION; POLICE POWER.

MILK DEPOT. Where an ordinance provided that all persons selling milk at milk depots should pay a specified license fee, the words "milk depot" should be construed to mean any place where milk is sold whether exclusively or in connection with other lines of business; 133 Ky. 487; 156 S. W. 109.

MILL. A complicated engine or machine for grinding and reducing to fine particles grain, fruit, or other substance, or for performing other operations by means of wheels and a circular motion. The house or building that contains the machinery for grinding, etc. Webster, Dict.

Mills are so very different and various, that it is not easy to give a definition of the term. They are used for the purpose of grinding and pulverizing grain and other matters, to extract the juices of vegetables, to make various articles of manufacture. They take their names from the uses to which they are employed; hence we have paper-mills, fulling-mills, iron-mills, oil-mills, saw-mills, etc. In another respect their kinds are various; they are either fixed to the freehold or not. Those which are a part of the freehold are either water-mills, wind-mills, steam-mills, etc.; those which are not so fixed are hand-mills, and are merely personal property. Those which are fixed, and make a part of the freehold, are buildings with machinery calculated to attain the object proposed in their erection.

It has been held that the grant of a mill and its appurtenances, even without the land, carries the whole right of water enjoyed by the grantor, as necessary to its use, and as a necessary incident; Cro. Jac. 121. And a devise of a mill carries the land used with it, and the right to use the water; Washb. Easem. 52; 1 S. & R. 169. And see 5 id. 107; 10 id. 83; 2 Caines, 68; 87 N. H. 190; 7 Mass. 6; 6 Me. 184; 436; 16 id. 281.

The owner of a mill, whose dam and machinery are suited to the size and capacity of the stream, has a right to the reasonable use of the water to propel his machinery; but he must detain it no longer than is necessary for its profitable enjoyment, and must return it to its natural channel, before it passes upon the land of the proprietor below; 41 Ga. 162; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 626. See 4 Ballard, R. P. § 878; D.M.

A mill means not merely the building in which the business is carried on, but includes the site, the dam, and other things annexed to the freehold, necessary for its beneficial enjoyment; Gould, Waters § 307; 3 Mass. 280; see 6 Me. 436; and a water power also when applied to a mill becomes a part of the mill, and is to be included in the valuation; 87 Vt. 622.

Whether manufacturing machinery will pass under the grant of a mill must depend mainly on the circumstances of each case; 8 Washb. R. P. 415; 1 Brod. & B. 506; Ewall, Fict. 94. See 30 Conn. 18. As between mortgagor and mortgagee, a saw-mill and its appointments are prima facie part of the realty, if no intent is shown to change their character; 39 Mich. 777. When an estate for years was by a conveyance to the lessee merged in the fee, it was held that machinery by him firmly annexed to the premises, did not, by operation of law and without intent on his part, become a part of the realty; 76 N. Y. 28. See FIXTURES.

MILL. The tenth part of a cent in value.

MILLED MONEY. This term means merely coined money; and it is not necessary that it should be marked or rolled on the edges. Running's case, Leach, Cr. Cas. 706.

MIL-REIS. The name of a coin. The mil-reis of Portugal is taken as money of account, at the custom-house, to be of the value of one hundred and twelve cents. The mil-reis of Azores is deemed of the value of eighty-three and one-third cents. The mil-reis of Madeira is deemed of the value of one hundred cents; 6 Stat. at Large, 625.

MINA. A measure of corn or grain. Cowel.

A measure of ground containing one hundred and twenty feet in length, and many in breadth. It is also taken both for a coin and a weight. Jacob; Lit. Dict.

MINAGE. A toll or duty paid for selling grain by the Mina. Cowel.

MINATOR or MINERATOR. A miner.

MIND. In its legal sense it means only the ability to will, to direct, to permit or assent. 43 N. J. L. 492.

A popular term used to mean the rational faculty, or the understanding; also, the state of the mental faculties; inclination, desire, purpose, intent; also, memory, recollection. Anderson; 15 Wall. (U. S.) 589.

MIND AND MEMORY. A testator must have a sound and disposing mind and memory. In other words, he "ought to be capable of making his will with an understanding of the nature of the business in which he is engaged, a recollection of the property he means to dispose of, the persons who are the object of his bounty, and the manner in which it is to be distributed between them." Washington, J., 3 Wash. C. C. 585, 586; 4 id. 262; 1 Green Ch. 82, 85; 2 id. 563, 604; 26 Wend. 255, 306, 311, 312; 8 Conn. 285; 9 id. 105. Mind and memory are convertible terms; 54 Barb. 274.

MINE RUN COAL. In mining parlance, all of the coal that comes out of the mine from the picks, embracing lump, nut and slack. 57 S. W. 12.

MINERALS (L. Lat. minera, a vein of metal). All fossil bodies or matters dug out of mines or quarries, whence anything may be dug; such as beds of stone which may be quarried. 14 M. & W. 859, construing 55 Geo. III. c. 18; Broom, Leg. Max. 176<sup>a</sup>.

Any natural production, formed by the action of chemical affinities, and organized when becoming solid by the powers of crystallization. Webster, Dict. But see 5 Watts 84; 1 Crabb, R. P. 95; OIL.

The term mineral has been defined as "every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth, for the purpose of profit;" L. E. 7 Ch. App. 699; and in another case it is said that the word does not include anything except that which is part of the natural soil; 38 Ch. D. 556. It has been held to include coal; 73 Mo. 96; paint-stone; 2 Stookt. 188; free-stone; L. R. 1 Ch. 308; and petroleum; 86 Pa. 196. See OIL.

The words minerals and ores have been held to include only minerals obtained by underground working; 147 N. Y. 495.

The term mineral lands, as used in the statutes relating to the public domain, embraces coal lands; 118 U. S. 271; and mineral deposits are not only metals proper but also salt, coal, and the like. 10 N. J. Eq. 128.

Minerals severed from the earth by artificial means are personal property and dealt with by the law as such; Barr. & Ad. Mines 5; being taxable as personalty; 94 U. S. 763; the subject of larceny; 85 Cal. 671; 166 Pa. 400; or recoverable in trover; 53 Pa. 261; or replevin; 63 id. 97. This is not the case, however, where the severance results from natural causes or incidentally from excavation; id.; hence a nugget of gold found upon loose rocks was held to be a part of the realty and was not the subject of larceny; 64 N. C. 619. See MINES AND MINING.

MINERATOR. See MINATOR.

MINES AND MINING. A mine is an excavation in the earth for the purpose of obtaining minerals.

Mines of gold and silver belonged, at common law, to the sovereign; 1 Plowd. 810; 3 Kent 378, n.; 17 Wall. 329; and it has been said that, though the king grant lands in which mines are, and all mines in them, yet royal mines (q. v.) will not pass by so general a description; Plowd. 336. In New York the state's right as sovereign was asserted at an early day, and reasserted by the legislature as late as 1828; 8 Kent 378, n. In Pennsylvania the Royal Charter to Penn reserved one-fifth of the precious metal as rent, and the patents granted by Penn usually reserved two-fifths of the gold and silver. An act passed in 1848 declared that all patents granted by the state pass the entire estate of the commonwealth. In California, after much discussion, it seems to be finally settled that minerals belong to the owner of the soil and not to the government as an incident of sovereignty; 17 Cal. 199; 8 Wall. 804; 2 Black 17. In 17 Cal. 199, Field, C. J., upon thorough examination of the subject, rejected the doctrine of sovereign title as an assertion of personal prerogative of the British crown, neither applicable to our institutions nor a necessary incident of sovereignty in the larger sense. The prerogative title of the sovereign was in Oregon treated as conceded; 5 Ore. 104. It was held that in Maryland the mines passed by royal grant to Lord Baltimore, subject to a reservation of one-fifth of gold and silver found and that the entire title passed to the state, the interest of the proprietor by confiscation, and that of the king by conquest; 147 U. S. 262. The same prerogative right was very early asserted in New Jersey; 30 N. J. Eq. 823, note. It is said that the question is not of practical importance since the title to mineral lands generally in the United States is derived from public grants, and the right to minerals therein is regulated by law; Barr. & Ad. Mines 179. As to mineral lands and claims and their location under the United States laws, see LANDS, PUBLIC; Barr. & Ad. Mines ch. 6. See Judge Dallas's note to Bainbr. Mines 87.

Minerals in the beds of navigable waters below low water mark are owned by the state against which an appropriator without a grant is a trespasser, although he has a good title against any one else; Barr. & Ad. Mines 180. See 32 Fla. 82; 88 Pa. 890; 81 id. 156; 144 U. S. 550; 22 S. C. 50. The same rule applies to minerals found under highways; 19 Ga. 89; 23 Minn. 186; 117 Ill. 411; 5 Mas. 105. See 14 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 486.

Where lands are taken under the right of eminent domain, strictly only a right of way passes, but it is sometimes held that the appropriator may use minerals taken therefrom for making or repairing the road-bed; 5 Watts 546; at least those above grade which must be excavated; 39 Mo. 141; but the better opinion is said to be that no such right exists and that minerals remain the property of the owner of the soil; Barr. & Ad. Mines 186; 124 Ind. 329; 58 Pa. 261; 2 Meto. 482. See 24 A. & E. Ry. Cas. 143.

All mineral lands of the general government, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are free and open to exploration and occupation, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and also to local customs or rules of miners when not in conflict with the laws of the United States. R. S. § 2319.

See 94 U. S. 763; LANDS, PUBLIC.

It is the policy of the government to favor the development of mines of gold, silver, and other metals, and every facility is afforded for that purpose; but it exacts a faithful compliance with the conditions required; 125 U. S. 673. A mineral lode or vein whose location is perfected under the law is the property of the locators or their assigns, and not subject to disposal by the government; 127 U. S. 348.

Subject to the rights of the public, growing out of its original ownership, or as provided by law in special cases, the right to minerals belongs to the owner of the soil, and passes by a grant thereof, unless separated; 1 N. Y. 564; 82 id. 478; 19 Pick. 314; 53 Vt. 641; 21 W. N. C. Pa. 491; but the owner may convey his mines by a separate and distinct grant, so as to create one freehold in the soil and another in the mines; 1 Pa. 726; 7 Cush. 861; 8 id. 21; 3 M. & W. 50; 84 Ala. 228; 96 Ill. 279; and after such severance of the mines from the soil each is entirely independent of the other, separately inheritable, and capable of conveyance; Barr. & Ad. Mines 3.

In case of a separate ownership, the owner of the mine must support the superincumbent soil; 12 Q. B. 799; 5 M. & W. 60; 12 Exch. 259; and ancient buildings or other erections; 2 H. & N. 828. See 2 Cent. L. J. 655; 24 id. 270; 12 Alb. L. J. 162. But in California a miner will not be enjoined against disturbance of crops, unless the appropriation of the land was anterior to the mining location; 23 Cal. 593.

A lessee having the right to mine coal under land over which a railroad is operated, can only mine so much of the coal as can be removed without injury to the surface; 75 Ia. 78. The lessor's measure of damages where there are sinks and depressions in the surface of the land due to lessee's negligence in operating a mine, is the depreciation in the value of the land; 155 Pa. 256.

The estate in the minerals as distinguished from the soil, is created under what are known as mining leases. Where the minerals are undisturbed as a part of the soil they are said to be in place. The severance of the estate in the soil and in the minerals may be by conveyance, by whatever name designated, of all, or a clearly defined part, of the minerals, in which case there passes to the grantee an estate in fee in the minerals, with the privilege of using the land so far as may be necessary for the purpose stated; 7 Fed. Rep. 634. This is the effect of a conveyance even if it be called a lease or limits a term of years within which the minerals are to be taken out; Barr. & Ad. Mines 36. The effect of this is said to be the somewhat paradoxical result of the limitation of a fee-simple estate for a term of years, and the resulting difficulty is sought to be avoided by treating the limitation of the term as not upon the estate but upon the appurtenant rights, without which it would be valueless, and in case of failure to take out the mineral within the specified time it is forfeited to the grantor; 143 Pa. 293; 128 id. 485; 105 id. 469; 21 N. J. Eq. 410, affirming 19 id. 202. A lease for mining purposes, the rent to be a certain part of the ore mined, is forfeited by failure to work the mines for a number of years; 112 N. C. 677. Such instruments, even where the term license is employed, are held to be not a mere license, but to pass a property or to create an estate in the minerals; 98 Mich. 90; 47 Ind. 105; 150 Ill. 344; 86 Va. 315. See Barr. & Ad. Mines 36, where the cases are collected and examined. A true leasehold interest in the land may be created with an appurtenant right to take minerals, in which case the lessee is a tenant for years, and his possession and property of the soil and the minerals are the same; 5 Jones, L. 440; 120 Pa. 590; 89 id. 47; 32 Hun 363. Where the permission is to take all the coal and the term is indefinite, the lease expires when the latter is exhausted; 53 Ill. 210. In New York this doctrine is limited, so as to apply only where "the whole body of the coal, considered as of cubical dimensions and capable of descriptive separation from the earth above and around it, and as it lies in its place, is absolutely and presently conveyed. The thing sold must be such that it can be identified as land severed, as land, from the estate of which it forms a part;" 136 N. Y. 593, where Finch, J., citing the Pennsylvania cases, says: "Every case upholding the doctrine, which I have been able to examine, has that marked characteristic." In this case which reversed 122 id. 506, the "lease" of all the coal contained under a described contract designated it as including all the coal that could be economically mined or taken out.

There may be a license to take all of a certain mineral in a designated tract, which is an incorporeal right, of which the distinguishing character is that it does not carry with it a possession exclusive of the owner of the soil; Barr. & Ad. Mines 53. It must be created by deed; 73 Ill. 453; and it is not revocable except after breach of covenant; 66 Mo. 430. It carries the right of property in the minerals only after they are severed; 32 N. J. Eq. 248; it is termed a license irrevocable and the word "all" describes the extent to which it may be exercised, not its exclusiveness; 2 Wall. Jr. 81.

A mere parol license is a personal privilege, unassignable, concurrent with a right of the licensor to mine, revocable at will, and vests no title to the minerals until severed; Barr. & Ad. Mines 67; 32 Fed. Rep. 177; 53 Pa. 206; 123 N. Y. 298.

Opening new mines by a tenant is waste, unless the demise includes them; Co. Litt. 53 b; 2 Bla. Com. 282; 1 Taunt. 410; but if the mines be already open, it is not waste to work them even to exhaustion; 1 Taunt. 410; 19 Pa. 324; 108 id. 307; 6 Munf. 134; 1 Rand. 258; 10 Pick. 460; 1 Cow. 460. See Smith, Landl. & T. 192, 193, n. In a suit for redemption of a mortgage, the mortgagee was allowed for large sums expended in working a mine which he had a right to work; 25 L. J. Ch. 121, but in another case, expenses incurred in opening a mine were disallowed; 16 Sim. 445.

In California, the occupant of public lands, who holds them for agricultural purposes merely, holds them subject to the right of any person to dig for gold; 5 Cal. 36, 97; but the miner must take them as he finds them, subject to prior rights of the same character; 5 Cal. 140, 308; 6 id. 148; a miner cannot take private lands; 44 Cal. 460.

An injunction lies for interference with mines; 6 Ves. 147.

Mineral deposits are usually divided into what are termed lode or vein and placer deposits. The terms lode and vein are generally used interchangeably (see LODE), but they are usually "found together in the statutes and both are intended to indicate the presence of metal in rock; yet a lode may, and often does, contain more than one vein; Field, J., in 128 U. S. 673.

A placer is a superficial deposit occupying the bed of an ancient river. Barr. & Ad. Mines 476. In federal legislation it is defined to include "all forms of deposit excepting veins and quartz or other rock in place." R. S. § 2329. These statutes divide all deposits into two classes, veins or lodes, and placers, and the former being well defined, the latter is made to include all others; Barr. & Ad. Mines 476. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

The dip of a vein is its downward course, and this the locator may follow indefinitely even though it take him beneath the ground of another and outside of his own vertical side lines; Barr. & Ad. Mines 441.

The strike of a vein is "its onward course, its direction or trend across and through the country." id.

The apex of a vein is the highest point where it approaches nearest to the surface of the earth, and where it is broken at its edge so as to appear to be the beginning or end of a vein. 1 McCrary 480. If a vein at its highest point turns over and pursues its course downward, then such point is merely a swell in the mineral matter and not a true apex; id. This is a term used in mining law in what is known as the apex rule, as to which see LANDS, PUBLIC, sub. Mineral Lands.

A miner whose location is on the apex of a lode may follow it to any depth, although in its downward course it may enter the adjoining land; but no location made on the middle of a lode or otherwise than at the top or apex, will enable the locator to go beyond his line; 3 Fed. Rep. 388. The apex is not necessarily a point, but often a line of great length and any portion of it, if found within the limits of a claim, is sufficient to entitle the locator to obtain title. He may follow his vein into the territory of another beyond his side lines, but not further than his own end lines, beyond which it is subject to further discovery and appropriation; 144 U. S. 19; 50 Fed. Rep. 888; but where the apex which intersects an end line passes out of the claim across one of the side lines, the owner may still follow so much of the lode on the dip as lies between the end line, through which the vein passed, and its point of divergence from the claim; 60 Fed. Rep. 212. Where two claims are so located that to follow the dip beyond the side lines would cause a conflict, that having priority of location must prevail; 54 Fed. Rep. 284. See U. S. Rev. Stat. § 2336. See as to locator's property in vein, 13 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 551, 580, 575.

A mining claim is a parcel of land containing precious metal in its soil or rock. A location is the act of appropriating such parcel, according to certain established rules. If the miner has only one location that "location" is identical with "mining claim," and the two designations may be indiscriminately used to denote the same thing. 104 U. S. 649; if he acquires an adjoining location his claim covers both; id. See Lindl. Mines § 327. A transfer of a mining claim must be in writing; 73 Cal. 541.

A mining claim is real estate; 1 Mont. 245; and descends to the heir; 15 Col. 143; it is property; 9 Utah 54; subject to execution; 9 Cal. 137; and taxation; 12 id. 56; and a lien for unpaid taxes; 94 U. S. 782. An owner out of possession may maintain an ejectment or corresponding action; 7 Cal. 317; 4 N. M. 378; 1 Mont. 475; 17 Cal. 371; 84 Fed. Rep. 515; 116 U. S. 687; contra, 24 Ore. 265. See as to claims, 14 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 152.

There is no right of dower in an unpatented mining claim; 163 U. S. 445; but in some cases dower has been allowed in mines; 92 Mich. 186; 73 Ill. 405; 150 id. 560; 13 N. J. Eq. 889; 61 Ind. 473; 1 Cow. 460; 3 Pick. 17. See as to dower, 7 U. S. App. 398; 8 C. 52 Fed. Rep. 859.

Of joint owners, either may mine without the consent of the others, using the common property for the purpose intended, and it is no objection that the use is consumption; 64 Cal. 134; it is not waste; but he must account to his co-owners for ore mined; 25 Conn. 137; 178 Pa. 444; and any act for the benefit of the property, as the purchase of a paramount title, inures to the benefit of all; 22 Col. 129. The interest may be the subject of partition; 23 Cal. 502; but the mere fact of joint ownership does not give an equitable right to a division; the question must be fairly considered by a chancellor upon all the circumstances; 28 Fed. Rep. 220.

Joint owners who co-operate in working, constitute a mining partnership without any specific contract or agreement; Barr. & Ad. Mines 753. There may be an ordinary commercial partnership in the working of a mine, but this will arise only from agreement. A mining partnership, properly so called, is a relation springing only by implication from actual co-operation in the work; 102 U. S. 641; 13 Bush 67; 77 Mo. 52; 30 Cal. 290; 42 id. 636; 149 Ill. 575. A mining partnership is not dissolved by the death of a partner, nor by the sale of his interest to a stranger; in the latter case the purchaser becomes a partner; 42 Cal. 307; 69 id. 540; 5 Col. 107.

Mining partnerships are in some states effectually regulated by statute: Cal. C. C. § 2511-20; Mont. C. C. §§ 3300-9; Idaho, R. S. §§ 3301-9. In the latter state it has been said that a mining partnership, by virtue of the statute, "in all its essential elements is precisely like a corporation;" 33 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 40, where the substance of the statute is given. See as to Mining partnerships; 28 Am. St. Rep. 488.

In most states where mining is an important industry, there are statutory provisions for securing the safety of those engaged in the employment. For a citation of these statutes see Barr. & Ad. Mines, 780, note 1, where it is said that a discussion of the cases arising under these statutes is impossible because they involve no general principle. Such statutes have been held constitutional; 75 Pa. 26; 4 Sup. Ct. Pa. 363. They are an exercise of the police power, as to the propriety and validity of which there can be little question. In their relation to the law of negligence these statutes enlarge and define the obligation of the mine owner, and fix absolutely his responsibility for injuries resulting from failure to comply with the act, wherever that failure is the proximate cause of the injury. But the violation of the statute does not excuse contributory negligence or authorize the employee to neglect his own safety: Barr. & Ad. Mines 785, where the cases are collected.

MINIMUM WAGE. The smallest amount an employer may legally offer a laborer in compensation for work done and supposed to be that which will be a living wage. Stand. Dict. Such wages have in late years been established by statute both in the United States and in England.

MINING COMPANIES. Corporations or joint stock companies formed for the purpose of carrying out a mining project. See 15 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 631.

MINING PARTNERSHIP. See MINES AND MINING.

MINISTER. In Governmental Law. An officer who is placed near the sovereign, and is invested with the administration of the government. Ministers are responsible to the king or other supreme magistrate who has appointed them. 4 Conn. 134.

In Ecclesiastical Law. One ordained by some church to preach the gospel. All clergymen of every denomination and faith. 35 Neb. 375. A person elected by a Methodist society to be one of their local preachers, and ordained as a deacon of that church is a minister of the gospel, within a statute exempting ministers from taxation. 1 Me. 102. So is a person ordained as a Congregational minister and installed as such over a town. 2 Pick. 403. See L. R. 8 Q. B. 69.

Formerly the word was applied only to deacons, but it is now the most comprehensive ecclesiastical title. In the prayer-book it means the officiating clergyman, whether bishop, priest, or deacon. 14 P. D. 148.

Ministers are authorized in the United States, generally, to solemnize marriages, and are liable to fines and penalties for marrying minors contrary to the local regulations. As to the rights of ministers or parsons, see 3 Am. Jur. 268; Shepp. Touchst. Anthon ed. 584; 2 Mass. 500; 10 id. 97; 14 id. 333; 11 Me. 487. CLERGY; BENEFIT OF CLERGY; PARSON.

In International Law. An officer appointed by the government of one nation, with the consent of two other nations who have a matter in dispute, with a view by his interference and good offices to have such matter settled.

A name given to public functionaries who represent their country with foreign governments, including ambassadors, envoys, and residents.

A custom of recent origin has introduced a new kind of ministers, without any particular determination of character; these are simply called ministers, to indicate that they are invested with the general character of a sovereign's mandatories, without any particular assignment of rank or character.

The minister represents his government in a vague and indeterminate manner, which cannot be equal to the first degree; and he possesses all the rights essential to a public minister.

There are also ministers plenipotentiary, who, as they possess full powers, are of much greater distinction than simple ministers. These, also, are without any particular attribution of rank and character, but by custom are now placed immediately below the ambassador, or on a level with the envoy extraordinary; Vattel, liv. 4, c. 5, § 74; 1 Kent 48; Merlin. Répert.

Formerly no distinction was made in the different classes of public ministers, but the modern usage of Europe introduced some distinctions in this respect, which, on account of a want of precision, had become the source of controversy. To obviate these, the congress of Vienna, and that of Aix-la-Chapelle, put an end to these disputes by classing ministers as follows:—

1. Ambassadors, and papal legates or nuncios. 2. Envoys, ministers, or others accredited to sovereigns (auprès des souverains). 3. Ministers resident, accredited to sovereigns. 4. Chargés d'affaires, accredited to the minister of foreign affairs. Public ministers take rank among themselves, in each class, according to the date of the official notification of the arrival at the court to which they are accredited. Recez, du Congrès de Vienne, du 19 mars, 1815; Protocol du Congrès d'Aix-la-Chapelle, du Novembre, 1818; Wheaton, Int. Law § 211.

Consuls and other commercial agents are not, in general, considered as public ministers. See AMBASSADOR; CONSUL; RECALL. FOREIGN MINISTER.

MINISTERIAL. That which is done under the authority of a superior; opposed to judicial; as, the sheriff is a ministerial officer bound to obey the judicial commands of the court.

A ministerial act may be defined to be one which a person performs in a given state of facts, in a prescribed manner, in obedience to the mandate of legal authority without regard to or the exercise of his own judgment upon the propriety of the acts being done. 12 So. Rep. (La.) 940; 60 Conn. 448; 15 Fed. Rep. 16; 50 Tex. 501. Acts done out of court in bringing parties into court are, as a general proposition, ministerial acts; 54 Ind. 376. See 18 How. 396; 40 Wisc. 175; 49 Ala. 311.

When an officer acts in both a judicial and ministerial capacity, he may be compelled to perform ministerial acts in a particular way; but when he acts in a judicial capacity, he can only be required to proceed; the manner of doing so is left entirely to his judgment. See 10 Me. 377; Bacon, Abr. Justices of the Peace (E); 1 Conn. 295; 3 id. 107; 9 id. 275; 12 id. 404; MANDAMUS; OFFICE.

MINISTERIAL DUTY. One in respect to which nothing is left to discretion. A simple definite duty, arising under conditions admitted or proved to exist, and imposed by law, the performance of which may, in proper cases, be required of the head of a department by judicial process. 4 Wall. 498; 61 Conn. 553.

It is to be contrasted with executive duty. Id. Ministerial is also opposed to judicial or discretionary. Thus, a ministerial office or duty is one which merely involves the following of instructions; in other words, one which can be performed without the exercise of more than ordinary skill, prudence or discretion, e.g., the payment or receipt of money, the execution of a deed, etc. A judicial or discretionary office or duty, however, involves the exercise of judgment or discretion. Byrne.

MINISTERIAL TRUSTS (also called instrumental trusts). Those which demand no further exercise of reason or understanding than every intelligent agent must necessarily employ; as, to convey an estate. They are a species of special trusts, distinguished from discretionary trusts, which necessarily require much exercise of the understanding. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1896.

MINISTRY. The term as used in England is wider than Cabinet and includes all the holders of public office who come in and go out with the Prime Minister. In this respect it may be contrasted with the Permanent Civil Service, whose tenure is independent of public changes. The Prime Minister decides on the number of ministers to be admitted to the Cabinet. The general officers of the Royal Household, such as the Lord Steward, etc., are a part of the ministry.

MINNESOTA. One of the states of the United States of America.

It was created a territory by act of congress, March 3, 1849, and admitted into the Union as a state, May 11, 1858, under a constitution framed and adopted by a convention at St. Paul, on the 27th day of August, 1857, pursuant to an act of congress of February 28, 1857, and submitted to and ratified by the people on the 18th of October, 1857.

MINOR (Lat. less; younger). One not a major, i. e. not twenty-one. Co. 2d Inst. 291; Co. Litt. 88, 128, 173 b; 6 Co. 67; 3 Bulstr. 143; Bracton, 340 b; Fleta, l. 2, c. 60, § 26.

Of less consideration; lower. Calvinus, Lex. Major and minor belong rather to civil law. The common-law terms are adult and infant. See LIMITATIONS.

MINORA REGALIA. The lesser prerogatives of the crown, relating to revenue. 1 Bla. Com. 241.

They were distinguished from the majora regalia, the greater of the royal prerogatives. Id.

MINORIES. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

MINORITY. The state or condition of a minor; infancy. See FULL AGE; INFANT.

The smaller number of votes of a deliberative assembly; opposed to majority, which see.

The minority of a committee to which a corporate power has been delegated, cannot bind the majority, or do any valid act in the absence of any special provision otherwise: 127 U. S. 579.

MINT. The place designated by law where money is coined by authority of the government.

The mint was established by the act of April 2, 1792, 1 Story U. S. Laws, 227, and located at Philadelphia. There are mints of the United States now at Philadelphia, San Francisco, New Orleans, Carson, and Denver. R. S. § 3495. A failure by the director of the mint to observe a rule prescribing that he shall, at the annual settlement, require the weighing and counting of all bullion in the mints, does not relieve a superintendent of a mint of his responsibility for bullion in his custody; 77 Fed. Rep. 944. His receipt for a certain quantity of bullion, and his admissions in reports and accounts that he holds it, are at least prima facie evidence that it came into his possession; id. He and his bondsmen are responsible for the loss of bullion which he has received, and which he cannot produce, though it has been lost or stolen without any negligence or fault on his part; id. When he has, on assuming office, receipted for a certain quantity of bullion, the same is thereafter in his custody, though accepted by him under lock and seal on the faith of a certificate as to its amount; id.

See COIN; FOREIGN COIN; MONEY; ANNUAL ASSAY; PRIVILEGED PLACES.

MINT-MARK. The masters and workmen of the mint, in the indentures made with them, agree "to make a privy mark in the money they make, of gold and silver, so that they may know which moneys were of their own making; after every trial of the pix, having proved their moneys to be lawful, they are entitled to their quietus under the Great Seal, and to be thereunto discharged from all suits or actions; they then change the privy mark, so that the moneys from which they are not yet discharged may be distinguished from those for which they are; they use the new mark until another trial of the pix. Wharton.

MINTAGE. That which is coined or stamped.

MINTAGE CLOSE. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

MINUS. Less; less than.

In many phrases of the Civil Law, this word had the sense of "not." Thus, a debt was said to be minus solutum, though none of it had been paid. (Dig. 50. 16. 32.) Also, used in some Common Law phrases. E.g., minus satis; insufficient. (Cro. Jac. 552.) Minus sufficiens in literatura; incompetent in point of learning. (1 Bl. Com. 390.) Burrill.

MINUTE. Measures. In divisions of the circle or angular measures, a minute is equal to sixty seconds, or one-sixtieth part of a degree.

In the computation of time, a minute is equal to sixty seconds, or the sixtieth part of an hour. See MEASURE.

In Practice. A memorandum of what takes place in court, made by authority of the court. From these minutes the record is afterwards made up.

Toullier says they are so called because the writing in which they were originally was small: that the word is derived from the Latin minuta (scriptura), in opposition to copies which were delivered to the parties, and which were always written in a larger hand. 8 Toullier, n. 418.

Minutes are not considered as any part of the record; 1 Ohio 268. See 23 Pick. 184. It is not the office of the clerk's minutes to indicate the legal questions raised upon a trial and determined by the court; 94 N. Y. 514; 80 Ky. 877; 84 La. Ann. 869.

OF CORPORATE MEETINGS. It is usual for boards of directors of corporations to keep a regular record in writing of their proceedings. It has been said that such a record is essential either to the proof or validity of their acts and contracts. Such may be the case if the charter makes the keeping of such a record essential to the validity of corporate acts. But in the absence of a provision directing the keeping of such records, there appears to be no reason for any distinction between recording in writing the acts of a board of agents of a corporation, and of the agents of a natural person. Provisions in charters directing that minutes be kept are merely directory; a failure to keep them does not affect the validity of corporate acts; 12 Wheat. 75; Ang. & A. Corp. 291a; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires 522, n. b. See 96 U. S. 271; 111 Mass. 315; 32 Vt. 638. When such records are kept, they are the best evidence of the proceedings of a meeting; but if no minutes were kept, or if, in a suit against the corporation, and upon notice, the corporation neglects or refuses to produce its books, other evidence is admissible; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. 467; 32 Vt. 638; 111 Mass. 815; Ang. & A. Corp. 291a.

MINUTE-BOOK. A book kept by the clerk or prothonotary of a court, in which minutes of its proceedings are entered.

See RECORD BOOKS.

MINUTE TITHES. Small tithes, usually belonging to the vicar; e. g. eggs, honey, wax, etc. 8 Burn, Eccl. Law 680; 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 71, §§ 17, 18, 27.

MIRROR DES JUSTICES. The Mirror of Justices, a legal treatise once supposed to have been written during the reign of Edward II. Andrew Horne is its reputed author. But it has been thought that the germ of it was written before the Conquest and that Horne only made additions to it; Marv. Leg. Bibl. 396. But F. W. Maitland holds to the contrary; and also that the evidence that Horne wrote it is not conclusive. It was first published in 1642, and in 1646 it was translated into English by William Hughes. Some diversity of opinion seems to exist as to its merits. Pref. to 9 & 10 Co. Rep. As to the history of this celebrated book, see St. Armand's Hist. Essays on the Legislative Power of England 58; 2 Reeve, Hist. 358; 4 id. 116 n.

Maitland's opinion of the work may be gathered in a few words from his introduction to the reprint of it in 1893, by the Selden Society: "Is he [its author] lawyer, antiquary, preacher, agitator, pedant, faddist, lunatic, romancer, liar? A little of all, perhaps, but the romancer seems to predominate."

MISADVENTURE. An accident by which an injury occurs to another.

When applied to homicide, misadventure is the act of a man who, in the performance of a lawful act, without any intention to do harm, and after using proper precaution to prevent danger, unfortunately kills another person. The act upon which the death ensues must be neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum. The usual examples under this head are: 1, when the death ensues from innocent recreations; 2, from moderate and lawful correction in foro domestico; 3, from acts lawful and indifferent in themselves, done with proper and ordinary caution; 4 Bla. Com. 162; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 221. It happens in consequence of a lawful act; involuntary manslaughter, in consequence of an unlawful act; 98 Ala. 57. See HOMICIDE; MANSLAUGHTER; CORRECTION.

MISAPPLICATION. As used in 7 Hen. IV. s. 44, the misapplication of public funds only covers cases of corrupt practices or of showing illegal favor. 80 H. L. 752.

Improper or unlawful disposition or application. Anderson. It is not sufficient to aver simply that a defendant "wilfully misapplied" trust funds; there must be averments to show how the application was made and that it was an unlawful one. 107 U. S. 669.

MISAPPROPRIATION. It is not a technical term of law, but it is sometimes applied to the misdemeanor which is committed by a banker, factor, agent, trustee, etc., who fraudulently deals with money goods, securities, etc., entrusted to him, or by a director or public officer of a corporation or company who fraudulently misapplies any of its property. Sweet. L. Dict. See EMBEZZLEMENT.

MISBEHAVIOR. Improper or unlawful conduct. See 2 Mart. La. N. s. 683.

A party guilty of misbehavior, as, for example, to threaten to do injury to another, may be bound to his good behavior, and thus restrained. As to misbehavior of juries, see NEW TRIAL.

MISBRANDED. The term misbranded and the phrase defining what amounts to misbranding in the Food and Drugs Act, 1906, are aimed at false statements as to identity of the article, possibly including strength, quality and purity, dealt with in § 7 of the Act, and not at statements as to curative effect. 221 U. S. 488.

MISCARRIAGE. In Medical Jurisprudence. The expulsion of the ovum or embryo from the uterus within the first six weeks after conception. Between that time, and before the expiration of the sixth month, when the child may possibly live, it is termed abortion. When the delivery takes place soon after the sixth month, it is denominated premature labor. But the criminal act of destroying the fetus at any time before birth is termed, in law, procuring miscarriage. Chitty, Med. Jur. 410; 2 Dugl. Hum. Phys. 864. See ABORTION; FETUS.

In Practice. A term used in the Statute of Frauds to denote that species of wrongful act for the consequences of which the wrongdoer would be responsible at law in a civil action.

By the English Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, § 4, it is enacted that "no action shall be brought to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, unless the agreement," etc., "shall be in writing," etc.

The wrongful riding the horse of another, without his leave or license, and thereby causing his death, is clearly an act for which the party is responsible in damages, and, therefore, falls within the meaning of the word miscarriage: 2 B. & Ald. 516; Burge, Sur. 21.

MISCASTING. An error in auditing and numbering. It does not include any pretended miscasting or misvaluing. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4128.

MISCEGENATION. (Lat. miscere, to mix, and genere, to beget). A mixture of races. The intermarriage of persons belonging to the white and black races. In many of the states this is prohibited by statute. The constitutionality of such statutes has been repeatedly affirmed; Cl. Cr. L. 321; 80 Mo. 175; McClain Cr. L. § 57; 3 Tex. App. 283; 58 Ala. 190; s. c. 80 Am. Rep. 131; 30 Gratt. 858; 3 Heisk. 287. It has been further held that a statute denouncing a severer penalty on persons of the two races living together in adultery, than that prescribed for a like offence between persons of the same race, is constitutional; 58 Ala. 190; s. c. 29 Am. Rep. 739; s. c. 106 U. S. 583; 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1754. See CIVIL RIGHTS.

MISCHIEF. A term used in the law of statutory construction to designate the evil or danger intended to be cured or avoided by the statute. See MALICIOUS MISCHIEF.

MISCOGNIZANT. Ignorant, or not knowing. Stat. 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9. Little used.

MISCONDUCT. Unlawful behavior by a person intrusted in any degree with the administration of justice, by which the rights of the parties and the justice of the case may have been affected.

A verdict will be set aside when any of the jury have been guilty of such misconduct; and a court will set aside an award if it has been obtained by the misconduct of an arbitrator: 2 Atk. 501, 504; 2 Chitt. Bail. 44; 1 Salk. 71; 3 P. Wms. 882; 1 Dick. 66. See 98 Ala. 150; 33 Neb. 708.

Under a statute having reference to a divorce dissolving the marriage contract because of the misconduct of the wife, it relates to adultery; 133 N. Y. 540.

See NEW TRIAL.

MISCONTINUANCE. In Practice. A continuance of a suit by undue process. Its effect is the same as a discontinuance. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 299; Jenk. Cent. Cas. 57.

MISCREANT. An apostate; an unbeliever; one who totally renounces Christianity. 4 Bla. Comm. 44.

MISDELIVERY. The delivery of property by a carrier to a person not authorized by the owner or person to whom the carrier is bound by his contract to deliver it. 133 Mass. 156.

MISDEMEANANT. A person guilty of a misdemeanor. See FIRST-CLASS MISDEMEANANT.

MISDEMEANOR. In Criminal Law. A term used to express every offence inferior to felony, punishable by indictment, or by particular prescribed proceedings. In its usual acceptation, it is applied to all those crimes and offences for which the law has not provided a particular name.

It has a common-law, a parliamentary, and a popular sense. In a parliamentary sense, as applied to officers, it means maladministration or misconduct, not necessarily indictable. Demeanor is conduct, and misdemeanor is misconduct, in the business of one's office. It must be in matters of importance, and be of a character to show a wilful disregard of duty; 6 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 649; 37 Neb. 96.

The test whether or not a certain crime is a crime at common law, is, not whether precedents for so treating it can be found in the books, but whether it injuriously affects the public policy and economy; 97 Pa. 397, followed in 146 id. 83, where it was held that a solicitation to commit murder meets this test.

The word is generally used in contradistinction to felony; misdemeanors comprehending all indictable offences which do not amount to felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, and public nuisances, but not including a multitude of offences over which magistrates have an exclusive summary jurisdiction, for a brief designation of which our legal nomenclature is at fault. Misdemeanors have sometimes been called misprisions. See 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 624. See FELONY; CRIME; MERGER.

MISDESCRIPTION. An erroneous or false description of a contract which is misleading in a material point.

MISDIRECTION. In Practice. An error made by a judge in charging the jury in a special case.

It is a rule, subject to the qualifications hereafter stated, that when the judge at the trial misdirects the jury on matters of law material to the issue, whatever may be the nature of the case, the verdict will be set aside, and a new trial granted; 6 Mod. 242; 2 Salk. 649; 2 Wils. 269; 4 Conn. 356; 59 Pa. 371; or, if such misdirection appear in the bill of exceptions, or otherwise upon the record, a judgment founded on a verdict thus obtained will be reversed. And although the charge of the court be not positively erroneous, yet, if it have a tendency to mislead the jury, and it be uncertain whether they would have found as they did if the instructions had been entirely correct, a new trial will be granted; 11 Wend. 83; 6 Cow. 682; 9 Humph. 411; 9 Conn. 107. When the issue consists of a mixed question of law and fact, and there is a conceded state of facts, the rest is a question for the court; 2 Wend. 596; and a misdirection in this respect will avoid the verdict. In England, under the Judicature Act of 1875, a new trial will not be granted on the ground of misdirection or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, unless in the opinion of the court, to which the application is made, some substantial wrong has been thereby occasioned; and if it appear that such wrong or miscarriage affects part only of the matter in controversy, the court may give final judgment as to part thereof, and direct a new trial as to the other part only; 1 Sched. Ord. xxxix. v. 3; L. R. 10 Stat. 1875, 817.

Misdirection as to matters of fact will, in some cases, be sufficient to vitiate the proceedings. For example: misapprehension of the judge as to a material circumstance, and a direction to the jury accordingly; 1 Const. So. C. 200; or instructing them upon facts which are purely hypothetical, whereby they are misled; 8 Ga. 114; or an instruction which assumes a material fact to have been proved; 88 Ala. 445; 76 Cal. 242; 11 Colo. 80; 79 Ga. 687; 74 Ia. 154; 71 Md. 9; submitting as a contested point what has been admitted; 9 Conn. 216; giving to the jury a peremptory direction to find in a given way, when there are facts in the case conducive to a different conclusion; 7 J. J. Marsh. 410; 3 Wend. 102; 19 id. 402; 12 Mass. 22; 5 Humphr. 476; 47 Ill. App. 332; or where the evidence is so conflicting or rests so largely upon inference or circumstance, that a court could not rightfully sustain a demurrer to the evidence of the opposite party; 87 Ia. 305. See 73 Ia. 576; 74 id. 457; 85 Fed. Rep. 110. There are, however, many cases in which the court may instruct the jury, upon the whole evidence, to find for one or the other party; and when a verdict formed under such instruction is conformable to the law, the evidence, and the justice of the case, it is rarely disturbed; 8 Dana 564. But to warrant an unqualified direction to the jury in favor of a party, the evidence must either be undisputed or the preponderance so decided that a verdict against it would be set aside; 16 Wend. 663; 8 Misc. Rep. 512; 143 Ill. 242; 5 Wash. St. 371; 5 U. S. App. 179; and where a special verdict is directed, the court is not bound to give any instructions as to the general rules of law governing the case; 116 Ind. 278; 69 Tex. 134. When the court delivers its opinion to the jury on a matter of fact, it should be as opinion, and not as direction; 12 Johns. 518. But it is, in general, allowed a very liberal discretion in this regard; 1 M'Cli. & Y. 286. Where the question is one of mere fact, no expressions of the judge, however strong or erroneous will amount to a misdirection, provided the question is fairly presented to the jury and left with them for their decision; 5 Scott 28; 4 Moore & S. 295; 19 Wend. 186; 10 Pick. 252; 128 U. S. 171; 36 Fed. Rep. 166. The weight of evidence is solely for the jury; and an instruction thereupon is erroneous; 83 Ala. 40; 16 Or. 16, 173; 75 Mich. 127.

Unless the misdirection be excepted to, the party by his silence will be deemed to have waived it; 10 Mo. 515; 2 Pick. 145. But see 4 Wend. 514; 2 Barb. 420; see 8 C. C. App. 341; 97 Mich. 166; 157 Pa. 358; 144 Ill. 370.

As to its effects, the misdirection must be calculated to do injustice; for if it be entirely certain that justice has been done, and that a re-hearing would produce the same result, or if the amount in dispute be very trifling, so that the injury is scarcely appreciable, a new trial will not be granted; Thorn. Juries § 204; 2 Caines 85; 7 Me. 442; 10 Ga. 429; 3 Grah. & W. New Tr. 705; Hill. New. Tr. 96. See 62 Ga. 732; New Trial; CHARGE.

MISE (Lat. mittere, through the French mettre, to place). In Pleading. The issue in a writ of right. The tenant in a writ of right is said to join the mise on the mere right when he pleads that his title is better than the demandant's; 2 Wms. Saund. 45, h. i. It was equivalent to the general issue; and everything except collateral warranty might be given in evidence under it by the tenant; 8 Wils. 420; 7 Wheat. 31; 3 Pet. 133; 7 Cow. 52; 10 Gratt. 350. The payee in aid, on coming into court, joined in the mise together with the tenant; 2 Wms. Saund. 45 d. It was a more common practice, however, for the demandant to traverse the tenant's plea, when the cause could be tried by a common jury instead of the grand assize.

In Practice. Expenses. It is so commonly used in the entries of judgments, in personal actions; as, when the plaintiff recovers, the judgment is quod recuperet damna sua (that he recover his damages), and pro misis et custagiis (for costs and charges) so much, etc.

MISE MONEY. Money paid by way of contract or composition to purchase any liberty, etc. Blount.

MISERABLE DEPOSITUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an involuntary deposit, made under pressing necessity; as, for instance, shipwreck, fire, or other inevitable calamity. Pothier, Proc. Civ. pt. 5, ch. 1, § 1; La. Code § 2985.

MISERERE. The first word and usual name of one of the penitential psalms, being that which was commonly used to be given by the ordinary to such condemned malefactors as were allowed the benefit of clergy (q. v.); whence it is also called the psalm of mercy. Wharton. See NECK VERSE.

MISERICORDIA (Lat.). An arbitrary or discretionary amendment.

To be in mercy is to be liable to such punishment as the judge may in his discretion inflict. According to Spelman, misericordia is so called because the party is in mercy, and to distinguish this fine from redemptions, or heavy fines. Spelman, Gloss. See Co. Litt. 126 b; Madox 14. See IN MISERICORDIA.

MISFEASANCE. The performance of an act which might lawfully be done, in an improper manner, by which another person receives an injury.

It differs from malfeasance or nonfeasance. Misfeasance is the wrongful and injurious exercise of lawful authority, or the doing of a lawful act in an unlawful manner, while malfeasance is doing an act which is positively unlawful or wrongful. 28 L. Mag. & Rev. 189. See, generally, 2 Vinet, Abr. 85; 2 Kent 443; Doctrina Plac. 62; Story, Bailm. § 9.

It seems to be settled that there is a distinction between misfeasance and nonfeasance in the case of mandates. In cases of nonfeasance the mandatory is not generally liable, because, his undertaking being gratuitous, there is no consideration to support it; but in cases of misfeasance the common law gives a remedy for the injury done, and to the extent of that injury; 5 Term 143; 4 Johns. 81; 2 Johns. Cas. 92; 1 Esp. 74; 3 Ld. Raym. 909; 83 Conn. 109; Story, Bailm. § 165; Bouvier, Inst. Index.

MISFORTUNE. It is equivalent to some adverse event not immediately dependent on the action or will of him who suffers from it, and of so improbable a character that no prudent man would take it into his calculations in reference to the interest of himself or of others. 20 Q. B. Div. 816.

MISJOINDER. In Pleading. The improper union of parties or causes of action in one suit at law or in equity.

Of Actions. The joining several demands which the law does not permit to be joined, to enforce by one proceeding several distinct, substantive rights of recovery. Gould, Pl. c. 4, § 98; Archb. Civ. Pl. 61; Dane, Abr.

In equity, it is the joinder of different and distinct claims against one defendant; Adams, Eq. 309; 7 Sim. 241; 3 Barb. Ch. 432. The grounds of suit must be wholly distinct, and each ground must be sufficient, as stated, to sustain a bill; 5 Ired. Eq. 313. See 21 Ala. N. S. 252; 9 Ga. 278; 8 Md. Ch. Dec. 46; 22 Conn. 171.

It may arise from the joinder of plaintiffs who possess distinct claims; 2 Sim. 831; 6 Madd. 84; 8 Pet. 123; see [1893] 1 Q. B. 771; but see 6 Johns. Ch. 150; 8 Paige, Ch. 605; or the joinder of distinct claims of the plaintiff in one bill; 2 S. & S. 79; 6 Misc. Rep. 43. But it seems that where there is a common liability of the defendants and a common interest in the plaintiffs, different claims may be united in the same suit; 1 M. & C. 623; 5 How. 127, 12 Mete. 323. And see 7 Sim. 241; 3 Price 164; 2 Y. & C. 389; Story, Eq. Pl. § 536, n.; MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

At law, misjoinder vitiates the entire declaration, whether taken advantage of by general demurrer; 1 Maule & S. 335; motion in arrest of judgment, or writ of error; 2 B. & P. 424; 4 Term 347. It may be aided by verdict in some cases; 2 Lev. 110; 11 Mod. 196; 2 Maule & S. 533; 1 Chitty, Pl. 188. Where a single count of a complaint contains one cause of action in tort and another in contract, and plaintiff is allowed over objections to introduce evidence to sustain both causes, the error is not cured by plaintiff's election after the trial, to recover in contract only, when the judgment rendered does not limit plaintiff's recovery of costs to those incurred in the action in contract; 84 Wis. 209.

Of Parties. The joining, as plaintiffs or defendants, parties who have not a joint interest.

In England, under the Judicature Act, 1875, by order xvi. v. 13, no action is to be defeated by the misjoinder of the parties. Different causes of action which cannot be tried together conveniently may be ordered by the court or a judge to be tried separately. Mozl. & W. Dict.

In equity, the joinder of improper plaintiffs is a fatal defect; 2 Sandf. Ch. 186; 3 Edw. Ch. 48; 2 Ala. N. S. 406. But the court may exercise a discretion whether to dismiss the bill; 1 Barb. Ch. 59; 3 Ohio St. 129. See 5 Fla. 110. It may be dismissed wholly, or only as to a portion of the plaintiffs; 18 Ohio 72. The improper joinder of defendants is no cause of objection by a co-defendant; 2 Barb. Ch. 618; 6 Ired. Eq. 62; 7 Ala. N. S. 382; 12 Ark. 720; 23 Me. 269. See 7 Conn. 387; 86 Wis. 292.

The objection must be taken before the hearing; 15 How. 546; 2 Hill Ch. 566; 4 Pa. Ch. 510; not, however, if it be vital; 30 N. H. 433; by demurrer, if apparent on the face of the bill; 9 Paige Ch. 410; 7 Ala. N. S. 392; 112 N. C. 578; but see 5 Ill. 424; by plea and answer; or otherwise; 13 Pet. 359; 1 T. B. Monr. 105; where the defect does not appear upon the face of the petition, objection must be raised by answer; 113 Mo. 623. A defendant who is improperly joined must plead or demur; 1 Mo. 410.

At law, see ABATEMENT; PLEADING.

An answer stating facts showing a misjoinder of plaintiffs, but not objecting to the action on that ground is not sufficient to save such an objection; 49 Mo. App. 273; where no objection is made in the court below to a misjoinder of parties defendant, no advantage can be taken of it on appeal; 2 Colo. App. 436.

MISKENNING (Fr. mis, wrong, and Sax. cennan, summon). A wrongful citation to appear in court. A variance in a plea. 1 Mon. Angl. 237; Chart. Hen. II.; Jacob, Law Dict.; Du Cange.

MISNOMER. The use of a wrong name.

In contracts, a mistake in the name will not avoid the contract, in general, if the party can be ascertained; 11 Co. 20; Ld. Raym. 304; Hob. 125. So of contracts of corporations; 2 Beasli. 427. See NAME. If a deed, note, etc., be made to a corporation under an erroneous name, the proper course is for the corporation to sue in its proper name and allege that the defendant made the deed, etc., to the corporation by the name mentioned in the instrument; 69 Ill. 658. A contract entered into by a corporation under an assumed name may be enforced by either of the parties, and the identity of the company may be established by the ordinary methods of proof; 37 W. Va. 778.

A misnomer of a legatee will not, in general, avoid a legacy, when the context furnishes the means of correction; Schoul. Wills § 583; see 19 Ves. 381; 1 Rep. Leg. 131; LEGACY. A legacy given to a corporation, either by its corporate name, or by description, is good; in the latter case it must be so designated as to be distinguished from every other corporation; 10 N. Y. 84. See 45 Me. 552; 37 Ala. 478.

When a corporation is misnamed in a statute, the statute is not inoperative if there is enough to designate what corporation is meant; 10 Co. 44, 57 b.

Misnomer of one of the parties to a suit must be pleaded in abatement. It has been held that misnomer of one of the partners of a firm in a scire facias sur mortgage is unimportant, if the name of the firm is correct in the mortgage itself; 64 Penn. 63. A slight variation in a corporate name taken advantage of by a plea in abatement; 30 Ill. 151; 19 Mich. 196. If a corporation, sued by an erroneous name, appears by that name without objection, the error is cured; Taney 418. See 56 Ark. 499. But a writ of mandamus issued against a corporation under an erroneous name is void; 2 Ld. Raym. 1238; and an error in the corporate name in an execution is fatal; 58 Ga. 280. The same is true when there is an error in the corporate name in a judgment; 1 Ld. Raym. 117; but see 11 Mass. 138.

The names of third persons must be correctly laid; for the error will not be helped by pleading the general issue; but, if a sufficient description be given, it has been held, in a civil case, that the misnomer was immaterial. Example: in an action for medicines alleged to have been furnished to defendant's wife, Mary, and his wife was named Elizabeth, the misnomer was held to be immaterial, the word wife being the material word; 2 Marsh. 159. See 10 U. S. App. 267. In indictments, the names of third persons must be correctly given; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 78. If a person is well known by the name in the indictment, the indictment is good; 7 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 445; the middle name of a defendant, if stated in an indictment, either in full or by the initial letter, must be correctly stated; 1 Am. L. Reg. 380. That a party is known by one name as well as another, is a good replication to a plea of misnomer; 43 Ill. App. 009. Accuracy is especially required in stating the correct name of a corporation in all criminal proceedings in which it may be concerned; 1 Leach 253; but see 35 Cal. 110. See Archbold; Chitty, Pleading; ABATEMENT; CONTRACT; PARTIES; LEGACY; NAME.

MISPLEADING. Pleading incorrectly, or omitting anything in pleading which is essential to the support or defence of an action, is so called.

Pleading not guilty to an action of debt is an example of the first; setting out a defective title is an example of the second. See 3 Salk. 365.

MISPRISON. In Criminal Law. A term used to signify every considerable misdemeanor which has not a certain name given to it by law. Co. 3d Inst. 36.

The concealment of a crime. Negative misprison consists in the concealment of something which ought to be revealed.

Misprison of felony is the like concealment of felony, without giving any degree of maintenance to the felon; Act of Congress of April 30, 1790, s. 6, R. S. § 5390; for if any aid be given him, the party becomes an accessory after the fact.

Misprison of treason is the concealment of treason by being merely passive. Act of Congress of April 30, 1790, R. S. § 5333; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 139. If any assistance be given to the traitor, it makes the party a principal, as there are no accessories in treason.

Positive misprison consists in the commission of something which ought not to be done. 4 Bla. Com. c. 9.

It is the duty of every good citizen, knowing of a treason or felony having been committed, to inform a magistrate. Silently to observe the commission of a felony, without using any endeavors to apprehend the offender, is a misprison. 1 Russ. Cr. 43; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 720; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 59; s. 6; 4 Bla. Com. 119.

Misprisons which are merely positive are denominated contempt or high misdemeanors; as, for example, dissuading a witness from giving evidence. 4 Bla. Com. 126.

MISREADING. When a deed is read falsely to an illiterate or blind man who is a party to it, such false reading amounts to a fraud, because the contract never had the assent of both parties; 5 Co. 19; 6 East 309; Dane, Abr. c. 88, s. 3, § 7; 2 Johns. 404; 12 id. 469; 3 Cow. 537. See 14 Pa. 496; 82 id. 203; 62 Wis. 490; 55 Mich. 592.

MISRECITAL. The incorrect recital of a matter of fact, either in an agreement or a plea; under the latter term is here understood the declaration and all the subsequent pleadings. See RECITAL.

MISREPRESENTATION. The statement made by a party to a contract that a thing relating to it is in fact in a particular way, when he knows it is not so.

The misrepresentation must be both false and fraudulent in order to make the party making it responsible to the other for damages; 8 Conn. 413; 10 Mass. 197; 1 Const. So. C. 328, 475; Metc. Yelv. 21 a, n. 1; Peake, Cas. 115; 8 Campb. 154; Marshall, Ins. b. 1, c. 10, s. 1. And see 5 Maule & S. 880; 12 East 638; 3 B. & P. 370; 45 Ill. App. 244. Misrepresentation as to a material part of the consideration will avoid an executory contract; 1 Phil. Ins. §§ 630, 675; 83 Va. 397; 147 Mass. 403; 124 Pa. 450; 97 Mich. 5.

A misrepresentation, to constitute fraud, must be contrary to fact; the party making it must know it to be so; 2 Kent 471; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 142; 4 Price 135; 8 Conn. 597; 22 Me. 511; 7 Gratt. 64, 239; 6 Ga. 458; 5 Johns. Ch. 182; 6 Paige, Ch. 197; 1 Stor. 172; 1 W. & M. 342; 85 Tenn. 139; 76 Ia. 11; 5 Ind. App. 474; 51 Kan. 144; 63 Vt. 463; excluding cases of mere mistake; 5 Q. B. 804; 9 id. 197; 10 M. & W. 147; 14 id. 651; 7 Cra. 69; 13 How. 211; 8 Johns. 25; 7 Wend. 10; 1 Metc. Mass. 1; 27 Me. 309; 7 Vt. 67, 79; 6 N. H. 99; and including cases where he falsely asserts a personal knowledge; 18 Pick. 96; 1 Metc. Mass. 193; 6 id. 245; 27 Me. 309; 16 Wend. 646; 16 Ala. 785; 1 Bibb 244; 4 B. Monr. 601; 8 Cra. 281; and one which gave rise to the contracting of the other party; 14 N. H. 331; 1 W. & M. 80, 342; 2 id. 298; 2 Strobb. Eq. 14; 2 Bibb 474; 8 B. Monr. 23; 4 How. Miss. 435; 6 id. 311; 25 Miss. 167; 3 Cra. 282; 8 Yerg. 178; 19 Ga. 448; 5 Blackf. 18. See 12 Me. 262; 13 Pet. 26; 23 Wend. 260; 7 Barb. 65; Poll. Cont. 512.

A contract is bad where a party is induced to enter into it by the innocent misstatement of facts by another; 51 Ia. 364; 39 Ohio 491; 89 Ind. 38; 2 Kent 471; but the misrepresentation must be the proximate and immediate cause of the transaction; 11 Col. 15; and part of the same transaction; 83 Va. 504; and the party seeking relief must have relied upon it; 80 Wis. 427. In an action for misrepresentation of facts, it is not always necessary to prove that it was made with a fraudulent intent and with guilty knowledge; 80 Wis. 540; but an innocent misrepresentation cannot be proved under a plea of fraud; 21 Can. S. C. R. 359.

To be material, the misrepresentation must be in respect to an ascertainable fact, as distinguished from a mere matter of opinion, judgment, probability, or expectation; if it is vague and indefinite in its nature and terms, or is merely a loose, conjectural, or exaggerated statement, it is not a material misrepresentation; 73 Tex. 465; 17 Ore. 347; 149 Mass. 188.

A representation concerning a man's private rights, though it may involve matters of law, is as a whole deemed to be a statement of fact; 13 Q. B. D. 363; as is a representation that one has extraordinary and supernatural power in curing disease; 96 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 1027. See also 15 W. N. C. Pa. 262. And representations from one bank to another that a business corporation is prosperous, well organized, doing a large business, and is a valued customer, and that an investigation has been made of its business and responsibility by a bank officer, are also representations of fact and not of opinion; 59 Fed. Rep. 738. "A suppression of the truth may amount to a suggestion of falsehood;" 128 U. S. 388; 51 Kan. 355; and a false pretence need not be in regard to a fact which does in reality exist, but may be that a fact exists when it does not; 14 Crim. L. Mag. 1.

Mere honest expression of opinion will not, as a rule, be regarded as fraud, either as a basis for an action of deceit, or as ground for setting aside a contract, although the opinion may prove to be erroneous; 141 N. Y. 596; 29 N. J. Eq. 257; 73 Tex. 465; 92 Va. 71; 34 Ill. App. 666; 125 U. S. 247; L. R. 18 Q. B. D. 562. And this rule applies ordinarily to statements of the value of property to be bought or sold; 124 Pa. 450; 90 N. Y. 272; 86 Mo. 293; 106 Cal. 623; but it cannot be laid down as a matter of law that value is never a material fact; 11 Mich. 68; as where the defendant was employed to value real estate for an intended mortgagee, and gave a valuation which was in fact no valuation at all, it was held that the defendant owed a duty to the plaintiff which he had failed to discharge, and had made reckless statements on which plaintiff had acted, and therefore defendant was liable to plaintiff for the loss he had sustained; 89 Ch. D. 89.

So the mere puffing of articles to be sold is held not to amount to such a misrepresentation as will amount to fraud; 79 Ill. 104; but this rule applies only when the purchaser has a full and fair opportunity to inspect the article and judge for himself, and not to things which are not the subject of any visible test or examination; 44 Ark. 218; and a vendor may be held guilty of deceit by reason of material untrue representations in respect to his own business or property, the truth of which representation he is bound and must be presumed to know; 150 U. S. 673. A person who makes representations of material facts, assuming or intending to convey the impression that he has adequate knowledge of the existence of such facts, when he is conscious that he has no such knowledge, is liable if he knew that they were false; id.

Statements as to future events are mere matters of opinion; 17 Abb. N. C. 1; 59 Mo. App. 190; and however contrary to good faith and sound morals, they cannot form the basis of an action at law or in equity; 1 Ark. 31; but see 87 Cal. 557, where although the question was not raised as to whether misrepresentations of prospects of property sold would entitle one to an action, yet as the measure of damages for such representations was decided, the court seem to have admitted that liability would arise therefrom.

One who makes a false statement which he believes to be true, incurs no liability; if the belief is honest, it makes no difference what their grounds are; Poll. Torts 273; contra, 41 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 819; but the grounds of a belief are a "most important test of its reality;" 14 App. Cas. 375. If untrue statements are founded upon a belief destitute of all reasonable grounds, or which the least inquiry would immediately correct, such circumstances would be evidence, but only evidence, that the statement was not really believed to be true; and any liability therefor would be based, not upon the party having stated as true what he had not reasonable grounds to believe to be true, but as having stated as true what he did not believe to be true; L. R. 1 Sc. App. 162, followed in 14 App. Cas. 337, a decision deemed by a learned writer to be unfortunate; Poll. Torts 275; and see 5 L. Quart. Rev. 410; 6 id. 73.

It is not necessary that the misrepresentation should have been made directly to the plaintiff; Poll. Torts 282; 2 M. & W. 519; they may be published generally with the intention that they may be acted upon by any who choose; 3 B. & Ad. 114; as a time-table of a railway company announcing a train, which is not, in fact, running; 5 E. & B. 860; or a prospectus; L. R. 6 H. L. 377.

Where one states that he knows a thing to exist, when he does not know it to exist, he is guilty of fraud; this rule applies to facts susceptible of actual knowledge, and not matters of opinion, etc.; one who does not know a fact to exist must ordinarily be deemed to know that he does not know; 147 Mass. 408. "If persons take upon themselves to make assertions as to which they are ignorant, whether they are true or untrue, they must, in a civil point of view, be held as responsible as if they had asserted that which they knew to be untrue"; L. R. 4 H. L. 79; this ignorance is conscious ignorance; 14 App. Cas. 371. Where one has honestly made a representation and discovers that it is false before it is acted upon, he is deemed, if he has the means of communicating the truth and does not do so, to be making a false representation with knowledge of its untruth; see 1 D. G. M. & G. 660.

There may be a false pretence by conduct, as where one not a member of the university put on a cap and gown at Oxford and thereupon obtained goods on credit; 7 C. & P. 784; so where one having no money goes into a restaurant and orders a good dinner and cannot pay for it, it was held to be incurring a liability by fraud;

49 Sol. Journ. 78.

An action to recover for false representations made by the seller of personal property does not survive as against his estate, under a statute providing that actions "of trespass and trespass on the case for damages done to . . . personal estate shall survive"; 35 Atl. Rep. (Vt.) 488.

In the absence of any bad faith, a principal is not affected by a representation made by his agent, which the former knew to be untrue, as he would be by a fraudulent representation made either by himself or his agent; 2 Kent 621, n.; 1 H. L. C. 815; 6 M. & W. 358; contra, 21 Vt. 129; 8 id. 98; 3 Q. B. 58. See Poll. Torts 284; Benj. Sales § 445; Broom, Leg. Max. 707. Where a purchaser has been induced to buy through the fraud of an agent, the vendor being innocent, he may rescind the contract or maintain an action of deceit against the agent personally, but against the principal he can maintain no action unless there was a warranty; Benj. Sales § 467, notes. See 3 Am. L. Rev. 430; Bigel. L. C. Torts 21; 16 Gray 436.

If a principal knows the representation of his agent to be false and authorizes him to make it, the former is liable; if the agent makes the representation without specific authority, but not believing it to be true, the principal is liable (6 M. & W. 373); as to whether, in such case if the agent does believe the representations to be true, the principal is liable, is doubtful in England; Poll. Torts 261. See AGENTS; See, generally, DECEIT; FRAUD.

MISSAE PRESBYTER. A Priest in Orders. Blount.

MISSILIA. In Roman Law. Gifts which the officers were in the habit of throwing among the people. Inst. 2, 1, 45.

MISSING SHIP. A ship which has been at sea and unheard from for so long a time as to give rise to the presumption that she has perished with all on board.

There is no precise time fixed as to when the presumption is to arise; and this must depend upon the circumstances of each case; 2 Stra. 1199; Park. Ins. 63; Marsh. Ins. 488; 2 Johns. 150; 1 Caines 525; Holt 242.

MISSING WORD COMPETITIONS. See LOTTERY.

MISSIO. In Roman Law. Letting go or sending away.

MISSIO JUDICUM IN CONSILIIUM. A sending out of the jury to make up their sentence. Burrill; Halifax, Anal. 3, 13, 31.

MISSIO IN POSSESSIONEM. A writ by which a creditor obtained actual control, or mere detention of a thing as security for his claim, without any right of sale or action. Sohm, Rom. L. 275.

MISSISSIPPI. The name of one of the states of the United States.

The territory of Mississippi, embracing the present states of Alabama and Mississippi, was authorized to be organized by act of congress, of April 9, 1778, and organized on 22d January, 1779, Georgia, from which the territory was formed, ceded it to the United States on April 24, 1802.

The western part of the Mississippi territory was authorized to form a state government to be known as the state of Mississippi, by act of congress passed March 1, 1817, and the state was admitted into the Union December 10, 1817.

The first constitution of the state was adopted at Washington, August 15, 1817. The second at Jackson, October 26, 1833. This was amended in August, 1865, so as to strike out the word "white," and to abolish and to eliminate everything connected with the institution of slavery. The third, at Jackson, on May 15, 1868, ratified by the people on December 1, 1869, and went into operation in 1870, on the readmission of the state into the Union under the Reconstruction Acts of congress.

MISSIVES. In Scotch Law. Writings passed between parties as evidence of a transaction. Bell. Dict.

MISSOURI. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

It was formed out of part of the territory ceded to the United States by the French Republic by treaty of April 30, 1803, and admitted into the Union by a resolution of congress approved March 2, 1820.

To this resolution there was a condition, which, having been performed, the admission of Missouri as a state was completed by the president's proclamation, dated August 10, 1820.

The convention which formed the constitution of this state met at St. Louis, on Monday, June 12, 1820, and continued by adjournment till July 10, 1820, when the constitution was adopted, establishing "an independent republic, by the name of the 'State of Missouri.'"

MISSTAGUS. A messenger.

MISSURA. The ceremonies used in a Roman Catholic church to recommend and dismiss a dying person.

MISTAKE. Some unintentional act, omission, or error arising from ignorance, surprise, imposition, or misplaced confidence. Story, Eq. Jur. § 110; 46 Wis. 118.

That result of ignorance of law or fact which has misled a person to commit that which, if he had not been in error, he would not have done. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 838.

A mistake exists when a person, under some erroneous conviction of law or fact does, or omits to do, some act which, but for the erroneous conviction, he would not have done or omitted. It may arise either from unconsciousness, ignorance, forgetfulness, imposition, or misplaced confidence. Bishp. Eq. § 185. The essential element of mistake is a mental condition or conception or deviation of the understanding either in a passive or active state; when passive, it may consist of unconsciousness, ignorance, or forgetfulness, and when active, it may be a belief. The first condition must always concern a fact material to the transaction, while in the second, the belief may be that a matter or thing exists at the present time which really does not exist, or that it existed at some past time when it did not really exist. All particular errors which fall under either condition are mistakes of fact which are a ground of equitable relief. These mistakes may arise from ignorance; 19 Barb. 222; in forgetfulness of a fact past; 7 Johns. 442; of a fact present; 88 Pa. 491; in unconsciousness; 20 Vt. 238; 4 Bosw. 320; in belief of a thing which does not exist; 25 N. Y. 289; 19 id. 502; of things which have not existed; 8 N. Y. 835. See 6 L. R. A. 835.

As a general rule, both at law and in equity, mistakes of law do not furnish an excuse for wrongful acts or a ground of relief from the consequences of acts done in consequence of such a mistake; 94 N. C. 490; 107 Ind. 69; 9 M. & W. 54; 5 Hare 91; 9 How. 55; 7 Paige 80; 137; 2 Johns. Ch. 60. See 2 M'Cord, Ch. 455; 6 H. & J. 500; 25 Vt. 603; 13 Ark. 120; 6 Ohio 168; 11 id. 480; 21 Ga. 118; Beasl. Ch. 105; 62 Mich. 473; 159 Pa. 531; 45 Ill. App. 387; 108 Ind. 61; 88 Mo. 621. But if a contracting party knows that the other party is proceeding upon a mistake in law, there might arise a consideration of fraud in his taking advantage of the other's mistake; 70 Pa. 425; 51 Ala. 154; 23 Ill. 579; 102 id. 208; 67 Me. 217; 83 N. C. 40; 36 N. J. Eq. 111. When both parties are under a common mistake of law as to the application of their contract, it can be applied only according to their intention and not otherwise; Leake, Contr. 347; 46 L. J. Q. B. 213. And, if parties contract under a common misapprehension as to their relative and respective rights, the contract may be liable to be set aside as inapplicable to the state of rights really existing; L. R. 2 H. L. 170; see 79 Hun 44; 48 Wis. 443; 36 N. J. L. 432. In this connection the word jus in the maxim ignorantia juris haud excusat, denotes general law and not private rights; ibid.; Add. Contr. 119. An agreement made for the purpose of settling rights, with full knowledge of the doubts arising upon them, will be enforced, and parties will not be allowed to state that they were under a misapprehension as to the law; 1 S. & S. 555; 51 Ala. 180; 8 Lead. Cas. Eq. 411; 7 W. & S. 253. This is particularly the case in relation to family settlements; 8 Swanst. 462; 64 Pa.

85. Inadvertence and mistake are, equally with fraud and wrong, grounds for judicial interference to divest a title acquired thereby; 189 U. S. 514.

The power of courts of equity to afford relief from the consequences of the mistakes of parties to written instruments is not strictly limited to mistakes of fact, but extends also to mistakes of law; 87 Minn. 80; 85 Wis. 240; see 141 U. S. 260; it will correct an instrument where it is clearly and fully inconsistent with a prior agreement and with the purpose for which it was designated, or if it fails to express the intention of the parties; 99 N. C. 80. See IGNORANCE.

An act done or a contract made under a mutual mistake or ignorance of a material fact is voidable and relievable in equity; Poll. Contr. 442; Story, Eq. Jur. § 140; 142 U. S. 417. The rule applies to cases where there has been a studied suppression of facts by one side, and to cases of mutual ignorance or mistake; 26 Beav. 454; 12 Sim. 465; 9 Ves. 275; 2 Barb. 475; 11 Pet. 71; 8 B. Monr. 590; 4 Mas. 414; 5 R. I. 130; 85 Ky. 322; 150 Pa. 36; 5 Wash. St. 736; 78 Hun 462; 160 Mass. 488; 64 Conn. 28. See 128 U. S. 315; 133 id. 271; 31 Fla. 73; 148 Ill. 888. But the fact must be material to the contract, i. e. essential to its character, and an efficient cause of its noncompletion; 11 Gratt. 468; 2 Barb. 37; 2 Sandf. Ch. 298; 13 Pa. 371. See 28 N. J. Eq. 306; 75 N. Y. 55; 98 U. S. 55. And as a ground for reforming an instrument the mistake must be mutual; 71 Tex. 99; 49 Mo. App. 255; 66 Hun 685; 68 id. 299; 181 Mass. 316; 109 Ind. 354; 71 Iowa 448. But equity will not afford relief in cases of mutual mistake of legal rights where it is impossible to restore both parties to the status quo; 178 Pa. 154. A mistake will not be relieved against if it was the result of the party's negligence; 5 Oreg. 168; 12 Cl. & P. 248; 1 W. & M. 198; 5 R. I. 130; 122 Ill. 586; 103 Pa. 594; 70 Ga. 794. See 16 Oreg. 412. If the mistake, as to the expression of an agreement, is only on one side, there will be no relief. But if such a mistake on the part of one party be known to the other at the time, the contract can be avoided at common law, if not reduced to writing; L. R. 6 Q. B. 597. In equity, a mistake of one party known to the other may not only preclude the latter from obtaining specific performance, but may also be a ground for setting aside the contract altogether; Leake, Contr. 318; 80 Beav. 445. When a written contract contains a mistake common to both parties in expressing its terms, equity will give relief by restraining proceedings at law, or by rectifying the writing or setting it aside; Leake, Contr. 319. An act done intentionally and with knowledge, cannot be treated as a mistake; 22 Ct. Cla. 165.

Where an attorney acting under general instructions of his client to compromise a litigation consents to a compromise under a misapprehension, neither the client nor the counsel are bound thereby and the court will set it aside on application; [1895] 2 Ch. 638.

When a mistake in the expression of a written contract is so obvious, without extrinsic evidence, as to leave no doubt of the intention of the parties, the writing may be so construed as to correct the mistake; 5 H. L. C. 40; L. R. 9 Eq. 507. See 50 Ohio St. 384.

An award may be set aside for a mistake of law or fact by the arbitrators apparent on the face of the award; 2 B. & P. 371; 1 Dall. 487; 1 Sneed 321. See 6 Metc. 126; 17 How. 544; 6 Pick. 148; 2 Gall. 61; 4 N. H. 387; 3 Vt. 308; 15 Ill. 461; 2 B. & Ald. 691.

The word which the parties intended to use in an instrument may be substituted for one which was actually used by a clerical error, in equity; Adams, Eq. 169; 18 Gray, 373; 6 Ired. Eq. 462; 17 Ala. N. S. 563; 58 Fed. Rep. 918. Equity will not correct a mistake in a voluntary deed by inserting the word "heirs" omitted by inadvertence of the draughtsman; but otherwise, when the deed is supported by a valuable or meritorious consideration; 98

N. C. 426.

As to the rule for the correction of mistakes in wills, see Story, Eq. Jur. § 179; 2 Ves. 216; 3 id. 321; 1 Bro. Ch. 85; 8 id. 446; 1 Keen 692; 2 K. & J. 740; 1 Jones, Eq. 110; 22 Mo. 518; 2 Stockt. Ch. 593; [1898] Prob. 1; 45 Wis. 357; 56 Ia. 676.

A mistake sometimes prevents a forfeiture, in cases of violation of revenue laws; Paine 129; Gilp. 285; 4 Call 158; breach of embargo acts; 5 Day 296; Paine 16; 7 Cra. 22; 8 Wheat. 59; 11 How. 47; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 697; 1 Mass. 347. See Kerr, Fr. & Mist.; Bispham, Equity; Leake, Contr.; 3 Lead. Cas. Eq. 411. See ERROR.

MISTERY. A trade or calling. Cowell.

MISTRIAL. A trial which is erroneous on account of some defect in the persons trying, as if the jury come from the wrong county, or because there was no issue formed, as if no plea be entered, or some other defect of jurisdiction. 3 Cro. 284; 2 Maule & S. 270.

Where a jury is discharged without a verdict, the proceeding is properly known as a mistrial; 22 Fed. Rep. 427.

Consent of parties cannot help such a trial, when past; Hob. 5.

It is error to go to trial without a plea or an issue, in the absence of counsel and without his consent, although an affidavit of defence be filed in the case, containing the substance of a plea, and the court has ordered the case on the list for trial; 3 Pa. 501.

On an indictment for perjury, an infant under the age of twenty-one years, and not otherwise qualified, not having, in fact, been summoned, personated his father as a juror. Here was a mistrial, because the verdict in the case was the verdict of but eleven jurors. "To support a judgment," observed Justice Holroyd, "it must be founded on a verdict delivered by twelve competent jurors. This man was incompetent, and therefore there has been a mistrial." 7 D. & R. 684. See 4 B. & Ald 480; 18 N. Y. 128; NEW TRIAL.

MISUSER. An unlawful use of a right.

In cases of public offices and franchisees, a misuser is sufficient to cause the right to be forfeited. 2 Bla. Com. 158; 5 Pick. 163.

MITIGATION. Reduction; diminution; lessening of the amount of a penalty or punishment.

Circumstances which do not amount to a justification or excuse of the act committed may yet be properly considered in mitigation of the punishment: as, for example, the fact that one who stole a loaf of bread was starving.

In actions for the recovery of damages, matters may often be given in evidence in mitigation of damages which are no answer to the action itself. See DAMAGES; CHARACTER.

MITTOR SENSUS. See IN MITTORI SENSU.

MITRE COURT. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

MITTENDO MANUSCRIPTUM PEDIS FINIS. An abolished judicial writ, addressed to the treasurer and chamberlain of the exchequer to search for and transmit the foot of the fine acknowledged before justices in eyre into the common pleas. Reg. Orig. 14.

MITTER (L. Fr.). To put, to send, or to pass: as, mitter avant, to present to a court; mitter l'estate, to pass the estate; mitter le droit, to pass a right. 2 Bla. Com. 324; Bacon, Abr. Release (C); Co. Litt. 193, 273 b. Mitter a large, to put or set at large.

MITTIMUS. In Old English Law. A writ enclosing a record sent to be tried in a county palatine: it derives its name from the Latin word mittimus, "we send." It is the jury process of these counties, and commands the proper officer of the county palatine to command the sheriff to summon the jury for the trial of the cause, and to return the record, etc. 1 Mart. La. 278; 2 id. 68.

In Criminal Practice. A precept in writing, under the hand and seal of a justice of the peace, or other competent officer, directed to the jailer or keeper of a prison, commanding him to receive and safely keep a person charged with an offence therein named, until he shall be delivered by due course of law. Co. Litt. 590.

MIXED ACTION. See ACTION.

MIXED POLICY. See POLICY.

MIXED PROPERTY. That kind of property which is not altogether real nor personal, but a compound of both. Heirlooms, tombstones, monuments in a church, and title-deeds to an estate, are of this nature. 2 Bla. Com. 428; 3 B. & Ad. 174; 4 Bingh. 106. See CONFUSION OF GOODS.

MIXED TITHES. In Ecclesiastical Law. "Those which arise not immediately from the ground, but from three things which are nourished by the ground: e. g., colts, chickens, calves, milk, eggs, etc." 8 Burn, Eccl. Law 380; 2 Bla. Com. 24.

MIXED TRIBUNALS. A name given to an international jurisdiction introduced into Egypt in 1878, after negotiations with the various Christian Powers of Europe. This tribunal made the administration of civil justice quite independent of the government of Egypt. They have jurisdiction over cases between persons of different nationalities, whether native or European, but criminal charges against natives are heard in the native criminal courts and those against Europeans in the proper consular courts. There are three mixed courts of First Instance and a Court of Appeal, whose decisions are final, and which sits at Alexandria. The two divisions of the Appeal Court are each composed of five European and three native judges; the Courts of First Instance are each composed of five judges, three European and two native. The judges are subjects of various European states, and of the United States and Brazil. They are appointed by their respective governments; Milner, England in Egypt. Changes in the organization are now being considered by a commission.

These courts were instituted for a period of five years only, and have been renewed at various times. The current period expires in February, 1899. See 8 Encyc. Laws of Eng. 445.

MIXTION. The putting of different goods or chattels together in such a manner that they can no longer be separated: as, putting the wines of two different persons into the same barrel, the grain of several persons into the same bag, and the like.

The intermixture may be occasioned by the wilful act of the party, or owner of one of the articles, by the wilful act of a stranger, by the negligence of the owner or a stranger, or by accident. See CONSUMPTION OF GOODS.

MOB (Lat. mobilis, movable). A tumultuous rout or rabble; a crowd excited to some violent or unlawful act. The word in legal use is practically synonymous with riot, but the latter is the more correct term.

At common law a municipal corporation is not liable for damage to property by a mob: Beach, Pub. Corp. § 748; 90 Pa. 397; s. c. 85 Am. Rep. 670; 46 Ala. 118; 85 Md. 107; nor for the failure of its officers to repress a mob: 53 Ala. 527; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 656; 13 Blatch. 389. The legislature may, however, give a right of action against the corporation for damages caused by a mob, and provide the measure of damages: 9 Kan. 350; 24 Hun 562; 47 Cal. 531; 65 Me. 426. Such a right of action has been provided by statute in Pennsylvania against the county in which the damage was caused.

As all the parties in any way concerned with an unlawful killing by a mob are liable in solido, it is proper to join, as a party defendant, with the individuals who participated in the killing, the city in which the act was committed, on the ground of its negligence in not preventing the killing; 50 Fed. Rep. 170; and independently of any misconduct on the part of the city or county to which the loss is attributed, a state may constitutionally compel such county or city to indemnify against losses of property from mobs and riots within their limits; 81 Fed. Rep. 317. See LYNCH LAW; RIOT.

MOBBING AND RIOTING. In Scotch Law. A general term, including all those convocations of the lieges for violent and unlawful purposes, which are attended with injury to the persons or property of the lieges, or terror and alarm to the neighborhood in which it takes place. The two phrases are usually placed together; but, nevertheless, they have distinct meanings, and are sometimes used separately in legal language,—the word mobbing being peculiarly applicable to the unlawful assemblage and violence of a number of persons, and that of rioting to the outrageous behavior of a single individual. Alison, Cr. Law 509.

MOBILIA. See MOVABLES.

MOCK. To deride, to laugh at, to ridicule, to treat with scorn and contempt. 34 Conn. 279.

MODE. The manner in which a thing is done; as the mode of proceeding, the mode of process. Anderson's L. Dict.
See, generally, 9 Pet. 360; 10 Wheat. 51; 48 Wis. 385.

MODEL. A machine made on a small scale to show the manner in which it is to be worked or employed.

A copy or imitation of the thing intended to be represented. 25 N. J. L. 602. See PATENT.

MODERAMEN INCULPATÆ TUTELÆ. In Roman Law. The regulation of justifiable defence. The term expresses that degree of force which a person might lawfully use in defence of his person or property, even though it should occasion the death of the aggressor. Bell, Dict.

MODERATA MISERICORDIA. A writ founded on Magna Charta, which lies for him who is amerced in a court, not of record, for any transgression beyond the quality or quantity of the offence; it is addressed to the lord of the court, or his bailiff, commanding him to take a moderate amercement of the parties. New Nat. Brev. 167; Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 76.

MODERATE CASTIGAVIT. In Pleading. The name of a plea in trespass by which the defendant justifies an assault and battery, because he moderately corrected the plaintiff, whom he had a right to correct. 2 Chitty, Pl. 576; 2 B. & P. 224. See CORRECTION; ASSAULT; 15 Mass. 347; 2 Phill. Ev. 147; Bacon, Abr. Assault (C).

This plea ought to disclose, in general terms, the cause which rendered the correction expedient; 8 Salk. 47.

MODERATE SPEED. The moderate speed of a steam vessel is such as will permit the steamer reasonably and effectually to avoid a collision by slackening speed, or by stopping and reversing within the distance at which an approaching vessel can be seen. 85 Fed. Rep. 609; 89 id. 480. Five knots is a moderate speed for a sailing vessel; 46 L. T. N. S. 840.

What is a "moderate speed" for a vessel depends not upon the speed of the vessel herself, but upon the position she is in, whether in a crowded channel or on the open sea. Anderson.

MODERATOR. A person appointed to preside at a popular meeting; sometimes he is called a chairman. The presiding officer of town meetings in New England is so called.

MODIATTO. A certain duty paid for every tierce of wine. Mon. Angl. t. ii. 144.

MODIUS. A measure, usually a bushel.

MODUS ET FORMA (Lat. in manner and form). In Pleading. Technical words used to put in issue such concomitants of the principal matters as time, place, etc., where these circumstances were material. Their use when these circumstances were immaterial was purely formal. The words were translated literally, when pleadings began to be made in English, by "in manner and form." See Lawes, Pl. 120; Gould, Pl. c. 6, § 22; Steph. Pl. 213; Dane, Abr. Index; Viner, Abr. Modo et Forma.

MODUS. In Civil Law. Manner; means; way. Ainsworth, Lat. Dict. A rhythmic song. Du Cange.

In Old Conveyancing. Manner: e. g., the manner in which an estate should be held, etc. A qualification, whether in restriction or enlargement of the terms of the instrument; especially with relation to the kind of grant called "donatio,"—the making those quasi heirs who were not in fact heirs according to the ordinary form of such conveyances. And this modus or qualification of the ordinary form became so common as to give rise to the maxim "modus et conventio vincunt legem." Co. Litt. 19 a; Bracton, 17 b; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 293. A consideration. Bracton, 17, 18.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A peculiar manner of tithing, growing out of custom. See MODUS DECIMANDI.

MODUS DECIMANDI. In Ecclesiastical Law. A peculiar manner of tithing, arising from immemorial usage, and differing from the payment of one-tenth of the annual increase.

To be a good modus, the custom must be—first, certain and invariable; second, beneficial to the person; third, a custom to pay something different from the thing compounded for; fourth, of the same species; fifth, the thing substituted must be in its nature as durable as the tithes themselves; sixth, it must not be too large: that would be a rank modus. 2 Bla. Com. 30. See 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 100; 13 M. & W. 632.

MODUS DE NON DECIMANDO. In Ecclesiastical Law. A custom or prescription not to pay tithes, which is not good, except in case of abbey-lands. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 31, n.

MODUS LEVANDI FINES. See FINE.

MOERDA. The secret killing of another; murder. 4 Bla. Com. 194.

MOHAMMEDAN LAW. A system of native law prevailing among the Mohammedans in India, and administered there by the British government. See HINDU LAW.

MOHATRA. In French Law. The name of a fraudulent contract made to cover a usurious loan of money.

It takes place when an individual sells merchandises on credit at a high price and afterward buys it back at a much less price for cash. 16 Toullier, n. 44; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1118.

MOIETY. The half of anything; as, if a testator bequeath one moiety of his estate to A, and the other to B, each shall take an equal part. Joint tenants are said to hold by moieties. Littleton 125; 3 C. B. 274, 283.

MOLESTATION. In Scotch Law. The name of an action competent to the proprietor of a landed estate against those who disturb his possession. It is chiefly used in questions of commonry, or of converted maroche. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 48. See, generally, 12 Q. B. D. 580; 14 id. 792.

MOLLITURA. Toll paid for grinding at a mill; culture. Not used.

MOLLITER MANUS IMPOSUIT (Lat.). He laid his hands on gently.

In Pleading. A plea in justification of a trespass to the person. It is a good plea when supported by the evidence; 12 Viner, Abr. 182; Hamm. N. P. 149; where an amount of violence proportioned to the circumstances; 20 Johns. 427; 4 Den. 448; 2 Strobb. 232; 17 Ohio 454; has been done to the person of another in defence of property; 3 Cush. 154; 3 Ohio St. 159; 9 Barb. 652; 23 Pa. 424; see 19 N. H. 562; 25 Ala. N. S. 41; 4 Cush. 507; or the prevention of crime: 2 Chitty, Pl. 574; Bac. Abr. Assault and Battery (C. 8).

MOLMUTIAN LAWS. The laws of Dunvallo Molmutius, sixteenth king of the Britons, who began his reign about 400 B. C. These laws were famous in the land till the conquest; Toml.; Mor. & W.

MONARCHY. That government which is ruled, really or theoretically, by one man, who is wholly set apart from all other members of the state.

According to the etymology of the word, monarchy is that government in which one person rules supreme—alone. In modern times the terms autocracy, autocrat, have come into use to indicate that monarchy of which the ruler desires to be exclusively considered the source of all power and authority. The Russian emperor styles himself Autocrat of all the Russias. Autocrat is the same with despot; but the latter term has fallen somewhat into disrepute. Monarchy is contradistinguished from republic. Although the etymology of the term monarchy is simple and clear, it is by no means easy to give a definition either of monarchy or of republic. The constitution of the United States guarantees a republican government to every state. What is a republic? In this case the meaning of the term must be gathered from the republics which existed at the time of the formation of our government, and which were habitually called republics. Lieber, in a paper on the question, "Shall Utah be admitted into the Union?" (in Putnam's Magazine), declared that the Mormons did not form a republic.

The fact that one man stands at the head of a government does not make it a monarchy. We have a president at the head. Nor is it necessary that the one person have an unlimited amount of power, to make a government a monarchy. The power of the king of England is limited by law and theory, and reduced to a small amount in reality; yet England is called a monarchy. Nor does hereditaryness furnish us with a distinction. The pope is elected by the cardinals, yet the States of the Church were a monarchy; and the stadtholder of several states of the Netherlands was hereditary, yet the states were republics. We cannot find any better definition of monarchy than this: a monarchy is that government which is ruled (really or theoretically) by one man, who is wholly set apart from all other members of the state (called his subjects); while we call republic that government in which not only there exists an organism by which the opinion of the people, or of a portion of the people (as in aristocracies), passes over into public will, that is, law, but in which also the supreme power, or the executive power, returns, either periodically or at stated times (where the chief magistracy is for life), to the people, or a portion of the people, to be given anew to another person; or else, that government in which the hereditary portion (if there be any) is not the chief and leading portion of the government, as was the case in the Netherlands.

Monarchy is the prevailing type of government. Whether it will remain so with our Caucasian race is a question not to be discussed in a law dictionary. The two types of monarchy as it exists in Europe are the limited or constitutional monarchy, developed in England, and centralized monarchy—to which was added the modern French type, which consisted in the adoption of Rousseau's idea of sovereignty, and applying it to a transfer of all the sovereign power of the people to one Caesar, who thus became an unqualified and unmitigated autocrat or despot. It was a relapse into coarse absolutism.

Paley has endeavored to point out the advantages and disadvantages of the different classes of government—not successfully, we think. The great advantages of the monarchical element in a free government are: first, that there remains a stable and firm point in the unavoidable party struggle; and secondly, that supreme power, and it may be said the whole government, being represented by or symbolized in one living person, authority, respect, and, with regard to public money, even public morality, stand a better chance to be preserved.

The great disadvantages of a monarchy are that the personal interests or inclinations of the monarch or his house (of the dynasty) are substituted for the public interest; that to the chance of birth is left what with rational beings certainly ought to be the result of reason and wisdom; and that loyalty to the ruler comes easily to be substituted for real patriotism, and frequently passes over into undignified and pernicious man-worship. Monarchy is assuredly the best government for many nations at the present period, and the only government under which in this period they can obtain security and liberty; yet, unless we believe in a pre-existing divine right of the monarch, monarchy can never be anything but a substitute—acceptable, wise, even desirable, as the case may be—for something more dignified, which, unfortunately, the passions or derelictions of men prevent. The advantages and disadvantages of republics may be said to be the reverse of what has been stated regarding monarchy. A frequent mistake in modern times is this: that a state simply for the time without a king—a kingless government—is called a republic. But a monarchy does not change into a republic simply by expelling the king or the dynasty; as was seen in France in 1848. Few governments are less acceptable than an elective monarchy; for it has the disadvantages of the monarchy without its advantages, and the disadvantages of a republic without its advantages. See GOVERNMENT; ABSOLUTISM.

MONASTERIUM. A monastery; a church. Spel. Gloss.

MONASTICON. A book giving an account of monasteries, convents, and religious houses.

MONETAGIUM. An ancient tribute paid by tenants to their lord every third year, in consideration of the lord's not changing the money he had coined.

Mintage, or the right of coining money. Cowel.

MONETARY UNION. See LATIN MONETARY UNION.

MONEY. Gold and silver coins. The common medium of exchange in a civilized nation.

There is some difference of opinion as to the etymology of the word money; and writers do not agree as to its precise meaning. Some writers define it to be the common medium of exchange among civilized nations; but in the United States constitution there is a provision which has been supposed to make it synonymous with coins: "The congress shall have power to coin money." Art. 1, sect. 8. Again: "No state shall coin money, or make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debt." Art. 1, sect. 10. Hence the money of the United States consists of gold and silver coins. And so well has the congress of the United States maintained this point, that the copper coins heretofore struck, and the nickel cent of recent issues, although authorized to "pass current," are not money in an exact sense, because they are not made a legal tender beyond twenty-five cents. The question has been made whether a paper currency can be constitutionally authorized by congress and constituted a legal tender in the payment of private debts. Such a power has been exercised and adjudged valid by the highest tribunal of several of the states, as well as by congress in the legal-tender acts of 1862 and 1863. See LEGAL TENDER; 1 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 553; 11 id. 618; 12 id. 601; 47 Wisc. 551.

For many purposes, bank-notes; 1 Y. & J. 380; 3 Mass. 405; 4 Pick. 74; 2 N. H. 383; 20 Wisc. 217; 47 id. 557; 7 Cow. 662; Brayt. 24; 71 Ala. 554; 34 Mich. 490; treasury notes and national bank notes; 66 Miss. 298; greenbacks; 27 Fla. 196; a check; 4 Bingh. 179; negotiable notes; 3 Mass. 405; securities; 41 Ill. App. 579; and bonds; 19 C. C. R. 616; will be considered as money. But, ordinarily, standing alone, it means only that which passes current as money, including bank deposits; but in a bequest of money it has been held to include personal property; 65 Hun 159; see 92 N. Y. 234; 34 Ohio St. 352. But a charge that the defendant set up and kept a faro bank, at which money was bet, etc., is not sustained by proof that bank-notes were bet, etc.; 2 Dana 298; see 2 H. & G. 407; or where there is an indictment for the larceny of lawful money of the United States, evidence of the larceny of national bank notes, does not warrant a conviction; 60 Ind. 198. To support a count for money had and received, the receipt by the defendant of bank-notes, promissory notes; 9 Pick. 93; 14 Me. 285; 7 Johns. 132; credit in account in the books of a third person; 3 Campb. 199; or any chattel, is sufficient; 4 Pick. 71; 17 Mass. 560; and will be treated as money. See 7 Wend. 811; 7 S. & R. 246; 3 B. & P. 559; 1 Y. & J. 380; 30 Tex. App. 475; 5 Lea 96. The mutilation of coins is forbidden by law. U. S. R. S. 2 Supp. 579. See LATIN UNION; GOLD; SILVER; COIN. FOREIGN MONEY.

MONEY OF ADIERO. In French Law. Earnest money. See EARNEST.

MONEY BILLS. Bills or projects of laws providing for raising revenue, and for making grants or appropriations of the public money.

A bill for granting supplies to the crown. Such bills commence in the House of Commons and are rarely attempted to be materially altered in the Lords; May, Parl. L. ch. 22.

The first clause of the seventh section of the constitution of the United States declares, "All bills for raising revenues shall originate in the house of representatives; but the senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills." See Story, Const. §§ 874-877; 58 Ala. 646; 126 Mass. 601; Cooley, Const. Lim., 4th ed. 160.

What bills are properly "bills for raising revenue," in the sense of the constitution, has been matter of some discussion. Tuck. Bla. Com. App. 281; Story, Const. § 880. In practice, the power has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue; Story, Const. § 880; 2 Elliott, Deb. 263.

And a privilege conferred by a state constitution, to originate "money bills," has been held to be limited to such as transfer money from the people to the state, and not to include such as appropriate money from the state treasury; 126 Mass. 557. See REVENUE.

MONEY BROKER. A money changer; one who lends to or raises money for others.

MONEY CLAIMS. In English Practice. Under the Judicature Act of 1873, claims for the price of goods sold, for money lent, for arrears of rent, etc., and other claims where money is directly payable on a contract express or implied, as opposed to the cases where money is claimed by way of damages for some independent wrong, whether by breach of contract or otherwise. These "money claims" correspond very nearly to the "money counts" hitherto in use. Moz. & W. 410.

MONEY COUNTS. In Pleading. The common counts in an action of assumpsit.

They are so called because they are founded on express or implied promises to pay money in consideration of a precedent debt. They are of four descriptions; the indebitatus assumpsit; the quantum meruit; the quantum valebant; and the account stated. See these titles.

Although the plaintiff cannot resort to an implied promise when there is a general contract, yet he may, in many cases, recover on the common counts notwithstanding there was a special agreement, provided it has been executed; 12 East 1; 7 Cra. 299; 5 Mass. 391; 7 Johns. 132; 10 id. 136. It is, therefore, advisable to insert the money counts in an action of assumpsit, when suing on a special contract; 1 Chitty, Pl. 333.

MONEY DEMAND. A claim for a mixed amount of money, contradistinguished from damages.

Money demand on contract includes the right of action upon an undertaking in the nature of a replevin bail, to return a chattel in controversy, if such return should be adjudged, pay costs, etc. Abbott; 8 Ind. 339. It includes an action for a breach of the obligations contained in articles of apprenticeship. Id.; 5 Ind. 538.

See ACTION FOR MONEY; CURRENT MONEY.

MONETARIUM. See MONIERS.

MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED. In Pleading. The technical designation of a form of declaration in assumpsit, wherein the plaintiff declares that the defendant had and received certain money, etc.

An action of assumpsit will lie to recover money to which the plaintiff is entitled, and which in justice and equity, when no rule of policy or strict law prevents it; the defendant ought to refund to the plaintiff, and which he cannot with a good conscience retain, on a count for money had and received; 6 S. & R. 369; 3 J. J. Marsh. 175; 1 Harr. N. J. 447; 1 Harr. & G. 258; 7 Mass. 288; 6 Wend. 290; Add. Contr., 9th ed. 429; see 120 N. Y. 536; 100 id. 363; 66 Hun 627; 45 Ill. App. 276.

When the money has been received by the defendant in consequence of some tortious act to the plaintiff's property, as when he cut down the plaintiff's timber and sold it, the plaintiff may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for money had and received; 1 Dall. 122; 1 Blackf. 181; 4 Pick. 452; 1 J. J. Marsh. 543; 3 Watts 277; 4 Call 451.

In general, the action for money had and received lies only where money has been received by the defendant; 14 S. & R. 179; 1 Pick. 204; 1 J. J. Marsh. 544; 11 Johns. 464; 77 N. Y. 400. But bank-notes or any other property received as money will be considered for this purpose as money; 3 Mass. 405; 17 id. 560; Brayt. 24; 7 Cow. 622; 4 Pick. 74. See 9 S. & R. 11. Money paid under an illegal contract which has been partially carried into effect cannot be recovered

No privity of contract between the parties is required in order to support this action, except that which results from the fact of one man's having the money of another which he cannot conscientiously retain; 17 Mass. 568, 579. See 2 Dall. 54; 5 Conn. 71; 127 Mass. 22. See QUASI CONTRACT.

MONEY IN HAND. There is no real difference between "money in hand" and "ready money." 12 L. J. Ch. 387.

Money which is subject to one's control. English.

MONEY JUDGMENT. One which adjudges the payment of a sum of money, as distinguished from one directing an act to be done or property to be restored or transferred.

MONEY LAND. A phrase sometimes applied to money held upon trust to be laid out in the purchase of land. See CONVEYANCE.

MONEY LENDERS ACTS. English Acts of 1900 and 1911, the former providing that every money lender must be registered and carry on business in one name only and only at his registered address or addresses; that he cannot send circulars to infants (q. v.); and that the courts may reopen transactions between him and his clients. The act of 1911 protects bona fide holders without notice of securities taken by money lenders. Byrne.

MONEY LENT. In Pleading. The technical name of a declaration in an action of assumpsit for that the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff for money lent.

To recover, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant received his money, but it is not indispensable that it should be originally lent. If, for example, money has been advanced upon a special contract, which has been abandoned and rescinded, and which cannot be enforced, the law raises an implied promise from the person who holds the money to pay it back as money lent; 7 Bingh. 266; 8 M. & W. 434; 9 id. 29. See 1 N. Chipm. 214; 3 J. J. Marsh. 377.

MONEY-ORDER. The act of June 8, 1872, c. 335, provided for the establishment of a uniform money-order system, at all suitable post-offices, which shall be called "money-order" offices. The applicant, upon depositing a sum, at one post-office, receives a certificate for that amount, which he mails to the payee, who can then obtain the money at the office designated in the order, upon presenting the latter and mentioning the name of his correspondent. The system is now established with several foreign countries, as well as at home, and is found very convenient for the transmission of small sums; R. S. §§ 4027-4048. Suppl. to R. S. p. 156. Under the law of March 3, 1883, it was provided that money-orders should not be issued for a larger sum than a hundred dollars; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 406; 2 id. 166.

MONEY PAID. In Pleading. The technical name of a declaration in assumpsit, in which the plaintiff declares for money paid for the use of the defendant.

When one advances money for the benefit of another with his consent, or at his express request, although he be not benefited by the transaction, the creditor may recover the money in an action of assumpsit declaring for money paid for the defendant; 5 S. & R. 9. But one cannot by a voluntary payment of another's debt make himself creditor of that other; 1 Const. S. C. 472; 1 Gill & J. 497; 3 Johns. 434; 14 id. 87; 2 Root 84; 2 Stew. Ala. 500; 4 N. H. 139; 1 South. 150; 121 Pa. 641. In order to enable one who has paid money to the use of another, to maintain an action for money paid, two things are essential: a legal liability on the part of the defendant to pay the original demand, and his antecedent request, or subsequent promise to pay; 86 Ala. 202.

Assumpsit for money paid will not lie where property, not money, has been given or received; 7 S. & R. 246; 14 id. 179; 7

J. J. Marsh. 18. But see 7 Cow. 662. Nor will an action lie to recover back money paid voluntarily with a full knowledge of the facts and circumstances; 12 Colo. 208; 69 Tex. 267.

But where money has been paid to the defendant either for a just, legal, or equitable claim, although it could not have been enforced at law, it cannot be recovered as money paid. See MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

The form of declaring is for "money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant and at his request"; 1 M. & W. 511.

MONEYED CAPITAL. In a statute with reference to taxation of national bank stock, it is held to mean money employed in a business whose object is to make profit by investing in securities by way of loan, discount or otherwise, which from time to time are reduced again to money and reinvested. 59 Fed. Rep. 952.

Words include shares of stock or other interests owned by individuals in all enterprises in which the capital employed in carrying on its business is money, where the object of the business is the making of profit by its use as money. The moneyed capital thus employed is invested for that purpose in securities by way of loan, discount, or otherwise, which are again reduced to money and reinvested. It includes money in the hands of individuals employed in a similar way, invested in loans, or in securities for the payment of money, either as an investment of a permanent character or temporarily with a view to sale or repayment and reinvestment. In this way the moneyed capital in the hands of individuals is distinguished from what is known generally as personal property. Id., citing 121 U. S. 138.

The term has a more limited meaning than the term personal property, and applies to such capital as is readily solvable in money; 28 Fed. Rep. 777. In the provision of Rev. Stats., § 5219 respecting state taxation of shares of national banks, that it "shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State," the words "moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens" include bonds, notes and other evidences of indebtedness in the hands of individuals, which are shown to come materially into competition with the national banks in the loan market. 256 U. S. 336.

Distinguished from Personal Property. Credits, money loaned at interest, and demands against persons or corporations are more purely representative of moneyed capital than personal property, so far as they can be said to differ. There may be much personal property exempt from taxation without giving bank shares a right to similar exemption, because personal property is not necessarily moneyed capital. Id., citing 105 U. S. 324.

MONEYED CORPORATION. A corporation having the power to make loans upon pledges or deposits, or authorized by law to make insurance. 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 7th ed. 1871; 3 N. Y. 479; 48 Barb. 464; 6 Paige 497.

MONIERS. Ministers of the mint; also bankers. Cowell.

MONITION. In Practice. A process in the nature of a summons, which is used in the civil law, and in those courts which derive their practice from the civil law. In the English ecclesiastical courts it is used as a writting to a defendant not to repeat an offence of which he had been convicted. See Bened. Adm.; 76 Mo. 470.

A general monition is a citation or summons to all persons interested, or, as is commonly said, to the whole world, to appear and show cause why the libel filed in the case should not be sustained, and the prayer of relief granted. This is adopted in prize cases, admiralty suits for forfeitures, and other suits in rem, when no particular individuals are summoned to answer. In such cases the taking possession of the property libelled, and this general citation or monition served according to law, are considered constructive notice to the world of the pendency of the suit; and the judgment rendered thereupon is conclusive upon the title of the property which may be affected. In form, the monition is substantially a warrant of the court, in an admiralty cause, directed to the marshal or his deputy, commanding him, in the name of the president of the United States, to give public notice, by advertisements in such newspapers as the court may select, and by notifications to be posted in public places, that a libel has been filed in a certain admiralty cause pending, and of the time and place appointed for the trial. A brief statement of the allegations in the libel is usually contained in the monition. The monition is served in the manner directed in the warrant.

A mixed monition is one which contains directions for a general monition to all persons interested, and a special summons to particular persons named in the warrant. This is served by newspaper advertisements, by notifications posted in public places, and by delivery of a copy attested by the officer to each person specially named, or by leaving it at his usual place of residence.

A special monition is a similar warrant, directed to the marshal or his deputy, requiring him to give special notice to certain persons, named in the warrant, of the pendency of the suit, the grounds of it, and the time and place of trial. It is served by delivery of a copy of the warrant, attested by the officer, to each one of the adverse parties, or by leaving the same at his usual place of residence; but the service should be personal, if possible. Clerke, Prax. tit. 21; Dunlap, Adm. Pr. 135. See Conkl. Adm.; Par. Marit. Law.

MONITORY LETTER. In Ecclesiastical Law. The process of an official, a bishop, or other prelate having jurisdiction, issued to compel, by ecclesiastical censures, those who know of a crime, or other matter which requires to be explained, to come and reveal it. Merlin, Répert.

MONOCRACY. A government by one person only.

MONOCRAT. A monarch who governs alone; an absolute governor.

MONOGAMY. The state of having only one husband or one wife at a time.

A marriage contracted between one man and one woman, in exclusion of all the rest of mankind. The term is used in opposition to bigamy and polygamy. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 857.

MONOGRAM. A character or cipher composed of one or more letters interwoven, being an abbreviation of a name.

A signature made by a monogram would perhaps be binding provided it could be proved to have been made and intended as a signature; 1 Denio 471.

There seems to be no reason why such a signature should not be as binding as one which is altogether illegible.

MONOMANIA. In Medical Jurisprudence. Insanity only upon a particular subject, and with a single delusion of the mind.

A perversion of the understanding in regard to a single object, or a small number of objects, with the predominance of mental excitement. 2 Miso. Rep. 838.

See DELUSION; INSANITY; MANIA; and other titles there referred to.

MONOPLEGIA. See PARALYSIS.

MONOPOLIUM. The sole power, right, or privilege of sale; monopoly; a monopoly. Calvin.

MONOPOLY. In Commercial Law. The abuse of free commerce by which one or more individuals have procured the advantage of selling alone all of a particular kind of merchandise, to the detriment of the public.

Any combination among merchants to raise the price of merchandise to the injury of the public.

An institution or allowance by a grant from the sovereign power of a state, by commission, letters-patent, or otherwise, to any person or corporation, by which the exclusive right of buying, selling, making, working, or using anything is given. Bacon, Abr.; Co. 3d Inst. 181. Whereby any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, are sought to be restrained of any freedom or liberty they had before, or hindered in their lawful trade; 111 U. S. 754; 11 So. Rep. (La.) 239; 58 Fed. Rep. 452. Monopolies were, by stat. 21 Jac. I. c. 8, declared illegal and void, subject to certain specified exceptions, such as patents in favor of the authors of new inventions; 4 Bla. Com. 159; 2 Steph. Com. 25. See passim For. Cas. and Op. 421; Curtis, Robinson, Merwin, Walker; Patents.

A patent for a useful invention, under the United States laws, is not, in the old sense of the common law, a monopoly.

The constitutions of Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee declare that "monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free government, and ought not to be allowed."

The act of congress (26 St. L. 208) declaring illegal "every contractor or combination in the form of trust, or otherwise in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states or with foreign nations," applies to combinations of laborers as well as of capitalists; 54 Fed. Rep. 994. To constitute the offense of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize under the above act of July 2, 1890, it is necessary to acquire, or attempt to acquire, an exclusive right in such commerce by means which will prevent others from engaging therein; 59 Fed. Rep. 104.

MONROE DOCTRINE. A rule or principle of conduct by which any attempt on the part of any European power to extend its system of government to any part of the Western Hemisphere will be regarded as an act of unfriendliness to the United States.

The doctrine originated in 1823 when the European powers seemed inclined to assist Spain to regain the colonies she had lost in America, and was first stated by President Monroe in his message of December 2d of that year as follows:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

Monroe, it seems, had no thought of the important effect his words would have. He was expressing, however, not his own personal opinion, but a principle which the logic of events and the thought of others had been long evolving. See President Gilman's Life of Monroe. The doctrine is now regarded as the settled policy of the United States. It has been evoked on several occasions, notably by President Lincoln in the civil war when the Emperor of France attempted to establish Maximilian in Mexico, and by President Cleveland in the boundary dispute between Venezuela and Great Britain. See The Nicaragua Question, by Prof. L. M. Keasbey; Redd-

MONSTER. An animal which has a conformation contrary to the order of nature. 2 Dungl. Hum. Phys. 422.

It is said that a monster, although born of a woman in lawful wedlock, cannot inherit. Those who have, however, the essential parts of the human form, and have merely some defect of conformation, are capable of inheriting, if otherwise qualified; 2 Bla. Com. 246; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 366; Co. Litt. 7, 8; Dig. 1. 5. 14; 1 Swift, Syst. 331; Fred. Code, pt. 1, b. 1, t. 4, § 4.

No living human birth, however much it may differ from human shape, can be lawfully destroyed. Traill, Med. Jur. 47. See Briand, Méd. Lég. pt. 1, c. 6, art. 2, § 3; 1 Foderé, Méd. Lég. § 402.

MONSTRANS DE DROIT (Fr. showing of right). A common-law process by which restitution of personal or real property is obtained from the crown by a subject. Chitty, Prerog. of Cr. 345; 3 Bla. Com. 256. By this process, when the facts of the title of the crown are already on record, the facts on which the plaintiff relies, not inconsistent with such record, are shown, and judgment of the court prayed thereon. The judgment, if against the crown, is that of ouster le main, which vests possession in the subject without execution. Bac. Abr. Prerogative (E); 1 And. 181; 5 Leigh 512; 12 Gratt. 564.

Monstrans de droit was preferred either on the common-law side of the court of chancery, or in the exchequer, and will not come before the corresponding divisions in the high court of justice. (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34.)

MONSTRANS DE FAIT (Fr. showing of a deed). A proferat. Bac. Abr. Pleas.

MONSTRAVERUNT, WRIT OF. In English Law. A writ which lies for the tenants of an ancient demesne who hold by free charter, and not for those tenants who hold by copy of court-roll, or by the rod, according to the custom of the manor. Fitzh. N. B. 81.

MONTANA. One of the states of the United States.

Congress, by an act approved May 26, 1864 (R. S. § 1903), created the territory and defined its boundaries, providing also that the United States might divide the territory or change its boundaries in such manner as may be deemed expedient; and further, that the rights of person and property pertaining to the Indians in the territory shall not without their consent be included within the territorial limits of jurisdiction.

By act of congress approved March 1, 1872, a tract of land in the territories of Montana and Wyoming, lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River, is reserved and withdrawn from settlement under the laws of the United States and dedicated and set apart as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people; R. S. § 2474; and by act of April 16, 1874, a tract of land at the northern boundary is set apart as a reservation for the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfoot, River Crow, and such other Indians as the President may, from time to time, see fit to locate therein. 18 Stat. at L. 28.

The act providing for the admission of Montana into the Union as one of the states was passed February 22, 1889, and the proclamation announcing its admission was on November 8, 1889.

The constitution was adopted August 17, 1889, and ratified by the people October 1, 1889.

MONTES PIETATIS, MONTS DE PIÉTÉ. Institutions established by public authority for lending money upon pledge of goods.

In these establishments a fund is provided, with suitable warehouses and all necessary accommodations. They are managed by directors. When the money for which goods are pledged is not returned in proper time, the goods are sold to reimburse the institutions. They are found principally on the continent of Europe. With us, private persons, called pawnbrokers, perform this office. See Bell, Inst. 5, 2, 2. A late statute in New York authorizes public pawnshops like those on the continent of Europe.

MONTENEGRO. A principality of Europe. The government is absolute and is vested in a prince. It has a state council of eight members, half of them nominated by the prince and half elected. There are district courts in the chief towns. The supreme court has jurisdiction, appellate and concurrent, over the principality. There is a final appeal to the prince.

MONTH. A space of time variously computed, as the term is applied to astronomical, civil or solar, or lunar months.

The astronomical month contains one-twelfth part of the time employed by the sun in going through the zodiac. In law, when a month simply is mentioned, it is never understood to mean an astronomical month.

The civil or solar month is that which agrees with the Gregorian calendar; and these months are known by the names of January, February, March, etc. They are composed of unequal portions of time. There are seven of thirty-one days each, four of thirty, and one which is sometimes composed of twenty-eight days, and in leap-years, of twenty-nine.

The lunar month consists of twenty-eight days.

The Roman names of the months, as settled by Augustus, have been used in all Christian countries except Holland, where a set of characteristic names prevail, the remains of the ancient Gaulish title, which were also used by our Anglo-Saxon ancestors. The French convention, in October, 1793, adopted a set of names similar to that of Holland.

By the law of England, a month means ordinarily, in common contracts, as in leases, a lunar month. A contract, therefore, made for a lease of land for twelve months would mean a lease for forty-eight weeks only; 2 Bla. Com. 141; 6 Co. 62; 1 Maule & S. 111. A distinction has been made between "twelve months" and a "twelve-month;" the latter has been held to mean a year; 6 Co. 61. In a contract for the hire of furniture at a weekly rental for so many months, "months" was held to mean lunar month; 45 L. T. Rep. N. s. 843.

But in mercantile contracts a month simply signifies a calendar month; 2 Wall. 190; 2 Dall. 402; 3 Cra. C. C. 218; 19 Pick. 532; 28 N. Y. 444; a promissory note to pay money in twelve months would, therefore, mean a promise to pay in one year, or twelve calendar months; 3 B. & E. 187; 1 M. & S. 111; 2 C. & K. 9; Story, Bills, §§ 143, 330; 19 Pick. 332; 6 W. & S. 179; 1 Johns. Cas. 99; 1 Q. B. 250; Benj. Sales § 684.

In general, when a statute speaks of a month, without adding "calendar," or other words showing a clear intention, it shall be intended a lunar month; Com. Dig. Anno (B); 15 Johns. 358; Dud. Ga. 107. See 2 Cow. 518, 605. But it is now otherwise in England by 13 Vic. c. 21, § 4. And by the Judicature Act of 1875, Ord. lvii. r. 1, it is provided that month shall mean calendar month when not otherwise expressed. In all legal proceedings, as in commitments, pleadings, etc., a month means four weeks; 3 Burr. 1455; 1 W. Bla. 540; Dougl. 446, 469; 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 543; 3 Johns. Ch. 74.

In Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Florida, and Maryland, and perhaps some other states, a month mentioned generally in a statute has been construed to mean a calendar month; 2 Dall. 302; 4 id. 143; 4 Mass. 461; 4 Bibb 105; 24 Neb. 376; 27 Fla. 215; 74 Md. 86; 139 U. S. 137. In England in the ecclesiastical law, months are computed by the calendar; 3 Burr. 1455; 1 M. & S. 111; thirty days is not a month; 72 N. C. 146.

In New York, it is enacted that whenever the term "month" or "months" is or shall be used in any statute, act, deed, verbal or written contract, or any public or private instrument whatever, it shall be construed to mean a calendar, and not a lunar, month, unless otherwise expressed. Rev. Stat. pt. 2, c. 19, tit. 1, § 4; 28 N. Y. 444. But this has been modified as to computation of interest. so that a month shall be considered the twelfth part of a year, and as consisting of thirty days, and interest for any number of days less than a month shall be estimated by the proportion which such number of days bears to thirty; R. S. pt. 3, p. 335A, § 9.

MONUMENT. A thing intended to transmit to posterity the memory of some one. A tomb where a dead body has been deposited.

In this sense it differs from a cenotaph, which is an empty tomb. Dig. 11. 7. 2. 6; 11. 7. 2. 2d.

Coke says that the erecting of monuments in church, chancel, common chapel, or churchyard in convenient manner is lawful; for it is the last work of charity that can be done for the deceased, who whilst he lived was a lively temple of the Holy Ghost, with a reverend regard and Christian hope of a joyful resurrection.

The defacing of monuments is punishable by the common law: 7 Year B. 9 Edw. IV. c. 14; and trespass may be maintained; 10 F. Moore 494; 1 Cons. S. C. 173; L. R. 3 A. & E. 113; 3 Bligh. 136. An heir may bring an action against one that injures the monument of his ancestor: Co. 3d Inst. 232; Glibe. 453. A gift for the perpetual repair of a tomb, if in a church, will be sustained: [1841] 3 Ch. 232; but see L. R. 4 Eq. 531. CHARITABLE USES. Although the fee of church or churchyard be in another, yet he cannot deface monuments: Co. 3d Inst. 232. The fabric of a church is not to be injured or deformed by the caprice of individuals; 1 Cons. S. C. 148; and a monument may be taken down if placed inconveniently: 1 Lee. Eccl. 640. A monument containing an improper inscription can be removed; 1 Curt. Eccl. 880.

As to inscriptions on monuments and their value as evidence, see INSCRIPTION.

MONUMENTS. Permanent landmarks established for the purpose of indicating boundaries.

Monuments may be either natural or artificial objects: as, rivers, known streams, springs, or marked trees; 6 Wheat. 582; 6 Pet. 498; 1 Pet. C. C. 64; 3 Ohio 284; 5 N. H. 524; 3 Dev. 75; 125 Ind. 236. Even posts set up at the corners; 5 Ohio 534; and a clearing; 7 Cow. 723; are considered as monuments. But see 3 Dev. 75.

When monuments are established, they must govern, although neither courses nor distances nor computed contents correspond; 1 Cow. 605; 3 Pick. 401; 2 Harr. & J. 290; 5 id. 163, 255; 5 Ohio 534; 4 Hen. & M. 125; 1 Call 429; 1 Me. 325; 1 Hayw. 22; 3 Murph. 88; 4 T. B. Monr. 32; 5 J. J. Marsh. 578; 6 Wheat. 582; 4 Wash. C. C. 15; 72 Me. 90; 33 Fla. 261; 147 Ill. 76; 117 Mo. 438; 92 Cal. 623; 49 Minn. 288; 106 Mo. 281; 48 N. J. Eq. 170; 1 Washb. R. P. 406.

A monument established by the government surveys as the true corner of sections will control courses and distances; 91 Mich. 29; 145 Ill. 98. See 79 Cal. 540; BOUNDARY.

In Mexican grants, while monuments control courses and distances, and courses and distances control quantity, where there is uncertainty in specific description, the quantity named may be of decisive weight and necessarily is so if the intention to convey only so much and no more is plain; 161 U. S. 208; 171 id. 220.

See METES AND BOUNDS.

MOOE. An officer in the Isle of Man similar to the English bailiff.

MOOKTAR. In Hindu Law. An agent or attorney.

MOONSHINE WHISKY. Moonshine whisky of sufficient strength to be intoxicating is "privately manufactured distilled liquor." Thorpe, National and State Prohibition, 156; 184 Wis. 664.

MOORAGE. A sum due for fastening ships to a tree or post at the shore or to a wharf. 3 Bland 378.

MOORING. In Maritime Law. The securing of a vessel by a hawser or chain, or otherwise, to the shore, or to the bottom by a cable and anchor. The being "moored in safety," under a policy of insurance, is being moored in port, or at the usual place for landing and taking in cargo free from any immediate impending peril insured against; 1 Phil. Ins. 968; 3 Johns. 88; 2

Stra. 1343; 5 Mart. La. 637; 6 Mass. 818; Code de Comm. 159.

MOOT (from Saxon gemot, meeting together. Anglo-Laws and Inst. of England). See FOLC GEMOTE; WITENAGEMOTE.

In English Law. A term used in the inns of court, signifying the exercise of arguing imaginary cases, which young barristers and students used to perform at certain times, the better to be enabled by this practice to defend their clients' cases. Orig. Jur. 212. Mooting was formerly the chief exercise of the students in the inns of court.

To plead a mock cause. (Also spelled meet, from Sax. motain, to meet; the sense of debate being from meeting, encountering. Webster, Dict.) A moot question is one which has not been decided.

MOOT COURT. A court where moot questions are argued. Webster, Dict.

In law schools this is one of the methods of instruction; an undecided point of law is argued by students appointed as counsel on either side of the cause, one or more of the professors sitting judicially in presence of the school. The argument is usually conducted as in cases reserved for hearing before the full bench.

MOOT HILL. Hill of meeting (gemot), on which the Britons used to hold their courts, the judge sitting on the eminence, the parties, etc., on an elevated platform below. Encyc. Lond.

MORA. A moor, barren or unprofitable ground; marsh; a heath; a watery bog or moor. Co. Litt. 5; Fleta, l. 2, c. 71. See IN MORA.

MORAL ACTIONS. Actions only in which men have knowledge to guide them and a will to choose for themselves. Ruth. Inst. Nat. L. lib. 1, c. i.

MORAL CERTAINTY. That degree of certainty which will justify a jury in grounding on it their verdict.

It is only probability; but it is called certainty, because every sane man assents to it necessarily from a habit produced by the necessity of acting. Beccaria on Crimes and Punishments, c. 14. Nothing else but a strong presumption grounded on probable reasons, and which very seldom fails and deceives us. Puffendorf, Law of Nature, b. 1, c. 2, § 11. A reasonable and moral certainty; a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it. A certainty beyond a reasonable doubt. Shaw, C. J., Commonwealth v. Webster. Bomie's Rep. of the trial, 409; 118 Mass. 1. Such a certainty "as convinces beyond all reasonable doubt." Furke, B., Best, Presumpt. 257, note; 6 Rich. Eq. 217.

MORAL CONSIDERATION. See CONSIDERATION; MORAL OBLIGATION.

MORAL INSANITY. In Medical Jurisprudence. A morbid perversion of the moral feelings, affections, inclinations, temper, habits, and moral disposition, without any notable lesion of the intellect or knowing and reasoning faculties, and particularly without any maniacal hallucination. Prichard, art. Insanity, in Cyclopaedia of Practical Medicine.

A disorder which affects the feelings and affections, or what are termed the moral powers in contradistinction to those of the understanding or intellect. 3 Witth. & B. 269.

For a discussion on this subject and its legal relations, see INSANITY; MANIA.

MORAL OBLIGATION. A duty which one owes, and which he ought to perform, but which he is not legally bound to fulfil.

These obligations are of two kinds: 1st, those founded on a natural right: as, the obligation to be charitable, which can never be enforced by law. 2d, those which are supported by a good or valuable antecedent consideration: as, where a man owes a debt barred by the act of limitations, or contracted during infancy; this cannot be recovered by law, though it subsists in morality and conscience. A doctrine prevailed for some time in the courts of England and this country that an express promise made in discharge of an antecedent moral obligation created a valid contract, and the contract was then said to be supported by the previous moral obligation; Cowp. 290; 5 Taunt. 36; 4 Wash. C. C. 148; 13 S. & R. 177. This opinion appears to have been entertained by Lord Mansfield; 5 Taunt. 36. In a note to Wrenn v. Adney, 8 B. & P. 249, this idea was controverted, and in Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 Ad. & E. 438 (6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 41), the notion of the validity of a moral consideration was finally overruled. The rule existed, if it does not still exist, in Pennsylvania, as late as 24 Pa. 287, and see 140 id. 63; Hollingsworth, Contr.

Promises by an infant, after coming of age, to pay a debt incurred during infancy, of a bankrupt to pay a debt discharged in bankruptcy, and of a debtor to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations, are sometimes considered as instances of contracts supported by moral considerations. But the promise of the infant is rather a ratification of a contract which was voidable, but not void. The promise of the bankrupt operates as a waiver of the defence given to the bankrupt by statute, the certificate of discharge not having extinguished the debt, but merely having protected the defendant from an action on it, by means of the statutory bar. In both of these cases the action is founded upon the original debt. The case of a promise to pay a debt barred by the statute of limitations is said to stand upon anomalous grounds. The true explanation of the doctrine seems to be that it was an ingenious device for evading the statute adopted at a time when the courts regarded it with disfavor. Here too the action is upon the old debt, and not upon the new promise; 3 Metc. Mass. 439. The subject is learnedly treated by Mr. Langdell (Contr. § 71). Some cases have held a feme bound by a promise after coverture to pay a debt contracted during coverture; 24 Pa. 871; see Ewell, L. C. Cov. 332.

Under the English Bankruptcy Act of 1869, debts discharged cannot be revived by a promise made after adjudication; and under the Infants' Relief Act of 1874, any promise made after full age to pay a debt contracted during infancy is void.

The discharge of a merely moral obligation of another will not create a debt, unless made in pursuance of an express request or actual agreement to that effect; Leake, Contr. 86.

MORAL TURPITUDE. See TURPITUDE.

MORALLY IMPOSSIBLE. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

MORATORIUM. An emergency act of legislation authorizing a debtor or bank to suspend payments for a given period. Stand. Dict.

MORATUR or DEMORATUR IN LEGE. He demurs in law. He rests on the pleadings of the case, and abides the judgment of the court.

MORE OR LESS. Words, in a conveyance of lands or contract to convey lands, importing that the quantity is uncertain and not warranted, and that no right of either party under the contract shall be affected by a deficiency or excess in the quantity. 17 Ves. 394; Powell, Pow. 397. So in contracts of sale generally. 2 B. & Ad. 106. These words added to a specification of quantity in a conveyance show it to be a mere estimate, and by necessary inference subordinates the quantity to fixed calls or monuments; 82 Wis. 206.

In case of an executory contract, equity will enforce specific performance without changing the price, if the excess or deficiency is very small; 17 Ves. 394; 24 Miss. 597; 18 Tex. 223; but not if the excess or deficiency is great, even though the price reserved be per acre. In 2 B. & Ad. 106, it was held that an excess of fifty quarters over three hundred quarters of grain was not covered by the words "three hundred more or less," if it was not shown that so large an excess was in contemplation; 1 Esp. 229. See 85 Me. 382; 27 Atl. Rep.

(N. J.) 140. But a deed adding the words more or less to a description of the property is not a sufficient fulfillment of a contract to convey the described property, when more or less was not in such original contract, if there is an actual deficiency. But after such a conveyance is made and a note given for the purchase-money, the note cannot be defended against on the ground of deficiency; 2 Pa. 533; 9 S. & R. 80; 10 Johns. 297; 4 Mass. 414. These words more or less have been held to cover a deficiency of 10 acres where the deed called for 96 acres; 7 N. Y. 210; a deficiency of 54 acres in a deed calling for 451 acres; 54 Ind. 368; 50 feet from 220, where the true dimension was on record, in a purchase in gross; 99 Mass. 231.

In case of an executed contract, equity will not disturb it, unless there be a great deficiency; 2 Russ. 570; 1 Pet. C. C. 48; or excess; 8 Paige, Ch. 312; 2 Johns. 37; Ow. 133; 1 V. & B. 375; see 108 Ind. 185; or actual misrepresentation without fraud, and there be a material excess or deficiency; 14 N. Y. 143; see 91 Ga. 600; 26 Gratt. 721; 11 Q. B. Div. 255.

Eighty-five feet, more or less, means eighty-five feet, unless the deed or situation of the land in some way controls it; 20 Pick. 62.

The words more or less will not cover a distinct lot; 24 Mo. 574. See CONSTRUCTION; ABOUT.

The purchaser is not precluded by a recital of "more or less" in the deed from showing by parol evidence, under an allegation of fraud or mistake, an agreement contemporaneous with the execution of the deed, making the transaction a sale by the acre; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 600.

MORREVER. See ALSO.

MORGANATIC MARRIAGE. A lawful and inseparable conjunction of a single man of noble and illustrious birth with a single woman of an inferior or plebeian station, upon this condition, that neither the wife nor children should partake of the title, arms, or dignity of the husband, nor succeed to his inheritance, but should have a certain allowance assigned to them by the morganatic contract.

This relation was frequently contracted during the Middle Ages; the marriage ceremony was regularly performed, the union was for life and indissoluble, and the children were considered legitimate, though they could not inherit. Fred. Code, b. 2, art. 3; Poth. Du Mar. 1, c. 2, § 2; Shelf. Marr. & D. 10; Pruss. Code, art. 835.

MORGUE. A place where the bodies of persons found dead are kept for a limited time to the end that their friends may identify and claim them. R. & L. Dict.

Its usual and commonly accepted meaning is a place or dead-house, where the bodies of persons found dead are exposed for identification or that they may be claimed by their friends. 75 Ohio St. 278.

In an act which provides that: it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, company, association or firm to establish a morgue on any street or part of a street upon which are dwelling houses, unless the owner or occupants of such dwelling houses within 200 yards of said proposed morgue give their written consent thereto, does not prohibit the location of an undertaking establishment on a residence street, nor make it unlawful to receive, care for and keep temporarily in an undertaking establishment thus located, in a private room thereof and unexposed to public view, the bodies of known and identified dead which are from time to time taken to such undertaking establishment at the instance and request of relatives or friends of the deceased that funeral services over the body may be held and conducted at that place.

MORMONISM. The system of doctrines, practices (especially polygamy), ceremonies, and church government maintained by the Mormons. Cent. Dict. See MARRIAGE.

A social and religious system prevailing in Utah, whereby plurality of wives is not only permitted, but enjoined. These marriages are not recognized by English law. Nor are they legal according to the law of the United States, persons entering into them being indictable, even under the laws of Utah, for bigamy. R. & L. Dict.

MORNING GIFT. In primitive Anglo-Saxon times, a gift given by the bridegroom to the bride the day after the marriage. In a later form of marriage, the conception of the weotuma (q. v.) was merged with the morning gift. 2 Holdsw. Hist. E. L. 3rd ed., 88, 89.

MORPHINE. The word "morphine" has as well defined a meaning as the word "whiskey" and is well known to the generality of the people to be a derivative of opium, possessing great narcotic power and deadly effect as a poison. 160 Ky. 32, 169 S. W. 514.

MORPHINOMANIA, or MORPHINISM. A morbid uncontrollable craving for morphine; the morphine habit. There are four periods in the career of a morphinomania: (1) the period of initiation, or of acute intoxication; (2) the period of hesitation, and attempt to discontinue the habit; (3) morphinomania proper, which brings with it permanent symptoms and abstinence symptoms, the former symptoms including hyperesthesia and paresthesia, impairment of attention, amnesia, insomnia, tremor, muscular weakness, etc., the latter symptoms including at first anxiety and paresthesias, followed by delirium tremens, clouding of consciousness, hallucinations, delusions, etc. (4) cachexia: previous symptoms exaggerated, considerable dementia, and final death. Bridges, Outline Abn. Psych. 167.

MORT D'ANCESTOR. An ancient and now almost obsolete remedy in English law. An assize of mort d'ancestor was a writ which was sued out where, after the decease of a man's ancestor, a stranger abated, and entered into the estate. Co. Litt. 159. The remedy in such case is now to bring ejectment.

MORTGAGE. Scientific legal writers reckon among proprietary rights "jura in re aliena," i. e. rights of dominion over tangible things of which the fundamental property right is in another. Of such rights the most important is Pledge, which, in this sense, covers those legal relations in which a right in rem is conferred by a debtor upon a creditor as security for a right in personam, i. e. for the debt or other personal obligation of the debtor; Holland, Jurispr. ch. xi. Practically we distinguish these securities as Mortgage, when the debtor transfers the title to the res to his creditor, retaining the possession of it, and Pledge, when he retains the title but transfers the possession. See PLEDGE.

Mortgage is the translation of vadum mortuum—dead pledge, so named because the land was turned over to the mortgagee or lender of the money, who received the profits or revenues of it without applying them in satisfaction of his debt, and the land thus became dead to the mortgagor or borrower who derived no benefit from it. This was regarded as in the nature of usury on the part of the lender and was looked upon with disfavor, in modern phrase as contrary to public policy. In contrast to this was vadum vivum, or live pledge, under which the borrower continued in possession of his property, receiving the profits or revenues of it. Another explanation of the words is that in the vadum mortuum the pledge was dead to the borrower if he failed to redeem, but in the other was alive to him until the lender secured possession of it on default; 1 Coote, Mortg., 4th ed. 5; Co. Litt. 205. (In the case of Welsh mortgages, now disused, the mortgagee entered into possession, taking the rents and profits, but applying them on account of the debt.) In attempting to avoid the difficulty lenders devised the plan of taking from the borrower a conveyance of the property to become absolute upon the failure of the borrower to redeem. Later, the plan was adopted of taking an absolute conveyance, with an agreement on the part of the lender to re-convey on payment of the debt, the transaction being in form an absolute sale of land with an option to buy it back by payment of the loan at a fixed time. Another form was to convey the land to a trustee who was to hold to the creditor's use, and on default was to sell it for the payment of the debt. All these devices were intended to protect the lender by enabling him to secure the land on his debtor's default. All of them were modified or softened by the courts refusing to allow the forfeiture or to treat the transaction as other than a method of pledging the land as security for the debt, the debtor retaining what came to be known as the equity of redemption, and being protected against the strict enforcement of his contract; H. W. Chaplin, in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 1. See EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

In modern times although the old forms are still followed, it is everywhere recognized that the real owner of the land is the mortgagor, and the mortgage is a mere security for the debt or obligation, giving the mortgagee a chattel interest which passes to his personal representatives and not to his heirs. Some of the states have abrogated the old rule and declared by statute that the effect of a mortgage shall be merely to give a lien and not to pass an estate to the mortgagee. But in England and in most of the states the old rule remains nominally in force, and in courts of law the mortgage is recognized as conveying an estate, while equity treats it as merely conferring a lien. Originally this was burdensome, since there was an actual distinction between the rules applied in the different jurisdictions, and redress had to be sought in equity against the severities of the law, but the principle adopted in Pennsylvania in the eighteenth century, of administering equity through common law forms has been gradually making its way until it reached its most signal triumph in the adoption of the Judicature Act of 1873 in England providing that where "there is any conflict between the rules of equity and the rules of common law, the rules of equity shall prevail." To day it may be safely said that the equitable doctrine has completely supplanted the legal, but as the form of the transaction is still the same, some confusion exists, and doubtless always will exist, in the definitions given of mortgage. Some of these are as follows:—

The conveyance of an estate by way of pledge for the security of debt, and to become void on payment of it. 4 Kent 136.

An estate created by a conveyance absolute in its form, but intended to secure the performance of some act, such as the payment of money, and the like, by the grantor or some other person, and to become void if the act is performed agreeably to the terms prescribed at the time of making such conveyance. 3 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. *475.

A conditional conveyance of land designed as a security for the payment of money, the fulfillment of some contract, or the performance of some act, and to be void upon such payment, fulfillment or performance. 44 Me. 299.

A contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act without the necessity of a change of possession. 2 S. Dak. 846. It is a mere security for a debt or obligation; 60 Conn. 24; 53 id. 175; 15 Wall. 322.

A concise definition of mortgage which should embrace both its equitable and its legal character is virtually impossible. . . . These attempted definitions are all erroneous upon any theory of the instrument; they do not go beyond the literal import of the language in which a mortgage is usually expressed, and they utterly ignore all the equitable elements which are as much and as truly constituent parts of the mortgage as the legal elements. Any true definition based upon the original common law and equitable system must embody and express all the double features of the mortgage—that it is both a lien in equity and a conveyance at law." Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 1191.

Both real and personal property may be mortgaged, and in substantially the same manner, except that a mortgage being in its nature a transfer of title, the law respecting the necessity of possession in case of personal property and the nature of the instruments of transfer, require the transfer to be made differently in the two cases.

All kinds of property, real or personal, which are capable of an absolute sale, may be the subject of a mortgage; rights in remainder and reversion, franchises, and choses in action, may, therefore, be mortgaged. But a mere possibility or expectancy, as that of an heir, cannot; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1012; 4 Kent 144; 32 Barb. 328; 13 Cal. 536; 45 Ill. 264; 12 N. J. Eq. 174; 108 Mass. 347; 63 Ill. 98 (see EXPECTANCY). Where real estate is mortgaged, all accretions thereto, subsequent to the mortgage, will be bound by it; 32 N. H. 484; 51 Cal. 620; 52 Pa. 123; 19 Wall. 544; 24 Mich. 416; 64 Pa. 366; and if specifically stated to bind after-acquired property, it will have that effect; 51 Barb. 45; 58 Me. 458; 14 Gray 568; 11 Wall. 481; 19 Md. 473; 29 Conn. 282. A mortgage in terms covering after-acquired property creates a charge on property to which the mortgagor subsequently acquires either the legal or equitable title; 75 Md. 445. See infra. A mortgage of property to be acquired in futuro is constructively fraudulent as to the creditors of the mortgagor other than the mortgagee; 85 Ky. 591.

A mortgage to secure future advances is valid as between the parties; 31 Vt. 122; 23 How. 14; but if a second mortgage be executed of which the holder of the first mortgage have notice before he makes advances the latter will not be protected; 36 Pa. 170; 9 H. L. C. 514; but see, contra, 16 Vt. 300; but he will be where the first mortgagee binds himself to make the advances, though they be made after the execution of the subsequent mortgage; 13 Mich. 380; 31 Conn. 74; and in either case it is said the first mortgagee will be protected if the advances be made without notice of the subsequent mortgage; id.; the record of the second mortgage is constructive notice; 13 Mich. 380. See, generally, 3 Va. L. Reg. 834.

As to the form, a mortgage must be in writing, when it is intended to convey the legal title; 1 Pa. 240. It is either in one single deed which contains the whole contract,—which is the usual form,—or it is two separate instruments, the one containing an absolute conveyance and the other a defeasance; 2 Johns. Ch. 189; 12 Mass. 456; 1 N. H. 39; 5 McLean 281; 55 Pa. 311; 21 Minn. 520; 53 Me. 463; 13 Wis. 264; 38 Mo. 349; 65 N. C. 520; 18 La. 376; 17 Ohio 336; and generally, whenever it is proved that a conveyance was made for purpose of security, equity treats it as a mortgage, and attaches thereto its incidents; 9 Wheat. 489; 2 Des. Eq. 564; 38 N. H. 22; 25 Vt. 273; 1 Md. Ch. Dec. 536; 1 Murph. 116; 3 J. J. Marsh. 353; 5 Ill. 156; 4 Ind. 101; 2 Pick. 211; 20 Ohio 464; 38 Me. 115; 1 Cal. 203; 1 Wis. 527; 9 S. & R. Civ. 434; 100 N. C. 316; 24 Neb. 692; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 391; 71 Hun 349. Whether the intention that it was a security for money appears from the same instrument or from any other, it is always considered, in equity, a mortgage; 86 Ky. 679; 39 Minn. 137; 62 Mich. 414; 69 Tenn. 420; 24 Neb. 79; 129 Ill. 72; 76 La. 96; 85 Tenn. 363; 75 Cal. 271; 45 N. J. Eq. 208. The true test in determining whether an instrument purporting to convey title in payment of a debt be a mortgage or not, is, was the old debt at that time cancelled and absolutely paid; 71 Tex. 418. In law, the defeasance must be of as high a nature as the conveyance to be defeated; 1 N. H. 39;

9 Johns. Ch. 191; 7 Watts 361; 13 Mass. 488; 58 Me. 963; 14 Pet. 201.

The rule as to the admission of parol evidence to establish the character of a conveyance as a mortgage varies in the different states. It is safe to state that where the equitable principle admitting parol evidence to vary a writing on the ground of fraud, accident, or mistake can be invoked, it would universally be applied. In some states the rule is still more liberal, and the evidence is admitted more upon the principle of making the intention of the parties govern the transaction. If excluded in any state it would probably be for statutory reasons: Thus in New Hampshire no deed shall be defeated, nor any estate encumbered, unless by condition inserted in the conveyance; 57 N. H. 117. In Georgia a deed absolute in form and supported by possession shall not be shown by parol evidence to be a mortgage, unless fraud be the issue; 83 Ga. 303; 88 id. 191. In Pennsylvania no defeasance shall have the effect of reducing a deed absolute to a mortgage unless the defeasance is contemporaneous with the deed and is in writing, signed, sealed, acknowledged, and delivered, and is recorded within sixty days. See 118 Pa. 30; 31 Am. L. Reg. 378. In Colorado, on the other hand, it is provided that parol evidence may be admitted to convert a deed into a mortgage; 12 Col. 491. Where a conveyance is in form absolute, in order to change its character to that of a mortgage, the proof must clearly and satisfactorily show such intent; and evidence which leaves the mind in serious doubt is not sufficient; 126 Ill. 301; 35 Fed. Rep. 445; 83 Ala. 396; 75 La. 89; 7 Mont. 585; 20 Can. S. C. R. 548; 98 Cal. 281; 1 App. D. C. 133. See DEFEASANCE.

The mortgagor has, technically speaking, in law, a mere tenancy, subject to the right of the mortgagee to enter immediately, unless restrained by his agreement to the contrary; 34 Me. 187; 9 S. & R. 302; 1 Pick. 87; 19 Johns. 325; 2 Conn. 1; 4 Ired. 122; 5 Bingh. 421. In equity, the mortgage is held a mere security for the debt, and only a chattel interest; and until a decree of foreclosure the mortgagor is regarded as the real owner; 2 J. & W. 190; 4 Johns. 41; 11 id. 534; 4 Conn. 235; 1 Rawle 329; 45 Pa. 463; 5 Harr. & J. 812; 3 Pick. 484; 7 Johns. 278. Both in law and equity a mortgage is held to be only a chattel interest; 12 La. 539. It has been held frequently that the legal fee is in the mortgagee until default, and an absolute fee afterwards; 3 Gray 517; 22 Conn. 587; 13 Ohio St. 419; but it may be considered as the general rule, in modern practice, that the mortgagor, before entry, is the legal owner as to third persons and his conveyance is a transfer of the fee, if the mortgage is afterwards paid; 36 N. H. 141; 15 Pick. 82.

The mortgagee, at law, is the owner of the land, subject, however, to a defeat of title by performance of the condition, with a right to enter at any time; 21 N. H. 460; 9 Conn. 216; 19 Me. 53; 2 Den. 170. He is, however, accountable for the profits before foreclosure, if in possession; 31 Me. 104; 5 Paige, Ch. 1; 24 Conn. 1; 1 Halst. Ch. 346; 2 Cal. 387; 6 Fla. 1; 148 Mass. 300; 49 Ark. 508; 42 Ill. App. 202; 48 N. J. Eq. 399; 1 Washb. R. P. *577. The different states fluctuate somewhat between the rules of equity and those of law, or, rather, have engrafted the equitable rules upon the legal to an unequal extent; 31 Pa. 295; 10 Ga. 65; 27 Barb. 503; 3 Mich. 581; 4 La. 571; 4 M'Ord 336; 9 Cal. 123; 385; 1 Washb. R. P. *517; Jones, Mort. § 17.

Case lies by a mortgagor for injuries done the mortgaged premises by a mortgagee not in possession; 64 N. H. 591. A mortgagee cannot maintain trover for fixtures severed from the mortgaged premises prior to the foreclosure; 66 Hun 635; but he may maintain a bill to prevent injury to the mortgaged property; 53 Fed. Rep. 515; 84 id. 369.

Mortgages are to be distinguished from sales with a contract for repurchase. The distinction is important; 2 Call 428; 7 Watts 401; but turns rather upon the evidence in each case than upon any general rule of distinction; 6 Blackf. 113; 12 How. 139; 5 Ala. N. S. 698; 3 Tex. 119; 2 J. J. Marsh. 113; 4 Ind. 101; 8 Tex. 119; 87 Me. 548; 7 Ired. Eq. 13; 107; 2 Sch. & L. 383; 80 Md. 495; 33 Cal. 326; 19 La. 835; 80 Ill. 188; 41 Cal. 22; 35 Vt. 125; 70 Pa. 434; 21 Minn. 449; 8 Nev. 147; 49 Ga. 183; 62 Mo. 202; 73 Ill. 156; 50 N. Y. 441; 109 Mass. 130; 51 Miss. 329; 129 U. S. 58; 149 id. 17; 86 Ala. 333; 72 Mich. 643; 7 Mont. 585; 5 C. C. App. 394; 59 Conn. 170.

A mortgage differs from a pledge: the general property passes by a mortgage, whilst by a pledge only the possession or, at most, a special property, passes. Possession is inseparable from the nature of a pledge, but is not necessary to a mortgage; 3 Mo. 516; 5 Johns. 258; 2 Pick. 610; 2 N. H. 13; 5 Vt. 532; 26 Me. 499.

Assignment of mortgages must be made in accordance with the requirements of the statute of frauds; 15 Mass. 233; 6 Gray 153; 32 Me. 197; 7 Blackf. 210; 5 Den. 187; 3 Ohio St. 471; 5 Halst. Ch. 156; 21 Ala. N. S. 497; 51 Me. 121; 22 Tex. 464; 31 Pa. 142; 21 Wis. 476; 71 N. C. 492; 56 N. H. 105.

A parol assignment of a mortgage note is an equitable transfer of the mortgage; 85 Ala. 80; and the transfer of the debt carries with it the security, without assignment or delivery thereof; 82 Va. 190; 113 N. C. 532. One to whom an overdue note and mortgage are assigned, takes them subject to all equities existing in favor of the mortgagor or of any other person; 134 N. Y. 514.

Assumption of mortgage by grantee. The question whether the acceptance by a grantee of a deed subject to a specified mortgage as part of the consideration, in the absence of an express promise to pay it, implies such a promise on his part, has been the subject of conflicting decisions. But the more generally accepted view is, that the clause "under and subject" in a deed or conveyance, is a covenant of indemnity or, as between grantor and grantee for the protection of the former; 88 Pa. 450; 173 id. 275 (but see 171 id. 328); 154 Ill. 627; 48 Ill. App. 505; 48 N. Y. 556; 4 N. J. Eq. 454; 124 Mass. 254; 40 Conn. 191; 46 Pac. Rep. (Kas.) 58. A different view has been held in New York, based in the later cases on the doctrine that when one makes a promise for the benefit of a third person, the latter may maintain an action upon it; 24 N. Y. 178; 48 id. 253; 71 id. 26. But this doctrine is for the most part confined to New York; see 26 Am. Rep. 660, n.; 115 U. S. 505; 143 id. 187; 14 Wash. 507; 1 Jones, Mort. § 758. In Pennsylvania, by statute, a grantee does not assume a liability for an incumbrance, unless by agreement in writing, and the words "under and subject" in his deed do not impose such liability.

As to the rights of a mortgagee holding more than one mortgage of the same mortgagor, see TACKLING.

Where it is sought to give the lien of a junior mortgage precedence over the lien of a senior one, the claim must be based either on an agreement to that effect, or on the superior equity of the junior mortgage; 22 Neb. 708. See MARSHALLING. An agreement between mortgagor and mortgagee extending the time of payment of the mortgage debt, and providing for the compounding of interest, cannot be enforced to the prejudice of junior lienholders whose liens were created prior to such agreement; 84 Ky. 411. The vested priority of a mortgagee is beyond the power of the mortgagor or the legislature thereafter to disturb; 134 U. S. 296. Failure to show that a mortgage was recorded before a judgment, is fatal to the mortgagee's claim of priority; 79 Ga. 111. The redelivery of a mortgage which has been paid, upon an agreement that it shall secure another debt, does not create a lien; 86 Ky. 311. A mortgage cannot be continued in effect so as to cover a new indebtedness by an oral agreement; 80 Pa. 378; 29 Kan. 124; but where money has been paid thereunder, the party making payments will be protested as against the mortgagor, or his vendee with knowledge of the facts; 10 Allen 74; L. R. 12 Eq. 516.

The remedies upon a mortgage by the mortgagee on default of payment are various. In cases of real estate he may (1) bring ejectment on his legal title; (2) file a bill and obtain a decree of foreclosure, or a sale of the property mortgaged; 4 Kent *180; (3) exercise a power of sale, if such power be in the mortgage; (4) take possession of the land, if he can do so peaceably, his title becoming sure, and the equity of redemption being barred after the lapse of twenty years or a period equal to the lapse of time necessary to bar a writ of entry, or in some states for a less period provided by law; (5) by proceeding in accordance with statutory enactments which vary in the different states. The general rule is that the mortgagor may pursue all his remedies at the same time; 4 Kent *183.

In cases of chattel mortgages, the mortgagee's remedy is either (1) to bring a bill in equity, obtain a decree of foreclosure, and a sale; (2) if he have the thing mortgaged in his possession, to sell it after giving to the mortgagor notice of such sale, and also of the amount of the debt due.

A remedy by foreclosure is barred where the obligation secured by the mortgage is barred; 23 Tex. 581; 41 Ill. 516; contra, 35 Vt. 104; 26 Miss. 589.

In some cases a reconveyance by the mortgagee is necessary when the mortgagee has been paid after default; L. R. 5 Ch. 227; 10 Wall. 536; in other cases no reconveyance is necessary; 12 B. Monr. 497.

A tender after default discharges the mortgage lien; 54 N. Y. 599; 13 Mich. 306; contra, 34 N. J. L. 303; 9 Allen 522.

It is held in England that a mortgagee's purchase at a foreclosure sale, under a power of sale, by having another buy for him, does not pass a title free from the interest of the mortgagor unless the right to purchase is conferred by the mortgage; [1894] A. C. 150; 106 Ala. 417; if the power is conferred by the mortgage, the mortgagee may buy at his own sale; 181 Mass. 335; 109 N. C. 520; 127 Ill. 591. A mere power to sell has been held to confer on the mortgagee the right to purchase; 96 Ga. 248. But in scire facias proceedings in Pennsylvania the mortgagee may buy at his own sale; and it is everywhere a familiar practice in the foreclosure of corporate mortgages for the bondholders to unite to buy in the property.

A strict foreclosure is the barring of the equity of redemption of the mortgagor, after default in payment, when such default continues after due notice to redeem; 4 Kent *180. It was by bill in equity, by which the lands became the absolute property of the mortgagee. This is a common English practice and obtains also in certain New England states, with a liberal period, by statute or by practice in equity, for redemption; 4 Kent *181. But it is common to decree a sale of the mortgaged premises and apply the proceeds to the payment of the incumbrances in their order of priority. A more common practice, both in England and here, is for the mortgagee, or a trustee appointed for the purpose, to sell the land under a power of sale inserted in the mortgage. This takes the place of a foreclosure. It is the usual practice in the foreclosure of corporation mortgages, except that the sale by the trustee named in the mortgage is usually made in the course of legal proceedings and under a decree of the court, the fund being distributed to the lienholders according to their respective priorities, and the surplus, if any, paid over to the mortgagor.

A mortgagee may proceed to judgment on his bond secured by the mortgage; and such judgment has a lien as of the date of the mortgage; the purchaser at a sale under the judgment holds the land discharged of the lien of the mortgage; 6 Whart. 210.

The general rule is that the mortgagee may pursue all his rights at the same time; 4 Kent *183; but it is said that there are difficulties attending the sale of the equity of redemption by execution at law, and it has been forbidden by statute in New York; and is disapproved in Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Kentucky; 4 Kent *184.

The satisfaction of a mortgage on the record is only prima facie evidence of its discharge, and the owner may prove that the cancellation was done by fraud, accident, or mistake; and if he does this, his rights will not be affected by the improper cancellation of it; 32 W. Va. 244.

The object of recording a mortgage is to give notice to third persons; as between the parties thereto, a mortgage is just as effectual for all purposes without recording as with; 181 U. S. 258.

The receipt of insurance money by a mortgagee in whose behalf the premises were insured, does not constitute a payment of the mortgage, where such is not the intent of the parties, and the money is delivered to the mortgagor for rebuilding; 64 Vt. 387.

An honest mortgage is not affected by its proximity to an assignment for creditors; 62 Mich. 420; nor is it affected by the fact that it was given for a larger sum than is actually due, or in some particulars misdescribes the note in fact secured; 88 Minn. 443; and because it was given for a larger amount than the actual indebtedness, is not conclusive evidence of fraud; 22 Neb. 82.

An equitable mortgage is one in which the mortgagor does not actually convey the property, but does some act, by which he manifests his determination to bind the same as a security. See EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

A chattel mortgage is a transfer of personal property as security for the obligation of the mortgagor. In form it is usually a bill of sale with a clause of defeasance. In some states its form is prescribed by statute; in the greater number, however, this is not the case, and any form may be adopted. A mortgage is to be distinguished from a pledge, the former being a transfer of title, the latter a transfer of possession (see PLEDGE); also from a conditional sale, the test being that if after the transfer the mere relation of debtor and creditor exists the transaction is a mortgage, if not, a conditional sale. The courts lean toward construing the transaction as a mortgage.

The subject-matter of the transaction being a chattel, the law is in some respects simpler than the law as to mortgages of realty which is complicated by rules of conveyancing. The courts seek, in dealing with chattel mortgages, as in the case of other contracts, to arrive at the intention of the parties, and form is generally of little importance. But on the other hand the subject is complicated by the transitory nature of the subject-matter and the devices resorted to to secure the mortgagee and at the same time protect from fraud the creditors of the mortgagor, in other words by the recording acts. These are the very life of the chattel mortgage, and without them it cannot exist. For example, it was held in Pennsylvania (where chattel mortgages formerly did not exist at all, and are now recognized only to a limited extent) that while such a mortgage between citizens of Maryland would be recognized and enforced, when the question arose between the mortgagee and a citizen of Pennsylvania who had in good faith purchased the mortgaged chattel from the mortgagor, the mortgage could not be regarded because in the absence of statutory provisions the common law rule prevails in Pennsylvania that a sale of personal property unaccompanied by delivery of possession is void as against the intervening rights of creditors and purchasers; 9 Phila. 615; 4 D. R. (Pa.) 270.

The problem is how to restrict a transaction by which the mortgagor, though retaining possession of his goods, gives a valid lien upon them as security for a debt, so that innocent parties shall not be injured by giving credit to the mortgagor on the strength of the apparent ownership of the goods. Manifestly the only way to secure this end is by requiring the transaction to be made a matter of record.

Accordingly, the statutes provide for recording the instrument, usually in the county or town in which the mortgagor resides, or, if he is a non-resident, in the county or town in which the chattels are situated. Commonly this is sufficient record while the mortgaged property remains within the state, but some of the acts require re-recording if the property be removed to another county. In some acts it is provided that the wife of the mortgagor must join. In many states are found provisions to punish any removal or disposition of the property by the mortgagor in prejudice of the rights of the mortgagee. See LX R21 TITLE; CONFLICT OF LAWS.

The property must be described with such accuracy as the nature of it will admit, and the description should be sufficient to enable third parties to identify the property. As a general rule it may be said that any personal property may be mortgaged, but this with the reservation that in a number of states the right is restricted to classes of articles, more or less numerous. Naturally, a common subject of such a mortgage is a shopkeeper's stock of goods employed by him in regular course of business. As to this, every variety of rule from the absolute prohibition of such mortgages to their freest use will be found. In some cases they bind the stock at the time the mortgage is created, in others they bind the stock at the time of foreclosure, in others they bind what is left of the original stock, but not the accessions; in others they bind the accessions, provided no other specific lien has attached before the mortgagee secures possession of them.

Where animals are mortgaged, the natural increase will be covered by the mortgage, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary. A mortgage on an article in process of manufacture will cover it when completed if still capable of identification. Growing crops are frequently the subject of mortgage, and the mortgage is valid at any stage of their development, and even in anticipation of their planting. See LIENS. As to a mortgage in its terms covering after acquired property see supra, and also corporation mortgages infra.

CORPORATION MORTGAGES OR DEEDS OF TRUST. The power to give a mortgage is said to be inherent, unless prohibited by statute, in all corporations except railway companies. In the case of the latter, the power does not exist unless conferred by charter or statute; Cook, Stock and Stockh. § 780. In practice, however, this power is usually—perhaps universally—possessed by railroad companies; Short, Rwy. Bonds, ch. viii.; 31 U. S. App. 486. See, generally, 7 Rul. Cas. 673.

A corporate mortgage should be executed with the same formalities as a deed. As it is incident to the general business of a corporation, unless restrained by statutory or charter provision, the directors can authorize a mortgage, though it is customary, and perhaps better practice, that authority should be given by the stockholders. In form it may correspond to the mortgage of an individual and be made directly to the holder of the bond which it secures; but as it is usually given to secure an issue of a number of bonds, it is ordinarily in form a deed of trust conveying the mortgaged property to a trustee for the bondholders, and this trustee is usually a corporation.

Corporate mortgages usually contain covenants or provisions which are wanting in a mortgage given by an individual. Provisions commonly found in such mortgages are (1) that until default the mortgagor may remain in possession of the property mortgaged; (2) an express covenant that the mortgagor will pay the principal and interest of the bonds secured, when due; (3) that the mortgagor shall have power to sell, free from lien of the mortgage, worn out or damaged material (usually accompanied by some provision for replacing the same); (4) provisions as to the payment of taxes and assessments upon the mortgaged property (which are usually assumed by the mortgagor) and providing against the suffering of liens to be established against it;

(5) provisions as to the maturing of the principal of the mortgage debt in case of default in the covenants for payment of interest, or other covenants, by the mortgagor; (6) exemption of the trustee from liability except for gross negligence; (7) provision for the substitution of a trustee in case the trustee named should decline to act, or, usually, in case a substitution be desired by a majority or some larger number of the bondholders; (8) any other provisions, not illegal, which may be desired, such as provisions for the conversion of bonds into stock, provisions in regard to maintaining a sinking fund, etc. It is customary for the trustee to accept the trust expressly, or to become a party to the deed, and also to certify upon each bond that it is one of the issue secured under the mortgage. Where such certificate is forged the bond is void, though in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value; 83 N. Y. 223. But signature by vice-president is good though the bond calls for signature of the president; 161 Pa. 391. A trustee's certificate is a warranty of the facts recited therein (as that the bond is secured by a first mortgage duly recorded) on which the trustee is liable; 76 Fed. Rep. 919; 79 id. 948; 175 Pa. 318.

The mortgage should be recorded in each county in which real estate covered by it is situated, and if it covers also personal property the provisions of the law in regard to chattel mortgages should ordinarily be complied with and the mortgage recorded as a chattel mortgage, at any rate in the county in which the principal office of the mortgagor is situated. These matters are frequently governed by statutes. See RECORDING.

A railroad mortgage is made with reference to the law of the state in which the subject-matter of the contract is, and in which the contract is made; and the law enters into and becomes a part of the contract as if it were there in express terms; 25 U. S. App. 415.

In the absence of a provision to the contrary, all bonds secured by a mortgage have an equal lien irrespective of the time at which they were negotiated; 55 Ohio St. 23; 123 Pa. 563; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 596. First mortgage bonds are prior to second mortgage bonds, even if subsequently negotiated; 8 Fed. Rep. 118. The invalidity of some of the bonds does not invalidate the mortgage; 118 U. S. 161.

The negotiable character of the bonds extends also to the mortgage securing them, against which the mortgagor cannot defend on grounds which it cannot set up against bona fide holders of bonds; 16 Wall. 271, 452; 136 U. S. 268; 64 Me. 37; 122 Mass. 67; 39 Wis. 146; the rule in Ohio and Illinois is said to be different; 14 Ohio St. 396; 93 Ill. 433; see 79 Ala. 587. In case of default, an individual bondholder may sue the corporation, but after securing judgment cannot have execution on property covered by the mortgage, which is security for all the bondholders alike. As to the effect of recitals in bonds as notice, see RECITALS.

In the surrender of corporate bonds and the substitution of new bonds, the latter will retain the security of the mortgage, unless an extinguishment was intended; 96 N. C. 298; see, also, 98 Ala. 92; 76 Fed. Rep. 43 (where under a reorganization plan the old bonds were deposited and were to be held by a trustee as additional security for the old bonds); but not where the mortgage was satisfied of record; 96 N. C. 298. A mere change in the form of the mortgage debt, such as substituting new bonds for the old, will not affect the lien; novation, especially when against the interest of the bondholders, must be clearly proved; 76 Fed. Rep. 88; and the funding of overdue interest and the issue of new evidence of indebtedness in place of the overdue coupons will not constitute a novation unless there be clear proof of an intention to waive the lien; 3 Hughes 320; 83 Gratt. 586.

A corporate mortgage may cover property acquired by the corporation after the mortgage is given. This has been sustained upon the theory that though ineffective as a conveyance, the mortgage operates as an executory agreement attaching to the property when acquired; 68 Fed. Rep. 891. This rule, though contrary to the common law, has been established from necessity in the case of railroads, public policy requiring that a railroad be preserved intact as quasi-public property. The rule will be applied only where the mortgage expressly covers the subsequently acquired property. A railroad mortgage covers the road, although the route differs from that originally laid out. It covers, also, a right of way acquired subsequently to the mortgage, though here the mortgage would be strictly construed, and while held to apply to property used for railroad purposes, it would be held not to apply if not so used; 122 U. S. 82. It covers terminal facilities upon a line of railroad constructed or to be constructed between the named termini, together with all stations, etc.; 138 U. S. 414. See TERMINAL FACILITIES. It applies not only to legal titles but also to equitable rights and interests subsequently acquired either by or for the company; 149 U. S. 327; 130 id. 413; 164 id. 1; it embraces the lease of a belt line around a city acquired after the execution of the mortgage; 22 U. S. App. 54. It does not cover uncalled capital; [1897] 1 Ch. 406. Where the property acquired is at the time subject to existing liens, these liens are prior in right to the lien of the mortgage; 12 Wall. 362; 81 Fed. Rep. 772. See FUTURE ACQUIRED PROPERTY. And if property was fraudulently acquired, the vendor may rescind as against the mortgagee.

Another rule resting upon the quasi-public character of a railroad is that which prohibits creditors from levying an attachment or execution upon the railroad, or parts of it, even subject to the mortgage. To permit such action would be to permit the disintegration of the railroad and the destruction of the power to discharge the public obligation of the corporation.

Foreclosure. The mortgage or deed of trust contains provisions for enforcing the rights of bondholders in case of default of the mortgagor. It usually provides for (1) Entry by the trustee. This is seldom now resorted to, since by operating the property, the trustee becomes liable as the mortgagor would have been, and as default implies that the property has been operated at a loss, the trustee will seldom consent to exercise this right, and never unless sufficiently indemnified by the bondholders. (2) Trustee's sale of the property after prescribed advertisement, which is seldom resorted to. (3) The usual method of procedure is by a bill of foreclosure, usually accompanied by a prayer for a receiver (see supra; RECEIVERS) and for the establishing of liens or claims against the property. No provision in the mortgage can exclude the right of a trustee to apply to a court of equity for foreclosure. The provision usually found that a majority of the bondholders may by an instrument in writing waive the right to declare that a default has occurred will be sustained by the court, though such provision is not favored, as being inimical to the rights of a minority. Provisions unreasonably limiting the right to foreclose are void. When a provision required the request of one-fourth of the bondholders to compel the trustee to begin foreclosure, the fact that three-fourths of the bonds were held by a company operating the mortgagor company was held to justify action by a single bondholder; 73 Fed. Rep. 320. In case the trustee refuses to act, a bondholder may bring suit for foreclosure on behalf of himself and such others as may join; 74 Fed. Rep. 87; 77 id. 525; in such case the refusal of the trustee must be set out and the trustee should be made a party defendant; 79 Fed. Rep. 25; 80 id. 509. If a single bondholder has the right to institute proceedings he is bound to act for all standing in a similar position; 143 U. S. 42. See PARTIES.

Railroad foreclosure suits are begun generally in the federal courts, thus securing the appointment of the same receiver or receivers for the entire property, and avoiding, to a certain extent, possible prejudice in a state court. For the latter reason, perhaps, the same jurisdiction is sought in many cases of corporations other than railroads. The jurisdiction of the federal courts in such cases depends on the citizenship of the parties. Federal courts sitting in equity cannot be ousted of jurisdiction to enforce a right of an equitable nature by a state statute which prescribes an action at law to enforce such right; 149 U. S., 574. See JURISDICTION.

Where a federal court has jurisdiction and possession of the property of a railroad company, it acquires jurisdiction of a subsequent suit to foreclose a mortgage on the same property, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties thereto; 137 U. S. 171; 52 Fed. Rep. 671.

Demand for payment is not necessary before proceeding for foreclosure, though a corporation could of course show that payment would have been made if demanded; 85 U. S. 10.

The court having acquired jurisdiction takes control of the entire property of the corporation through its receiver, and usually in the case of a railroad, though exceptionally in the case of other corporations, operates the property through such receiver. See RECEIVERS.

After the receiver takes possession, supplies, even though not covered by the mortgage, cannot be taken in execution by creditors. Prior to such taking possession, such assets are ordinarily subject to execution, or can be reached by attachment or bill in equity. Income, such as earnings, or interest or accounts collected subsequently to the appointment of the receiver, are taken by him and administered for the benefit of all the creditors. See RECEIVERS; OPERATING EXPENSES.

Provision is then made for ascertaining the liens, or claims, against the property and determining the liabilities of the corporation and their several priorities. This is preliminary to a sale of the property, in order that parties interested may know what the incumbrances upon, or claims against, the property are, and may bid intelligently, or make provision to redeem the property without a sale; 63 Fed. Rep. 891. See Foreclosure decree in 88 id. 843.

Decrees for the sale of mortgaged property usually provide that a part of the bid may be paid in bonds of the issue secured.

On the foreclosure sale of the property of a corporation, bonds should not be received in payment of a bid except for such proportion of the bid as the purchaser, on a distribution of the purchase money, is entitled to receive on account of his bonds, and the right to bid in bonds should be extended to all bondholders on the same terms; 78 Fed. Rep. 956.

The receivership usually terminates in a sale under order of court, either for the purpose of carrying out a plan of reorganization (see REORGANIZATION), or for the purpose of realizing upon the property of the corporation. For the form of a bill of foreclosure and decree, see 3 Hughes 320.

A purchaser of real estate at a foreclosure sale is punishable as for contempt in refusing to obey an order of the court requiring him to complete the sale; see 47 N. Y. Supp. 835, reversing id. 698. Inability to pay the price will not relieve the party; 47 N. Y. Supp. 885; contra, 92 N. C. 304.

It is to be observed that in a foreclosure it is by no means certain that the lien of the mortgage will be determined to be the first lien upon the corporate property. In many cases it develops that claims subsequent to the mortgage in time are held to be prior liens, and while for many purposes the filing of a bill or appointment of a receiver fixes the liabilities, it may be that claims arising even subsequent to the receivership will be held to precede the claim of the mortgage bondholders.

The first payment out of the fund realized from the property is for the expenses of the litigation, always provided for from a fund under the control of a court. Included under this head are receivers' certificates, since these were issued by order of the court. See OPERATING EXPENSES; RECEIVERS.

Taxes are prior in lien to all other liens except judicial costs; 8 Woods 484; 110 N. Y. 250; 41 N. J. L. 235.

In many states liens are given by statutes to certain favored creditors, who thus acquire priority over mortgage bonds prior to the inception of their claims. The ordinary mechanic's lien statute does not apply to railroads unless expressly declared to do so. The contractor who constructs a railroad has no lien thereon as a matter of right. The fact that he has possession does not give him a lien; 1 Wall. 254; 11 id. 459. The courts construe such statutes strictly. Thus, a statute giving a lien for materials, supplies, and labor does not give a lien for money loaned to pay for them; 39 Fed. Rep. 436. And a lien for materials will be allowed only for such materials as pass into the permanent structure, and not for trucks, scales, etc.; 27 Fed. Rep. 178. A contractor's lien for work done will be limited to the embankments and structures actually made by him, as distinguished from the land and right of way; 83 Fed. Rep. 386. It has been held that a statute giving a lien to persons furnishing supplies necessary to the operation of a manufacturing company prior to the lien of an earlier mortgage is not unconstitutional as special or class legislation; 90 Va. 126. Such "supplies" are only such things as contribute directly to carrying on the work in which the company is engaged and not, e. g., goods supplied to a "company store" maintained by a furnace company; 81 Fed. Rep. 451. But, while the courts construe such statutes strictly in determining the kind of claims to be admitted under their provisions, they construe them liberally as remedial statutes in determining the formalities to be observed under their provisions; 35 Fed. Rep. 442.

A very common statutory lien of this class is the lien for labor, usually limited as to the duration of the labor for which a lien can be filed, and also as to the class of employees entitled to take advantage of the provisions of such a statute; 35 Fed. Rep. 436; 81 id. 453.

The "six months' rule," or as it is usually called, from the case in which it was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States (99 U. S. 235), the rule in Fosdick v. Schall, allows parties who have furnished labor or supplies within six months antecedent to the receivership priority, at least so far as income received during the receivership is concerned, over mortgage bondholders. It has been held that the rule applies only to railroads; 138 U. S. 416; not to manufacturing corporations; 85 Fed. Rep. 436; 43 id. 372; not to steamship lines; 50 id. 812; nor to a hotel company; 106 N. Y. 428. But see, contra, an Alabama case discussing the authorities and extending the rule to private corporations generally; 29 L. R. A. 623. See RECEIVERS.

Mortgage or Lien. Where preferred stock is issued under a stipulation in the certificate that "no mortgage or lien of any nature" shall be placed upon the property of the company without the unanimous consent of the preferred stockholder, the words "mortgage or lien of any nature" do not include claims of general creditors. 148 Ky. 379, 146 S. W. 752.

As to the right of a mortgagee to possession, see 6 Harv. L. Rev. 245.

See ROLLING STOCK; RECITALS; TRUSTEE; TRUST DEED; MERGER; LEASE; MAJORITY. Consult Kent; Washburn; Williams, Real Property; Story; Pomeroy, Equity; Jones, Mortgages and also Chattel Mortgages; Cook, Stock and Stockholders; Short, Railway Bonds; Thompson, Corporations.

Mortgages in the civil law are of two kinds, conventional and legal. A conventional mortgage results from the direct act or covenant of the parties. A legal mortgage arises by mere act of law.

A mortgage may be acquired in three ways.

First, with the consent of the debtor, by his agreement.

Second, without the owner's consent, by the quality and bare effect of the engagement, the nature of which is such that the law has annexed to it the security of a mortgage.

Third, where a mortgage is acquired by the authority of justice: as where a creditor who had no mortgage obtains a decree of condemnation in his favor.

When the creditor is put into possession of the thing, movable or immovable, he has a right to keep it until he is paid what is owing him; and the debtor cannot turn the creditor out of possession, nor make use of his own thing without the consent of the creditor.

Effect of a mortgage. First, the creditor has a right to sell the thing pledged, whether the creditor has it in his possession or not. Under the French law, it was a right to have it sold. Cushing's Domat, p. 647.

Second, a right on the part of the creditor to follow the property, into whosesoever hands it has come, whether movable or immovable.

Third, a preference of the first creditor to whom the property is mortgaged, and a right on his part to follow the property into the hands of the other creditors.

Fourth, the mortgage is a security for all the consequences of the original debt, as damages, interest, expenses in preserving, etc.

With respect to mortgages under the modern civil law of France and Louisiana, the distinction between movables and immovables is important. Such a thing as a chattel mortgage is not recognized under either system. "But some things movable in their nature become immovable by destination under certain circumstances," as: animals intended for and used in the cultivation of a plantation and placed on it by the owner for that purpose; though the animal cannot be mortgaged by itself, a mortgage of a plantation will cover the animals so attached to it; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 76; 14 La. Ann. 15. See LIEN; PACT DE NON ALIENANDO.

See, generally, Domat, part i. lib. iii. tit. i.; Guyot, Rep. Univ. tit. Privilegium; Cushing's Domat. LEGAL MORTGAGE.

MORTGAGE AND CONDITION SALE. Distinguished.

Where the debt forming the consideration of a conveyance still subsists, or the money is advanced by way of loan, with a personal liability on the part of the borrower to repay it, and by the terms of the agreement the land is to be reconveyed on payment of the money, it will be regarded as a "mortgage"; but where the relation of debtor and creditor is extinguished, or never existed, the agreement will be considered as merely a "conditional sale." 8 Bush. (Ky.) 695.

MORTGAGEE. He to whom a mortgage is made. See MORTGAGE.

MORTGAGOR. He who makes a mortgage. See MORTGAGE.

MORTIFICATION. In Scotch Law. A term nearly synonymous with mortmain.

MORTMAIN. A term applied to denote the possession of lands or tenements by any corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal. These purchases having been chiefly made by religious houses, in consequence of which lands became perpetually inherent in one dead hand, this has occasioned the general appellation of mortmain to be applied to such alienations. 2 Bla. Com. 268; Co. Litt. 2 b; Erskine, Inst. 2. 4. 10; Barrington, Stat. 27, 97. See Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 1137 n. (4); Shelf. Mortm. In England the common-law right of every corporation to take and hold lands and tenements has been restrained by the statutes of mortmain, which subject the power to acquire lands to the discretion of the crown or parliament as to the grant of a license;

6 H. L. C. 712; 15 How. 387, 404. These statutes have not been re-enacted or considered in force in this country except in Pennsylvania, where they are judicially recognized to the extent of prohibiting the dedication of property to superstitious uses, and grants to a corporation without a statutory license; 7 S. & R. 318; though the title is good till office found, and may be conveyed subject to the right of the state to defeat it; id. See 101 U. S. 332. The commonwealth only can object; 7 Pa. 238.

Ordinarily, a corporation may take and hold such land as may be within the purposes of the charter, whether it acquires it by deed or devise; Clark, Corp. 129. Statutes sometimes restrict the amount that can be taken. Where a limit of value is specified it is ascertained as of the taking; 4 Sandf. Ch. 633.

In the United States the term mortmain acts is applied to statutes which exist in some states restricting the right of religious corporations to hold land and the power to make conveyances, devises, or bequests to religious societies or charitable uses. Such statutes are aimed at the same mischief which gave rise to the English statutes of mortmain, and either avoid the deed or will, quoad hoc, altogether, or when without valuable consideration, or when the real estate is above a specified valuation, or if made within a specified time before the death of the grantor or testator. See Stims. Am. Stat. L. §§ 403, 1446, 2618.

In England, by the Mortmain Act of 1736, 9 Geo. II. c. 36, the power of devising land by will to charitable purposes was absolutely destroyed; 6 Ch. D. 214. This act and various amending acts were repealed by the act of 1889, but practically the then existing law was re-enacted; Whitehead, Church Law 174.

The act of 1889 is in effect a codification of the law on the subject; 5 L. Quart. Rev. 387. It is in four distinct parts: I. Assurances in mortmain are voidable at the land liable to forfeiture, if made otherwise than under authority of a statute or of a license from the queen, who is empowered to grant it. II. Assurances for charitable uses are treated substantially on the basis of the statute 9 Geo. II. and charitable objects are enumerated in the language of the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4; they must take effect immediately, without any power of reversion, reservation, etc., except as to a nominal rent; mines and minerals, or easements, building contract, or the like; or, in case of bona fide sale, of a rent charge or annual payment to the vendor; they can never be made by will, but only by deed made with prescribed formalities. III. Exemptions are made of specified quantities of land for parks, museums, and schoolhouses, which may be made by will; also land for the two universities and other named colleges is excepted from the provisions in the second part of the act. IV. Scotland and Ireland are excluded, and existing charters, etc., are saved.

By the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act of 1891, land may be assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, but such land shall, notwithstanding anything in the will contained to the contrary, be sold within one year from the death of the testator unless the time is extended by the high court, or a judge at chambers, or the charity commissioners, who have power to sanction the retention or acquisition of such land where it is required for actual occupation for purposes of charity. Land under the mortmain acts, 1889 and 1891, is defined to include tenements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, of any tenure, but not any money, secured on land or any personal estate arising from or connected with land; 84 & 85 Vict. c. 73, § 8.

Statutes of mortmain are local in their application and do not affect wills of persons domiciled in British colonies. A bequest by a testator, domiciled in a colony, of money, to his trustees for the purchase of land in England for a charitable object, is valid; 7 H. L. Cas. 124.

See Whitehead, Church Law 174; Tysen, Char. Beg. 561; 1 Brett, Com. ch. xix.; CHARITABLE USE.

MORTUARY. In Ecclesiastical Law. A burial-place. A kind of ecclesiastical heriot, being a customary gift of the second best living animal belonging to the deceased, claimed by and due to the minister in many parishes, on the death of his parishioners, whether buried in the churchyard or not. These mortuaries, like lay heriots, were originally voluntary bequests to the church in lieu of tithes or ecclesiastical dues neglected in lifetime. See SOUL SCOT. They were reduced to a certain amount by 21 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

They were sometimes payable to the lord; Paroch. Antiq. 470. The mortuary seems to have been carried to church with the corpse, and was therefore sometimes called corpus-present. 3 Burn. Ecol. Law 563. Anciently, a parishioner could not make a valid will without an assignment of a sufficient mortuary or gift to the church. 3 Bla. Com. 427.

MORTUARY CEREMONIES. Ceremonies at the interment of the dead, the performance of which being enjoined and prescribed by religious societies, fraternal and other organizations, are of infinite variety as to form, and lack the essential element of uniformity to make them binding and obligatory as customs, even if their compulsory observance was not constitutionally objectionable. 149 Ky 498, 149 S. W. 871.

MORTUARY TABLES. See LIFE TABLES.

MORTUUM VADIUM. A mortgage.

MORTUUS (Lat.). Dead. Ainsworth, Lex. So in Sheriff's return mortuus est, he is dead. O. Bridgm. 469; Brooke. Abr. Retorne de Briefe, pl. 125; 19 Viner, Abr. Return, lib. 2, pl. 12.

MORTUUS CIVILITER. See CIVILITER MORTUUS; DEATH, CIVIL.

MOST FAVORED NATION TREATMENT. Because of the complex nature of commercial relations at the present day, changes of policy in government, etc., the treaty in detail (q. v.) would be impracticable between states, inasmuch as they would be subject to constant amendment. In order, therefore, for states to preserve their rights and to prevent any future discriminations unfavorable to them and to their commerce, they have adopted two methods to supplant the treaty in detail. They are: (1) National Treatment, (2) Most favored nation treatment, or (3) a combination of both.

As a general rule, national treatment secures to the foreign merchant who enjoys its benefits the same rights and privileges as a native subject or citizen in all that concerns his residence, property, commercial transactions and the importation and sale of his goods, and it obtains for the foreign state the same treatment of its merchant vessels as is secured to native vessels.

Most favored nation treatment, on the other hand, leaves each party free to make what internal regulations it pleases, and to give what preference it finds expedient to native merchants, vessels and productions.

Its object is to prevent any unfair discrimination against the merchants, vessels and productions of the contracting party in favor of those of another state, and, owing to its greater scope, the privileges secured by it may be superior to those secured by national treatment. Imports being in their essence foreign, it is impossible that they receive national treatment. The rate of duty on them must be fixed either by a treaty wholly, or in part, in detail, by a supplementary convention confined to duties on imports and exports, or by the legislature of the state; and the favored nation clause is usually resorted to by foreign states to secure a uniformity of charges and to prevent unfair discriminations.

The article enjoins the spirit of fair and equal legislation and is designed as a stipulation that no unfriendly regulations shall be resorted to by one party against the other, nor any preference given in the future with an intent to injure or prejudice either party. Its object is two fold,—to supply omissions by covering the whole field of commerce and navigation, or other matters of which it treats, and to insure fair and equal treatment in those respects during the life of the convention.

The ordinary forms of the clause as it appears in modern treaties are as follows: (a) The simply reciprocal form. "The high contracting parties agree, that, in all that concerns commerce and navigation, any privilege, favor, or immunity which either contracting party has already granted, or may hereafter grant to any other state, shall become common to the other party."

(b) The qualified reciprocal form, so called because of the qualifying clause appended owing to the many discussions concerning the interpretation of "favor."

(c) The imperative and unconditional form. (d) The unilateral form appearing in treaties between Christian or civilized, and semi-civilized states, whereby the civilized power reserves to itself alone favored nation treatment, usually imperative and unconditional. (e) The specialized or contracted form which applies to but one subject of commerce, as for instance, "imports." Herod, Favored Nation Treatment, 2-6.

MOTEEER. A customary service or payment at the moot or court of the lord from which some were exempted by charter or privilege. Cowel.

MOTHER. A woman who has borne a child.

It is generally the duty of a mother to support her child when she is left a widow, until he becomes of age or is able to maintain himself; 8 Watts 366; 16 Mass. 135; 3 N. H. 29; 32 N. J. Ch., 92; and even after he becomes of age, if he be chargeable to the public, she may, perhaps in all the states, be compelled, when she has sufficient means, to support him. But when the child has property sufficient for his support, she is not, even during his minority, obliged to maintain him; 1 Bro. Ch. 387; 2 Mass. 415; id. 97; but will be entitled to an allowance out of the income of his estate, and, if need be, out of the principal, for his maintenance; 2 Fla. 36; 2 Atk. 447; 5 Ves. 194; 3 Dutch. 389. During the life of the father she is not bound to support her child, though she have property settled to her separate use and the father be destitute; 4 Cl. & F. 323; 11 Bligh, n. s. 62.

When the father dies without leaving a testamentary guardian at common law, the mother is entitled to be the guardian of the person and estate of the infant until he arrives at fourteen years, when he is able to choose a guardian; Littleton § 123; 3 Co. 86; Co. Litt. 84 b; 2 Atk. 14; Comyns, Dig. Feme; 7 Ves. 348. See 10 Mass. 135, 140; Harp. 9; 1 Root 487; 22 Barb. 178; 2 Green, Ch. 221; 3 Dev. & B. 325; 9 Ala. 197; 29 W. Va. 751. The right of the widowed mother to the earnings and services of her minor child does not appear to have been precisely determined; but it is by no means so absolute as that of the father; 31 Me. 240; 15 N. H. 466; 4 Binn. 487; 3 Hill N. Y. 400; 14 Ala. 123; 15 Mass. 272.

In Pennsylvania, when the father dies without leaving a testamentary guardian, the orphans' court will appoint a guardian until the infant shall attain his fourteenth year. During the joint lives of the parents, the father has the only control and custody of the children, except when in special cases, as when they are of tender years, or when the habits of the father render him an unsuitable guardian, the mother is allowed to have possession of them; 6 Rich. Eq. 344; 2 S. & R. 174; 18 Johns. 418; 2 Phill. 786; 2 Coll. 661.

The right of the father or mother to the custody of their minor child is not an absolute right to be accorded them under all circumstances, for it may be denied to either of them if it appears to the court that the parent, otherwise entitled to this right, is unfit for the trust; 29 W. Va. 751; 82 Va. 483.

A child will not be taken from the custody of its father and given to its mother when it does not appear that his welfare required the change; 4 Misc. Rep. 285.

The mother of a bastard child, as natural guardian, has a right to the custody and control of such child, even as against the putative father, and is bound to maintain it; 12 Mass. 387, 438; 2 Johns. 875; 6 S. & E. 235; but after her death the court will, in its discretion, deliver such child to the father in opposition to the claims of the maternal grandfather; 1 Ashm. 55; Stra. 1162.

As a general rule the mother of an illegitimate cannot recover damages for his death, under a statute giving a right of action to the relatives or representatives of one killed through the negligence of another; 2 Ont. 658; 46 Fed. Rep. 269. See, contra, 25 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 179. See BASTARD.

MOTHER-IN-LAW. The mother of one's wife or of one's husband.

MOTION. In Practice. An application to a court by one of the parties in a cause, or his counsel, in order to obtain some rule or order of court which he thinks becomes necessary in the progress of the cause, or to get relieved in a summary manner from some matter which would work injustice.

It is said to be a written application for an order; 83 Ia. 471, but it is frequently made verbally.

Where the object of the motion may be granted merely on request, without a hearing, it is a motion of course; those requiring a hearing are special; such as may be heard on the application of one party alone, ex parte; those requiring notice to the other party, on notice.

When the motion is made on some matter of fact, it must be supported by an affidavit that such facts are true; and for this purpose the party's affidavit will be received, though it cannot be read on the hearing; 1 Binn. 145. See 3 Bla. Com. 305; 15 Viner, Abr. 495; Graham, Fr. 542; Smith, Ch. Pr. Index; Mitchell, Motions and Rules.

Under the English Bankruptcy Rules of 1870, all applications to a court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, in the exercise of its primary jurisdiction, must in general be made by motion. Any application made to a divisional court of the high court of justice, or to a judge in an action, under the rules appended to the Judicature Act, 1875, must be made by motion. Moz. & W.

MOTION FOR DECREE. This has hitherto been (since its introduction by stat. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86) for the plaintiff in an English chancery suit to obtain the decree to which he claims to be entitled. It must be distinguished from interlocutory motions. See Hunt, Eq. Pl. i. ch. 4; Moz. & W.

MOTION FOR JUDGMENT. In English Practice. A proceeding whereby a party to an action moves for the judgment of the court in his favor, which he may adopt under various circumstances enumerated under the Judicature Act, 1875.

MOTIVE. The inducement, cause, or reason why a thing is done.

It is an inducement, or that which leads or tempts the mind to indulge the criminal act; it is resorted to as a means of arriving at an ultimate fact, not for the purpose of explaining the reason of a criminal act which has been clearly proved, but from the important aid it may render in completing the proof of the commission of the act when it might otherwise remain in doubt; 49 N. Y. 148. It is not indispensable to conviction for murder that the particular motive for taking the life of a human being shall be established by proof to the satisfaction of the jury; 151 U. S. 396.

An act legal in itself, which violates no right, is not actionable on account of the motive which actuated it; 34 Conn. 529; 28 Vt. 49; [1896] 1 Ch. 274; [1898] A. C. 1. See the learned paper on the doctrine of the last cited case, Allen v. Flood, by L. C. Krauthoff, in Rep. Am. Bar Assoc. 1898. See MALICE; LIBEL; LOCRI CAUSA; CAUSE; CONSIDERATION; MISTAKE; WITNESS.

MOTOR CYCLE. Motor cycles are motor vehicles within the Act No. 196, Pub. Acts 1905 (Mich.). The distinction between bicycles and motor cycles is that one is propelled by muscular and the other by mechanical power. 156 Mich. 174. See MOTOR VEHICLE.

MOTOR VEHICLES. As used in

Act. No. 196, Pub. Acts 1905 (Mich.) § 1 means all vehicles propelled by power, other than muscular power, except traction engines and such motor vehicles as run only upon rails or tracks. 156 Mich. 174.

MOURNING. The apparel worn at funerals, and for a time afterwards, in order to manifest grief for the death of some one, and to honor his memory.

The expenses paid for such apparel.

It has been held, in England, that a demand for mourning furnished to the widow and family of the testator is not a funeral expense; 2 C. & P. 207. See 14 Ves. 846; 1 V. & B. 384. See 2 Bell, Com. 156.

MOVABLES. Such subjects of property as attend a man's person wherever he goes, in contradistinction to things immovable.

Things movable by their nature are such as may be carried from one place to another, whether they move themselves, as cattle, or cannot be removed without an extraneous power, as inanimate things. So in the civil law mobilia; but this term did not properly include living movables, which were termed moventia. Calvinus, Lex. But these words mobilia and moventia are also used synonymously, and in the general sense of "movables." Ibid. Movables are further distinguished into such as are in possession, or which are in the power of the owner, as a horse in actual use, a piece of furniture in a man's own house; and such as are in the possession of another, and can only be recovered by action, which are therefore said to be in action, as a debt. But it has been held that movable property, in a legacy, strictly includes only such as is corporeal and tangible; not, therefore, rights in action, as judgment or bond debts; 19 Conn. 238, 245; 2 Dall. 142; 1 Wm. Jones 225. But see 17 Pick. 404. See PERSONAL PROPERTY; POW. MORTG. Index; 2 Bla. Com. 384; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 26; 1 P. Wms. 267.

In a will, "movables" is used in its largest sense, but will not pass growing crops, nor building materials on ground; nor, as stated above, rights in action; 2 Wms. Exec. 1014; 3 A. K. Marsh. 123; 2 Dall. 142. See MORTGAGE.

In Scotch Law. Every right which a man can hold which is not heritable; opposed to heritage. Bell, Dict.

MOVE. To apply to the court to take action in any matter. See MOTION. To propose a resolution, or recommend action in a deliberative body.

MUIRBURN. In Scotch Law. To set fire to a muir or moor. The time in which muirburn may be practised is regulated by statute. See 1 Bro. C. C. 78.

MULAGE. A term used by miners meaning that the crime of buggery had been committed by a miner with a mule. To charge one with "mulage" is libelous. 162 Ky. 69, 172 S. W. 993.

MULATTO. A person born of one white and one black parent. 7 Mass. 88; 1 Bailey 270; 2 id. 553; 18 Ala. 278.

Properly a mulatto is a person one of whose parents is wholly black and the other wholly white; but the word does not always, though perhaps it does generally, require so exactly even a mixture of blood, nor is its signification alike in all the states. 1 Bish. Mar. & D. § 308.

MULCT. A fine imposed on the conviction of an offence.

An imposition laid on ships or goods by a company of trade for the maintenance of consuls and the like. It is obsolete in the latter sense, and but seldom used in the former.

MULE. A mule is not a mare, horse, or gelding. 4 D. R. Pa. 172.

A hybrid between the ass and the horse. Stand Dict. A mule may be considered as a horse within a statute giving a remedy for injuries to "horses and cattle" by a railroad company. Anderson; 50 Ill. 186. See

EXPERIENCED MULE.

MULIER. Anciently mulier was taken for a wife, as it is commonly used for a woman, and sometimes for a widow; but it has been held that a virgin is included under the name mulier. Co. Litt. 170, 253; 2 Bla. Com. 348.

The term is used always in contradistinction to a bastard, mulier being always legitimate. Co. Litt. 243, and seems to be a word corrupted from melior, or the French meilleur, signifying lawful issue born in wedlock. But by Glanville, lawful issue are said to be mulier, not from melior, but because begotten e muliere, and not ex concubina, for he calls such issue filios mulierales, opposing them to bastards. Glanville, lib. 7, c. 1. If the said lands "should, according to the queen's lawes, descend to the right heire, then in right it ought to descend to him, as next heire being mulieris borne, and the other not so borne." Hollished. Chron. of Ireland, an. 1368.

MULIER PUISNE. See BASTARD EIGNE; EIGNE.

MULTA. A fine imposed ex arbitrio by magistrates on the procurator provinciarum. Inst. 4. 1.

A fine given to the king that the bishop might have the power to make his will and to have the probate of other men's, and the granting administrations. Toml. Law Dict.

MULTIFARIOUSNESS. In Equity Pleading. The demand in one bill of several matters of a distinct and independent nature against several defendants. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 182; 18 Ves. 80; 2 Mas. 201; 4 Cow. 682; 2 Gray 467. See Dan. Ch. Pr. 2093. See PATENT.

The uniting in one bill against a single defendant several matters perfectly distinct and unconnected. More commonly called misjoinder of claims. See MISJOINDER.

Multifariousness of the first kind is where the plaintiff joins several distinct claims against the same defendant and prays relief in respect to all; and of the second kind is where a plaintiff having a valid claim against one defendant joins another person as defendant in the same suit with a large part of which he is not connected.

The objection is discouraged where it might defeat the ends of justice; 13 Ga. 61; but joinder will be allowed unless it is apparent that the defence will be seriously embarrassed by confusing different issues and proofs in the same litigation; 4 Blatchf. 376. See 61 Ga. 520. A bill is multifarious where there is a misjoinder of distinct and independent causes of action. See 17 Ala. 119. Thus, unconnected demands against different estates cannot be united in the same bill, though the defendant is executor in both; 6 Dana 186; nor will a bill lie against two different partnerships, though one defendant is a partner in both; 10 Md. 364; nor a bill combining individual claims with claims in a representative capacity; 3 Story 25; but a bill may be brought by several persons claiming under a common title but in different shares; 18 How. 253; and where there is a joinder of a legal and an equitable claim and a prayer for relief as to both, the bill is not multifarious; 18 Ala. 430. To justify dismissal on this ground, it must appear that the interests are so diverse that they cannot be properly included in one decree; 21 Ala. 813.

A bill framed with a double aspect is not multifarious; 1 S. & M. 231, 208.

There is no general rule by which to determine whether a bill is multifarious because it joins another person as defendant in a suit with a large part of which he is unconnected; it must be left to the discretion of the court; 3 How. 333; 18 id. 259; the courts do not disregard previous decisions, but have a due regard to general convenience and the advancement of justice; 3 Md. Ch. 47.

Defendants should not be put to the unnecessary trouble and expense of answering litigated matters in a bill in which they are not interested; 3 Barb. Ch. 432; but where the interests of different parties are so complicated in different transactions that entire justice could not be conveniently done without uniting the whole, the bill is not multifarious; 8 How. 411; 59 N. H.

507. The objection is confined to cases where the cause of each defendant is entirely different in subject-matter from that of his co-defendants, but it does not apply to a case where a general right is claimed by the plaintiff, though the defendants may have separate and distinct rights; 95 N. C. 303; 69 Mo. 438. To render a bill multifarious it must contain not only separate and distinct matters, but such that each entitles the complainant to separate equitable relief; Adams, Eq. 810.

The objection should be raised by demurrer; 9 Gill & Johns. 280; filigan answer and taking the testimony on the merits waives the objection, and it cannot be made on appeal after a decree pro confesso; id.; 100 Ill. 297; or after a final decree on the merits of one part of the bill; 18 Ala. 787. In 57 Pa. 247, it was held that it was too late to object at the hearing. But in such case it has also been held that its allowance rests in the discretion of the court; 17 Ala. 425. It may be taken by plea, answer, or demurrer, but not at the hearing; but the court may raise it at any time; 3 How. 332.

One defendant cannot demur on the ground of the joinder of another defendant who does not object. See 38 N. J. Eq. 88, n. A demurrer goes to the whole suit, and, if sustained, the bill should be dismissed; 3 Md. Ch. 46; 16 Ala. 87. See MISJOINDER.

MULTIPLE POINDING. In Scotch Law. Double distress; a name given to an action, corresponding to proceedings by way of interpleader, which may be brought by a person in possession of goods claimed by different persons pretending a right thereto, calling the claimants and all others to settle their claims, so that the party who sues may be liable only "in once and single payment." Bell, Dict.; 2 Bell, Com. 299; Stair, Inst. 3. 1. 39.

MULTPLICITY. That quality of a pleading which involves a variety of matters or particulars; undue variety.

MULTIPLICITY OF ACTIONS, OR SUITS. Numerous and unnecessary attempts to litigate the same right. For such cases equity provides a proceeding called a bill of peace, q. v., and a court of common law may grant a rule for the consolidation of different actions; L. R. 2 Ch. 8; Story, Eq. Pl. 234; Bishp. Eq. 415.

MULTITUDE. The meaning of this word is not very certain. By some it is said that to make a multitude there must be ten persons at least, while others contend that the law has not fixed any number. Co. Litt. 257. That two cannot constitute a multitude, see 104 Mass. 595.

MULTURA. See MULTA.

MULTURE. In Scotch Law. The quantity of grain or meal payable to the proprietor of a mill, or to the multer, his tacksman, for manufacturing the corns. Erskine, Inst. 2. 9. 19; Ersk. Prin. 210.

MUMMIFICATION. In medical jurisprudence, the complete drying up of the body as the result of burial in a dry, hot soil, or the exposure of the body to a dry, cold atmosphere.

MUND See WEOTUMA.

MUNERA. The name given to grants made in the early feudal ages, which were merely tenancies at will or during the pleasure of the grantor. Dalrymple, Feud. 198, 199; Wright, Ten. 19.

MUNICIPES (Lat. from munus, office, and capere, to take). In Roman Law. Eligible to office.

A freeman born in a municipality or town other than Rome, who had come to Rome, and though a Roman citizen, yet was looked down upon as a provincial, and not allowed to hold the higher offices (dignitates).

The inhabitants of a municipality entitled to hold municipal offices. Voc. Jur. Utr.; Calvinus, Lex.

MUNICIPAL. Strictly, this word applies only to what belongs to a city. It is used in this sense in the terms municipal court, municipal ordinance, municipal officer.

It has two meanings: (1) relating to cities, towns, and villages; (2) relating to the state or nation: 3 Wyo. 597. See 43 Ala. 588.

Among the Romans, cities were called municipia; these cities voluntarily joined the Roman republic in relation to their sovereignty only, retaining their laws, their liberties, and their magistrates, who were thence called municipal magistrates. With us the word has a more extensive meaning: for example, we call municipal law not the law of a city only, but the law of the state. 1 Bla. Com. 41. Municipal is used in contradistinction to international: thus, we say, an offence against the law of nations is an international offence, but one committed against a particular state or separate community is a municipal offence. See Municipal.

MUNICIPAL BONDS. Evidences of indebtedness issued by a municipality.

In the ordinary commercial sense, they are negotiable bonds. 85 Tex. 520.

This class of securities is issued for sale in the market, with the object of raising money, under the express authority of the legislature. As to the power of municipal corporations to issue and sell bonds and borrow money, see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS. Notwithstanding they are under seal, they are clothed with all the attributes of negotiable or commercial paper, pass by delivery or indorsement, and are not subject to prior equities (where the power to issue them exists) in the hands of holders for value, who took before maturity and without notice. Payment of interest on such bonds for a number of years will estop the corporation from setting up a mere irregularity in their issue, as against bona fide holders for value; 80 Fed. Rep. 672. The coupons usually attached to such bonds are likewise negotiable, and may be detached and held separately from the bond, and may be sued on by the holder in his own name without his being the owner of the bonds to which they were originally attached; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 486; 3 Wall. 327; 1 Dill. 338; whether he has given consideration for them or not; 80 Fed. Rep. 672.

Coupons when severed from the bonds cease to be incidents of the bonds, and become independent claims, and do not lose their validity, if for any cause the bonds are cancelled or paid before maturity; 20 Wall. 583. See as to coupons as distinct and separate instruments, 6 L. R. A. 562, n.; COUPONS.

The fact that such bonds are payable out of a special fund, known as a "sinking fund," does not prevent the holder from suing at law to enforce collection; 75 Fed. Rep. 967.

A very important principle with respect to municipal bonds was settled by the leading case of Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, in which it was held that bonds which were valid under the decisions of the state court of Iowa at the time they were issued, will be sustained by the federal court, although the state court had subsequently overruled its earlier decisions and held that they were issued without authority. See 3 id. 294; 7 id. 181. See also an article sustaining this doctrine in 4 Harv. L. Rev. 311, by Prof. J. B. Thayer, in a preliminary note to which are cited a number of adverse criticisms of it.

Purchasers of the bonds of a municipality issued to aid the building of a railway, which recite a compliance with the law authorizing their issue, are not required to ascertain conditions imposed by the proposition voted on, which do not appear in the bonds; 82 Fed. Rep. 873; they have a right to assume that the conditions have been complied with; 73 id. 966.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION. A public corporation, created by government for political purposes, and having subordinate and local powers of legislation: e. g. a county, town, city, etc. 2 Kent 275; Ang. & A. Corp. 9, 29; Baldw. 222. An incorporation of persons, inhabitants of a particular place, or connected with a particular district, enabling them to conduct its local civil government. Glover, Mun. Corp. 1.

Municipal corporations are political subdivisions of the State, created by it and at all times wholly under its legislative control; their charters, and the laws conferring powers on them, do not constitute contracts with the State within the contract clause of the Federal Constitution; nor are a municipality and its citizens or taxpayers deprived of its or their property without due process of law, nor is such property taken without compensation by reason of any legislative action of the State in regard to the property held by such municipality for governmental purposes, or as to the territorial area of such municipality, or the consolidation thereof with another city, or the repeal or alteration of its charter. 207 U. S. 161.

In the United States, until recently, municipal corporations have been created singly, each with its special or separate charter passed by the legislature of the state. These charters define the territorial boundaries; provide for a governing body, usually styled the town or city council, with representatives to be chosen from different wards of the city or town; fix the qualifications of voters; specify the mode of holding elections; provide for the election of a mayor; and contain a minute and detailed enumeration of the powers of the city council; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp., 4th ed. § 39.

A state is the proper party to impeach the validity of a municipal charter, and its corporate existence cannot be collaterally attacked; 167 U. S. 646. There must be both population and territory; 75 Ill. 156; 29 Mich. 451; and there cannot be two municipal corporations, at the same time, over the same territory; 25 Fla. 871.

There are territorial subdivisions, not incorporated, but which are like municipal corporations, instrumentalities of local government for certain definite purposes. Such are in some states, the counties, or towns, or school districts where they are not incorporated. They are termed quasi-corporations, which title see. They are not included in the phrase "counties or municipal corporations" in a statute; 44 Wis. 499.

The term municipal corporation has been held to include the District of Columbia; 129 U. S. 141; a city; 250 Ohio St. 143; a village; 27 Neb. 770.

Where a municipal charter is repealed, and the same, or substantially the same, inhabitants are erected into a new corporation, whether with extended or restricted territorial limits, such new corporation is the successor of the old one and entitled to its property and subject to its liabilities; 167 U. S. 646.

Public duties are required of such corporations as counties and districts as a part of the machinery of the state government, and in order that they may properly perform these duties they are invested with certain corporate powers, but their functions are wholly of a public nature, and they are at all times subject to the will of the legislature, unless restrained by the constitution; 30 W. Va. 424.

In England, the municipal corporation acts, 5 & 6 Will. IV. ch. 76, abolish all special charters, with enumerated exceptions, and enact general provisions for the incorporation, regulation, and government of municipal corporations. These acts have been followed in many of the United States. The usual scheme is to grade corporations into classes, according to their size, as into cities of the first class, second class, etc., and towns or villages, and to bestow on each class such powers as the legislature deems expedient; but the powers and mode of organization of corporations of each class are uniform; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 41, n.

The scope of legislative authority over municipal corporations is limited only by the terms of the state and federal constitutions, and the necessary implications derived therefrom; 24 Mich. 44; s. c. 9 Am. Rep. 108; 142 U. S. 368. Those matters which are of concern to the state at large, although exercised within defined limits, such as the administration of justice, the preservation of the public peace, and the like, are held to be under legislative control; while the enforcement of municipal by-laws proper, the establishment of gas works, of water works, the construction of sewers, and the like, are matters which pertain to the municipality as distinguished from the state at large; 69 Ill. 326; 62 Mo. 370; 51 Cal. 15; 28 Mich. 228; s. c. 15 Am. Rep. 202; 97 U. S. 284; 61 Fed. Rep. 782. See 160 Pa. 511.

As ordinarily constituted, municipal corporations have a dual character, the one governmental, legislative, or public; the other, proprietary or private. In their public capacity a responsibility exists in the performance of acts for the public benefit, and in this respect they are merely a part of the machinery of government of the sovereignty creating them, and the authority of the state is supreme. But in their proprietary or private character their powers are supposed to be conferred not from considerations of state, but for the private advantage of the particular corporation as a distinct legal personality.

"The functions of such municipalities are obviously three-fold: (1) political, discretionary, and legislative, being such public franchises as are conferred upon them for the government of their inhabitants and the ordering of their public officers, and to be exercised solely for the public good, rather than their special advantage; (2) those ministerial specified duties which are assumed in consideration of the privileges conferred by their charter." 17 Gratt. 375. And it was said by Folger, J. in 62 N. Y. 100, "There are two kinds of duties which are imposed upon a municipal corporation. One is of that kind which arises from the grant of a special power in the exercise of which the municipality is as a legal individual; the other is of that kind which arises or is implied from the use of political rights under the general law, in the exercise of which it is sovereign. The former power is private and is used for private purposes; the latter is public and is used for public purposes; the former is not held by the municipality as one of the political divisions of the state, the latter is." "The distinction is quite clear and well settled and the process of separation practicable. To this end regard should be had, not so much to the nature and character of the various powers conferred, as to the object and purpose of the legislature in conferring them. If granted for public purposes exclusively they belong to the corporate body in its public, political or municipal character; but if the grant was for purposes of private advantage and emolument, though the public may derive a common benefit therefrom, the corporation quoad hoc is to be regarded as a private company." 3 Hill 881.

As to powers of the non-public nature and as to property acquired thereunder, and contracts made with reference thereto, they are to be considered as quoad hoc private corporations; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 66; 103 Mass. 499; 122 id. 859; s. c. 23 Am. Rep. 332. And in like manner, as such corporations they are liable for the misuser or nonuser of their powers of this nature. A city is liable for wrongfully permitting the accumulation of sewage in a cellar, thereby causing the death of a person who lived in the house over such cellar; 21 App. Div. N. Y. 811. But counties, though by modern legislation frequently constituted municipal corporations, are permitted greater immunity from liability for negligence than cities. On this principle in a recent case it was held that the act of 1892, declaring a county to be a municipal corporation, did not change the common-law rule as to its non-liability in such cases, and, consequently, it was not liable for personal injuries sustained by an individual by reason of a defective bridge which it was bound to maintain; 154 N. Y. 675. If a municipal corporation becomes indebted, the rights of creditors cannot be impaired by any subsequent legislative enactment; 4 Wall. 535; 19 Wis. 468; 100 U. S. 374; but authority to a city to borrow money, and to tax all the property therein to pay the debt thus incurred, does not necessarily deprive the state of the power to modify taxation, if the rights of creditors be not thereby impaired; 27 Ohio St. 426; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 321. So, also, as trustee for the general public, the legislature has control over the public property and the subordinate rights of municipal corporations. It can authorize a railroad company to occupy the streets of a city without its consent and without payment; 31 N. Y. 164; 13 La. Ann. 326. It can direct a municipal corporation to build a bridge over a navigable watercourse within its limits, or appoint agents of its own to build it, and empower them to create a loan for the purpose, payable by the corporation; 58 Pa. 320; 17 Wall. 322; 104 Mass. 236; 47 Md. 145. The legislature may compel a city to pay its bonds, by taxation, but not to pay an obligation for which no consideration had been received; 95 U. S. 644. In the absence of constitutional restraint, it may extend the boundaries of an existing municipal corporation without the consent, or even against the remonstrance, of the majority or of all of the inhabitants of the existing corporation; 73 Tex. 538. And in general the legislature may, by subsequent legislation, validate acts of a municipal corporation otherwise invalid; 97 U. S. 687; Cooley, Const. Lim. 371; 101 U. S. 196. The legislature may also interfere with the administration of public charitable trusts by municipal corporations; 64 Pa. 169; but not with those of a private character where a contract has been constituted; 11 Me. 118; 4 Wheat. 518; 53 N. H. 575. A contract made by a city with a water works company, so far as the city's rights are concerned, is subject to the will of the legislature, and a statute may authorize a change therein; 142 U. S. 79; and property acquired by it for the purpose of furnishing water is not held by it as a private corporation so as to prevent the legislature from modifying the management of it; 7 Houst. 44.

See as to special legislation, as applied to corporate powers of municipal corporations, 35 Cent. L. J. 266; as to the power of the legislature over the streets of municipalities, 26 Am. L. Rev. 520; as to municipal power of taxation, 35 Cent. L. J. 227.

"A municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: first, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation, not simply convenient but indispensable." 70 N. C. 14; 93 Ill. 236; 3 Wall. 320; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp., 4th ed. § 89; 22 Am. Rep. 261; 134 U. S. 198; 145 id. 135; 78 Ga. 683; 130 Ind. 149. No powers can be implied except such as are essential to the purposes of the corporations as created; they can bind the people and property only to the extent of their powers; 108 U. S. 110; 13 Ore. 17. Where discretionary powers are granted, the corporation thereby acquires a control and discretion as absolute as that originally possessed by the legislature; 5 Cow. 541; 7 Mart. (La.) N. S. 5; 78 Ill. 550; 37 N. J. L. 146; a grant of express power carries with it the right to determine the mode of its execution; 101 N. Y. 132; 58 Wis. 403; and its discretion in that respect should not be interfered with by courts except where it is clearly abused; 47 Mich. 115. Acts in excess of the express or implied powers are void; 114 Ill. 659. See as to municipal powers, express and implied, 1 L. R. A. 169; 2 id. 54.

A strict, rather than a liberal, construction of the powers of a municipal corporation is adopted; 43 Ia. 524; s. c. 22 Am. Rep. 261; 23 How. 435; 31 Mo. App. 237; and only such can be implied as are essential to the corporate objects and purposes; 108 U. S. 110; 79 Ia. 587; 13 Ore. 17. But, bearing this in mind, it is also true that a municipal corporation may do many acts not expressly authorized by its charter, and it has been said that "it is a mistake to assume that municipal corporations should not keep abreast with the progress and improvements of the age;" 160 Pa. 511. This fairly expresses the elasticity which characterizes the decisions with respect to their implied powers. The functions of such corporations are so well understood that there is usually little difficulty in deciding whether a particular power is essential to its purpose or necessarily implied. These powers have been recognized:—To grade and pave streets; 84 Pa. 487; to establish and maintain a sewerage system; 2 Grant 291; 21 Ohio St. 490; provide for a water supply and an electric light plant; 91 Wis. 131; erect public buildings; 3 Allen 9; prevent damage by fire; 7 Cow. 349; 28 Mo. 488; and to that end appropriate money to fire companies; 27 Vt. 70; 26 Ga. 678; to make pleasure drives around public squares; 171 Pa. 542; regulate poles and electric wires; 148 Pa. 117; even to the extent of requiring them to be placed underground; 6 Am. Elec. Cas. 64 (it is settled that this power may be exercised by the legislature in the exercise of the sovereign power of the state; 145 U. S. 175; 107 N. Y. 593; 125 id. 641; 38 Fed. Rep. 552); so it may make police regulations; 61 Ga. 572; 5 Wash. 303; 93 Mich. 135; offer a reward for the detection of criminals; 7 Gray 374; 92 U. S. 73; contra, 57 Me. 174; appropriate public money for a police pension fund; 182 Pa. 373; or, where it will promote the interests of the inhabitants generally, for a survey for a ship canal; 183 Pa. 202; issue bonds in aid of a railway; see BONDS; and it was held that the city of Philadelphia had power to send the Liberty bell, owned by it absolutely, to the Atlanta Exposition; 4 D. R. Pa. 523.

Power in municipal corporations is denied:—To provide for fireworks on the fourth of July; 116 N. C. 296; or to prohibit screens in bar rooms; 135 Ind. 466; or issue commercial paper; 47 Ill. App. 254; 121 U. S. 165. See 110 id. 192. The municipal authorities may provide not only for the immediate, but also for the prospective, needs of the city, and may make temporary appropriation, as by lease for private use of such public property as is not presently needed; 37 Wis. 400; 25 Fed. Rep. 202; 131 Mass. 23.

A subject of the utmost importance is the power of a municipal corporation with respect to nuisances. Without legislative authority it cannot authorize a common nuisance; 9 Houst. 306; nor by ordinance prohibit, as one, the fencing by a railroad of its right of way; 30 Ore. 478; but in the exercise of a granted power to suppress nuisances it may invoke the aid of a court of equity; 66 N. W. Rep. (S. Dak.) 815. In the Oregon case just cited, the subject was examined and the conclusion reached that even authority by charter to declare what shall constitute a nuisance does not authorize a city by ordinance to declare a particular use of property a nuisance, unless such use is such by common law or statute.

See 36 L. R. A. 593; 39 id. 520, 609, 649; for full annotations covering the entire ground of municipal power in regard to nuisances. See NUISANCE.

The power to borrow money and issue bonds therefor is not included among the implied powers of a municipal corporation, but when a debt has been lawfully incurred, it is not prohibited from issuing bonds for its payment; 84 Pa. 487; 51 Fed. Rep. 165; but see 19 Wall. 468; 5 Dill. 165.

They possess the incidental or implied power to borrow money and issue bonds therefor in order to carry out their express powers, or any affecting their legitimate objects; 7 Ohio 31; 11 Wis. 470.

The power to borrow money or to create a debt should not be implied against the spirit and policy clearly manifested by contemporaneous legislation as well as by the organic law in force when the legislation giving such power was enacted; 67 Tex. 519. It can only be implied from a special duty imposed, for the discharge of which it is necessary; the power to raise money does not include the power to borrow; 119 N. Y. 289.

It was generally held that where express power is given to borrow money it includes the power to issue negotiable bonds or other securities to the lender; 1 Wall. 272; 48 Ill. 423; 15 Ind. 395; 3 Wall. 654; 34 Pa. 490. But, in cases very much discussed, it has been held by the United States supreme court that the power conferred upon a municipal corporation to borrow money or to incur indebtedness merely authorized it to issue the usual evidences of indebtedness but not "to issue for sale, in open market, a bond, as a commercial security, with immunity, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, from equitable defences;" Merrill v. Monticello, 138 U. S. 673. This case, it was claimed, was plainly at variance with Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. 654, and Mitchell v. Burlington, 4 Wall. 270; though it did not in terms overrule them. But that they were considered overruled by the later cases was expressly stated in 144 U. S. 173, which was re-argued, before eight judges, by reason of the death of Bradley, J., pending its decision, and from the final decision in which Harlan, Brewer, and Brown, JJ., dissented. The decision was squarely to the effect that the power to borrow money did not authorize the issue of negotiable bonds, and that "even a bona fide holder of them cannot have a right to recover upon them or their coupons." See a critical review of these cases, 5 Harv. L. Rev. 157; 6 id. 53; BONDS; MUNICIPAL BONDS.

Where a statute confers power to borrow money and fixes the limit of the amount which can be borrowed, a municipality cannot exceed that amount under power conferred by a general provision to borrow money for any purpose within its discretion; 107 U. S. 68.

By constitutional provision in several of the states the legislature is required to restrict municipal corporations in their power to borrow money, contract debts, or pledge their credit. These provisions vary, but are most commonly in the nature of a restriction of possible indebtedness to a certain percentage of the assessed value of property; see 176 Pa. 80; and for a note collecting authorities on the municipal power to borrow money, see 7 L. R. A. 759. Constitutional limitations on state indebtedness apply to the state alone and not to her political or municipal subdivisions; 13 Cal. 175; 19 Ill. 406; 2 Ohio 607. As to both constitutional and statutory limitations, see 23 L. R. A. 402.

There can be no union of public and private funds or credit, nor of that which is produced by such funds or credit; 6 Ohio Dec. 1; and a statute authorizing the union of public and private capital or credit in any enterprise whatever is unconstitutional; 23 Ohio St. 78; 37 id. 97; but a joinder of a city with a county in purchasing a building for a city hall has been upheld; 2 Cal. 289; where it was held that they could take as tenants in common.

Such corporations have not the power of taxation, unless such is conferred by the legislature, and when it is so conferred the statute must be strictly construed; 82 Va. 324; 83 Ala. 608; 99 N. C. 210. A grant of the power of taxation by the legislature to a municipal corporation is subject to revocation, modification, and control by the legislature of the state; 130 U. S. 189.

While the power to make laws cannot be delegated, the creation of municipalities exercising local self-government cannot be held to trench upon that rule; 129 U. S. 141. See LEGISLATIVE POWER. So from necessity, these corporations exercise a large measure of police power (q. v.). A city council may by ordinance authorize police officers to arrest without warrant persons engaged in a breach of the peace, and an officer who, from the outside of a house, hears a disturbance or disorderly conduct within it, may, acting in good faith under such authority, enter the house and arrest the person guilty thereof as being the inmate of a disorderly house; 95 Wis. 492.

The delegation of power to municipal councils to determine between alternative methods for payment of assessments for municipal improvements is authorized by a constitutional provision directing the legislature to provide for municipal corporations; 44 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 915.

Delegations of power to municipal corporations have been held valid to provide for the increase of justices in proportion to population, and authorizing the appointment of the additional justices by county commissioners; 45 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 357; allowing existing municipal corporations to elect to continue under their old charter or adopt the general incorporation law; 72 Miss. 950; authorizing a township committee to determine what territory shall be included in a proposed city; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 858; authorizing cities of a given class to make laws for their local self-government, subject to the general laws of the state; 11 Wash. 435; 13 id. 17.

The delegation, by the state to a city, of authority to act for it in granting franchises to build and operate street railways, does not include the power to institute and maintain actions for their forfeiture for misuse or abuse, and such forfeiture must be decreed in an action in the name of the state; 95 Wis. 39.

The delegated power of legislation involved in the authority of municipal corporations to enact ordinances springs naturally from the nature and functions of these corporations as an instrumentality of local government. Such ordinances, by the legislative body of the municipality, are the usual means of expressing the corporate will and enacting municipal laws and regulations. Such regulations may be by resolution as well as by ordinance where the charter is silent on the subject; 148 U. S. 591; 50 Wis. 204; 70 Ia. 105; 130 Ind. 149; 35 Pa. 231; 54 N. J. L. 325; if, however, the charter requires action by ordinance, a resolution is ineffective; 55 N. J. L. 285; 54 id. 474; 32 Kan. 466; and where an ordinance is required in a particular form it cannot be repealed by resolution; 89 Tex. 79; so even if an ordinance has been passed, where a resolution would have been sufficient, the latter is not sufficient to repeal it; 88 Ia. 558. Where the charter authorized action by ordinance, a resolution is sufficient if adopted and approved by the mayor with such formalities as an ordinance would require; 49 Mo. App. 612; and where an ordinance requires the approval of the mayor, a resolution not presented to him is unavailing; 118 Mo. 395. See ORDINANCE.

The principles upon which rests the right to enact penal ordinances is thus stated: (1) Unless forbidden by the constitution, the legislature can clothe the municipal government with power to prohibit and punish any act made penal by the state laws, when done within the municipal limits. (2) Such an ordinance is not invalid, merely because it prescribes the same penalties as the state law for the commission or omission of the same act. (3) It is no valid objection to such an ordinance, that the offender may be tried and punished for the same act under both the ordinance and the state law. (4) A conviction or acquittal by the municipal courts, under such an ordinance, is no bar to a prosecution under the state law. (5) Such an ordinance is not invalid, merely because the trial thereunder is without a jury. (6) Nor is it invalid, because it excepts from its operation certain business pursuits that are not excepted from the operation of the state law on the same subject; 34 Fla. 440. To the same effect is

id. 504. See 1 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. N. S. 669, 699.

Ordinances must not only not conflict with constitutional or general statute law, but they must be reasonable. It is, however, said that what may be reasonable under ordinary circumstances, as a prohibition against driving on the street at a greater speed than six miles an hour, would be unreasonable and void as applied to the members of a salvage corps or fire patrol responding to an alarm; 84 Minn. 287. An ordinance providing that "no person shall on any street or public place, or on land adjacent thereto, sing or recite any profane or obscene song or ballad, or use any profane or obscene language," was held unreasonable and therefore invalid; [1890] 1 Q. B. 290. It is suggested that the real ground of objection in this case was that the words "or on land adjacent thereto," were too wide, and that the other objection alone ought to be untenable because the use of profane or obscene language necessarily implies annoyance; 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 327. But an ordinance which conforms to a definite statutory grant of power cannot be set aside as unreasonable; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 857. A statutory power to make ordinances regulating trade does not warrant one making it unlawful to carry on a lawful trade in a lawful manner; [1896] A. C. 88.

Municipal ordinances must be specific and definite, and they will not be construed as forbidding an act by implication; 7 Mart. 486; and, like a statute, they may be valid in some of their provisions and invalid as to others; 84 Ala. 17; 98 id. 134; but where the invalid provisions are inseparably connected with the valid ones, the ordinance is void; 54 N. J. L. 75; 49 Ill. App. 60. When a city council is vested with full power over a subject, and the mode of exercising it is not limited by the charter, it may exercise it in any manner most convenient; 16 Ore. 334. A city ordinance in conflict with the general policy and laws of the state is void; 43 La. Ann. 34. See ORDINANCE.

With respect to the liabilities of municipal corporations it may be said generally that as parties to a contract where they act qua private corporations, they are liable on their contract, and contracting parties are liable to them in the same manner as private persons and corporations are. A city can bind parties by such contracts only as it is authorized by its charter to make; 116 N. Y. 167. Those who contract with them are protected where their contracts are made according to law; 71 Mich. 227; 11 Colo. 483; and those who deal with them must exercise reasonable diligence to ascertain whether there be legally provided the funds from which the obligation to be created may be met; and the public is not estopped from setting up the illegality of the obligation by the fact that the other party has acted in reliance upon its validity; 50 N. J. L. 665.

Contracts may be entered into by the officers of a corporation, binding upon it, without the use of the corporate seal; 12 Mich. 138. Without express legislative authority, a municipality cannot act as surety or guarantee; 19 Ia. 199. Where the statute provides that no city officer should be interested in a municipal contract, and that any such contract contrary to that provision should be void, a contract with a school director for street work was held void; 98 Cal. 427; and the same is true if the interest of the officer is indirect merely, as the member of a contracting firm or corporation; 28 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 578; such contract may be ratified by subsequent municipal action after the officer has ceased to be such, for it is a new contract; 192 Ind. 558. Even if there be no penal statute prohibiting the execution of such contract, it is void on grounds of public policy, but so long as it is executory it is voidable merely, and if entered into in good faith for a proper purpose and the city has received the benefit, there may be a recovery on a quantum meruit; 1 Kan. App. 35. For cases on the general subject of the liability of municipal corporations on contracts, see 6 L. R. A. 818, note.

The liability of private corporations for the misfeasance, or negligent nonfeasance, of its officers, is affected primarily by the distinction between their public functions as an instrumentality of government, and their private relations as a corporation transacting ordinary business. See supra. Within the sphere of the former they are entitled to exemption from liability, inasmuch as the corporation is a part of the government, and to that extent its officers are public officers, and as such, entitled to the protection of this principle; but within the sphere of the latter, they drop the badges of their governmental offices and stand forth as the delegates of a private corporation in the exercise of private franchises, and it is amenable as such to the fundamental doctrine of liability for the acts of a servant; 17 Gratt. 375. Although the difference between the two kinds of powers is plain and marked, yet, as they approximate each other, it is sometimes difficult to ascertain the exact line of distinction. All that can be done with safety is to determine, as each case arises, under which class it falls; 5 N. Y. 369.

Where a city or town is exercising the judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by its charter, or is discharging a duty imposed solely for the benefit of the public, it incurs no liability for the negligence of its officers, though acting under color of office, unless some statute (expressly or by necessary implication) subjects the corporation to pecuniary responsibility for such negligence; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 965; but where such corporations are not in the exercise of their purely governmental functions, but are exercising, as corporations, private franchises, powers, and privileges which belong to them for their ordinary corporate benefit, or dealing with property held by them for their corporate advantage, gain, or emolument, though enuring ultimately to the benefit of the general public, then they become liable for the negligent exercise of such powers precisely as though they were individuals; 129 Mass. 344; 36 N. H. 284; 17 How. 161; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 966.

The obligation and duty of a municipal corporation in the construction of public work is only the exercise of reasonable care; it does not insure against damage; 120 N. Y. 164. The inquiry must be whether the department or officer whose action or non-action is complained of is part of the machinery for carrying on the municipal government, and whether it was then engaged in discharging a duty resting upon it; 116 N. Y. 558. To constitute negligence in such actions, there must be a duty imperfectly discharged; 81 N. Y. 21; 8 C. B. N. S. 588; and if the duty is owed to the public, there is no action by an individual to whom the duty was not specially owed; 34 Md. 265; 8 Cow. 153; 44 N. H. 246; 43 Conn. 562. As illustrating the effect of their two-fold character, municipal corporations have been held liable for injuries resulting from negligence in the management of a public building rented out for profit; 102 Mass. 499; otherwise, if let gratuitously; 128 id. 561. So they are liable for torts of their agents amounting to the negligent breach of municipal duty; 22 Pa. 54. Upon this theory rests the exception to the general rule of exemption from liability for negligence in performance of a public duty, recognized in many states, as to defective highways; 24 Ala. 112; see 5 L. R. A. 143, 258; 10 id. 734; as is also in many jurisdictions the liability for defective drains and sewers; 78 Cal. 588; 1 L. R. A. 296; 7 id. 156; but it was held that there was no liability for damage by fire resulting from failure to keep fire plugs, etc., in order; 78 Ga. 241; 85 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 341; or from not preventing the erection of a wooden building within the fire limits; 72 Mich. 278.

There is no liability for omission to exercise discretionary powers; 107 Ill. 324; 56 Vt. 228; there must be a corporate du-imposed; 76 N. Y. 506; 79 Ind. 491; L. R. 2 Q. B. 534; as, for example, a city is not liable for failure of its police to prevent crime which is a public duty, as distinguished from a strictly corporate duty; 1 Marvel, Del. 5. But if the corporation receives a benefit, it may be liable; 128 Mass. 824. It is then the general rule that they are not liable for misfeasance or nonfeasance of their agents. The cases on this point are very numerous.

The municipality has been held not liable for injuries resulting from negligence of a physician in charge of a pest-house; 65 Me. 402; see 1 L. R. A. 844; or for tortious acts of agents in their nature unlawful; 90 Mo. 377; 79 Me. 843; as a constable making an unlawful sale; 100 N. Y. 577; for negligence of an officer in whose selection there was no negligence; 84 Ala. 469; or of officers selected under a statute independently of municipal control; 71 Ill. 857; 17 Gratt. 882; see 1 L. R. A. 844; for negligence of police; 113 Pa. 269; unless there is statutory liability, express or implied; 89 Mo. 208; or of firemen; 84 Minn. 402; or of a civil engineer in establishing a grade for the benefit of an individual for whom he was bound to do it on payment of a fee; 69 Ia. 541; for damages resulting from the firing of a cannon under a license from the mayor authorized by ordinance; 148 Mass. 578; for the publication of defamatory matter contained in an official report of an investigating committee duly selected; 159 Mass. 434; for the wrongful act of its officers in closing an exhibition with intent to injure the owner thereof; 6 C. C. App. 627; see 76 Hun 390; for failure of its officers to provide by special tax a fund to pay street grade warrants; 16 Wash. 698. See 3 L. R. A. 357, note; MANDAMUS; QUASI CORPORATIONS.

Municipal corporations may be dissolved in England; (1) by act of parliament; Co. Litt. 176, n.; (2) by the loss of an integral part; 9 Gill & J. 365; (3) by a surrender of their franchises; 6 Term 277; (4) by forfeiture of their charter; 6 Beav. 220; 76 Ill. 419.

In the United States these modes of dissolution are not applicable, there can be no dissolution except by an act of the legislature which created the corporation. See 113 Ill. 491; 73 Tex. 182; 102 U. S. 473; 116 id. 289; 98 id. 258.

The change of name does not dissolve a municipal corporation; 7 Wall. 1; 98 U. S. 206; but the power of so changing exists only in the legislature.

Nor does the failure of the inhabitants of a municipality to elect officers operate as a dissolution of it; 71 Tex. 65; 72 id. 182; nor is a municipal charter forfeited by mere non-user for any period of time; 98 Ala. 358.

Upon the division of a municipal corporation into two separate towns, each is entitled to hold in severalty the public property within its limits; 2 Wend. 159. See 40 Minn. 13.

In actions generally, the original minutes or records of a corporation are competent evidence of its acts and proceedings; 6 Wend. 651. It is competent for the legislature to delegate to municipal corporations the power to make by-laws and ordinances which have, when authorized, the force, in favor of the municipality and against the persons bound thereby, of laws passed by the legislature of the state; 44 Ia. 508; s. c. 24 Am. Rep. 756; but ordinances cannot enlarge or change the charter by enlarging, diminishing, or varying its powers; 22 How. 422; 12 Wall 849. See DELEGATION; POLICE POWER.

Relation to State. In every essential, only auxiliaries of the State for the purposes of local government. They may be created, or, having been created, may be destroyed, or their powers may be restricted, enlarged or withdrawn at the will of the Legislature, subject only to the fundamental condition that the collective and individual rights of the people of the municipality shall not thereby be destroyed. 191 U. S. 220, 221, citing 3 Wall. 663; 17 Wall. 328-329 et al.

MUNICIPAL COURTS. At common law, municipal corporations frequently enjoyed the franchise of holding a court, and the franchise being a public right, could not be lost by non-user. A. & E. Encyclo. L. See Dillon, Mun. Corp., 8d ed. § 424; 4 D. P. C. 562.

In the United States, in many of the larger cities, there are courts so designated, with statutory jurisdiction in criminal or civil cases, or both, usually limited not only in amount, but by the requirement that suits can only be instituted against residents, and crimes prosecuted which are committed within the city.

MUNICIPAL INDEBTEDNESS. Whenever any city, town, county, taxing district or other municipality is authorized to contract an "indebtedness," it shall be required, at the same time, to provide for the collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on said indebtedness, and to create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, within not more than forty years from the time of contracting the same. 158 Ky. 610, 166 S. W. 195.

An indebtedness created by the issuing of bonds for a street improvement as authorized by statute is not a "municipal indebtedness" within the meaning of the Kentucky Constitution limiting "municipal indebtedness." 129 Ky. 532, 112 S. W. 666.

MUNICIPAL LAW. In contradistinction to international law, the system of law proper to any single nation or state. It is the rule or law by which a particular district, community, or nation is governed. 1 Bla. Com 44.

Municipal law contrasts with international law, in that it is a system of law proper to a single nation, state, or community. In any one state the municipal law of another state is foreign law. See FOREIGN LAW. A conflict of laws arises where a case arising in one state involves foreign persons or interests, and the foreign and the domestic laws do not agree as to the proper rule to be applied. See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

The various provinces of municipal law are characterized according to the subjects with which they respectively treat: as, criminal or penal law, civil law, military law, and the like. Constitutional law, commercial law, parliamentary law, and the like, are departments of the general province of civil law, as distinguished from criminal and military law.

MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE. A statute or regulation enacted or adopted by a municipal corporation for the proper conduct of its affairs or the government of its inhabitants. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION; ORDINANCE.

A local law prescribing a general and permanent rule. (114 Ind. 332.) It is a local law enacted by public officers under legislative authority, and binds all within the municipality, strangers as well as residents, and with or without their consent. 1 Thomp. Corp. 2nd ed., 1193. Cf. BY-LAW.

A local law or rule prescribed by a municipal government for application within its jurisdiction. (145 Ga. 843.) It generally imports a command or prohibition applicable to all the inhabitants or certain classes in the given community. It is usually designed to compel or prevent action of some sort on the part of some one. (219 N. Y. 216.) Although an ordinance is not a law in every sense in which the term law is used in constitutions and statutes, it is nevertheless a local law of the municipality (162 Ky. 738), emanating from its legislative authority, and operative within its restricted sphere as effectively as a general law of the sovereignty.

Ordinance as a term of municipal law is the equivalent of legislative action, and hence, its employment in a constitution, statute or charter carries with it by natural, if not necessary implication, the usual incidents of such action. It means something more than a verbal motion subsequently reduced to writing. To create an ordinance, therefore, legislative formality is indispensable. 7 McQuillan, Mun. Corp. 6838-41. Cf. RESOLUTION. [A resolution deals with matters of a special or temporary character an ordinance prescribes some permanent rule of government (19 Ga. App. 559), and is distinctively a legislative act.] Id., 6841. See BY-LAW.

MUNICIPAL PURPOSE. The erection of a school building is a "municipal purpose" for which the city is authorized to issue bonds. 134 Ky. 435, 120 S. W. 367.

MUNICIPAL SECURITIES. The evidences of indebtedness issued by cities, towns, counties, townships, school districts, and other such territorial divisions of the state. There are two general classes: (1) municipal warrants, orders, or certificates; (2) municipal negotiable bonds. A. & E. Encyclo. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

MUNICIPALITY. The body of officers taken collectively, belonging to a city, who are appointed to manage its affairs and defend its interests.

MUNICIPIUM. In Roman Law. A free town which retained its original right of self-government, but whose inhabitants also acquired certain rights of Roman citizens. Morey, Rom. L. 51. See MUNICIPAL.

A municipal town. Down to the reduction of Latium, these towns enjoyed, under a treaty of equal alliance, the private rights of Roman citizenship at Rome; the citizens of such towns might exercise these rights, and were liable to the corresponding obligations. After the subjugation of Latium, the foreign policy of the municipal towns (municipia) was merged in the supremacy of Rome, and the citizens either possessed the private citizenship alone, or, being enrolled in a Roman tribe, were able to exercise the full citizenship at Rome. In both cases the municipal towns were self-governed, and their imperial obligations were fixed by the terms of their treaties of alliance. Hunter, Rom. L. 32.

MUNIMENTS. The instruments of writing and written evidences which the owner of lands, possessions, or inheritances has, by which he is enabled to defend the title of his estate. Termes de la Ley; Co. 3d Inst. 170. Cathedrals, collegiate churches, etc., sometimes have a muniment house, where the seal, evidences, charter, etc., of such cathedral are kept. Cowel.

MUNUS. A gift; an office; a benefice, or feud. A gladiatorial show or spectacle. Calvinus, Lex.; Du Cange.

MURAGE. A toll formerly levied in England for repairing or building public walls.

MURAL MONUMENTS. Monuments made in walls.

Owing to the difficulty or impossibility of removing them, secondary evidence may be given of inscriptions on walls, fixed tables, gravestones, and the like. 2 Stark. 274.

MURDER. In Criminal Law. The wilful killing of any subject whatever, with malice aforethought, whether the person slain shall be an Englishman or a foreigner. Hawk. Pl. C. b. 1, c. 13, s. 8. Russell says, the killing of any person under the king's peace, with malice prepenso or aforethought, either express, or implied by law. 1 Russ. Cr. 421; 5 Cush. 804; Archb. Cr. Fr. & Pl. 727 note; Whart. Cr. L. 808. When a person of sound mind and discretion unlawfully killeth any reasonable creature in being, and under the king's peace, with malice aforethought, either express or implied. Co. 3d Inst. 47.

The latter definition, which has been adopted by Blackstone, 4 Com. 195; 3 Chitty, Cr. Law, 794, and others, has been severely criticised. What, it has been asked, are sound mind and discretion? What has soundness of memory to do with the act? Is it ever so imperfect, how does it effect the guilt? If discretion is necessary, can the crime ever be committed? For is it not the highest indiscretion in a man to take the life of another, and thereby expose his own? If the person killed be an idiot or a newborn infant, is he a reasonable creature? Who is in the king's peace? What is malice aforethought? Can there be malice aforethought? Livingston, Pen. Law, 166. It is, however, apparent that some of the criticisms are merely verbal, and others are answered by the construction given in the various cases to the requirements of the definition. See, especially, 5 Cush. 804.

According to Coke's definition, there must be Arer, sound mind and memory in the agent. By this it is understood there must be a will and legal discretion. Second, an actual killing; but it is not necessary that it should be caused by direct violence; it is sufficient if the acts done apparently endanger life, and eventually prove fatal. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 81, s. 4; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 431; 1 Ashm. 289; 9 C. & P. 356. Third, the party killed must have been a reasonable being, alive in the king's peace. To constitute a birth, so as to make the killing of a child murder, the whole body must be detached from that of the mother; but if it has come fully forth, but is still connected by the umbilical cord, such killing will be murder; 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1728, note. Feticide would not be such a killing; he must have been in rerum natura. Fourth, malice, either express or implied. It is this circumstance which distinguishes murder from every description of homicide. 88 Ala. 26. See MALICE.

Murder may be committed as the result of some illegal act, whether the design to take life is actually present or not; 30 S. C. 74. Wilful omission of duty resulting in death is murder, where the exposure or neglect clearly shows danger to life; 8 Mont. 95. It being contrary to the law of the land to commit suicide, if two persons meet together and agree so to do, and one of them dies, the other is guilty of murder; 10 Crim. L. Mag. 562. One who fires with deliberate purpose of killing A., and kills B., is as guilty as if he had killed A.; 160 Pa. 451; 69 Me. 163; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 563; but see 100 Mich. 518; obstructing a railroad track, by which a human being is killed, is murder in the first degree; 59 Ala. 98.

In some of the states, by legislative enactments, murder has been divided into degrees. In Pennsylvania, by the act of April 23, 1794, "all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, or by lying in wait, or by any other kind of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, shall be deemed murder of the first degree; and all other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder of the second degree; and the jury before whom any person indicted for murder shall be tried shall, if they find the person guilty thereof, ascertain in their verdict whether it be murder of the first or second degree; but if such person shall be convicted by confession, the court shall proceed, by examination of witnesses, to determine the degree of the crime, and give sentence accordingly." Many decisions have been made under this act, to which the reader is referred. See Whart. Cr. Law.

Similar enactments have been made in many other states; 8 Yerg. 283; 6 Rand. 721; 28 Ind. 231; 49 N. H. 899; Wright 20; 8 Mont. 110; 97 Mo. 31; 73 Ia. 32; 25 Tex. App. 681; 32 Fla. 482; 77 Va. 284; 101 Mass. 1.

The power of a state to punish crimes is limited to such as are committed within its territory, and consequently it cannot provide for the punishment, as crimes, of acts committed beyond the state boundary; 2 Park. Cr. Rep. 590; 36 Miss. 593; Cooley, Const. Lim. [128]; but if the ultimate and injurious result of an unlawful act committed outside of a state is effected within it, the perpetrator may be punished by it as an offender; id.; and it was held constitutional to punish in Michigan a homicide committed by a mortal blow in Canada waters from which death resulted in the state; 8 Mich. 320. See Cooley, Const. Lim. [128]. See also 16 Wis. 899; 85 U. C. 603. A murder committed on a United States battleship lying within territory ceded to the United States by New York, is triable in the United States court for the Southern District of New York; 64 Fed. Rep. 622. See JURISDICTION.

A question much discussed is whether a person who commits murder may take property by will or descent from his victim.

It has been held that a child who murdered a parent was not thereby debarred of his heirship; 170 Pa. 303; 6 Ohio C. C. 357; so of a father who murdered his daughter; 41 Neb. 681, reversing 81 Id. 61; a woman who murdered her husband; [1892] 1 Q. B. 147; and one who was an accessory to her husband's murder was held entitled to dower; 100 N. C. 340. In one case the contrary view was taken, and it was held that the devise was not rendered void, but equity might interfere to deprive the devisee of the fruits of his crime, but that his petition to compel payment of his distributive share would not be heard until after his trial on the indictment; 116 N. Y. 506. Neither the beneficiary in a life insurance policy, who has feloniously killed the assured, nor his assignee can recover on it; 117 U. S. 591. This was also held in [1892] 1 Q. B. 147, supra, where, although the wife could not take the money as a beneficiary, it passed to her as the legal representative of the assured as part of his estate.

See address of Judge Leslie W. Russell before the New York State Bar Association, Jan., 1896, reviewing these cases; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1890.

See, generally, Bishop, Gabbett, Russell, Wharton, Cri. Law; Roscoe, Cri. Ev.; Archb. Cri. Pra.; Hawkins, Hale, Pleas of the Crown.

IN PLEADING. In an indictment for murder, it must be charged that the prisoner "did kill and murder" the deceased; and unless the word murder be introduced into the charge, the indictment will be taken to charge manslaughter only; Bish. Cr. Prac. § 548; Fost. Cr. Law 424; Yelv. 205; *1 Chitty, Cr. Law *243*, and the authorities and cases there cited.

MURDERUM. In Old English Law. During the times of the Danes, and afterwards till the reign of Edward III., murder was the killing of a man in a secret manner; and in that it differed from simple homicide.

When a man was thus killed, and he was unknown, the laws of de moute he was presumed to be a Dane, and the vill was compelled to pay forty marks for his death. After the conquest, a similar law was made in favor of Frenchmen, which was abolished by 8 Edw. III.

The fine formerly imposed in England upon a person who had committed homicide per infortunio or se defendendo. Prin. Pen. Law 219, note.

See HEAT OF PASSION.

MURORUM OPERATIO. The service of work and labor done by inhabitants and adjoining tenants in building or repairing the walls of a city or castle. Cowel.

MURTHURUM. In Old Scotch Law. Murder.

MUSICAL COMPOSITION. The acts of congress of February 3, 1881, and July 8, 1870, authorize the granting of a copyright for a musical composition. A question was formerly agitated whether a composition published on a single sheet of paper was to be considered a book; and it was decided in the affirmative; 2 Campb. 28, n.; 11 East 244. Not only an original composition, but any substantially new arrangement or adaptation of an old piece of music, is a proper subject of copyright; Taney, Dec. 72; L. R. 2 C. P. 340; S. C. 3 id. 228; 2 Blatchf. 39; 7 C. B. 4; Drone, Copyright 175. See COPYRIGHT.

MUSTER. To collect together and exhibit soldiers and their arms. To employ recruits, and put their names down in a book to enroll them. In the latter sense the term implies that the persons mustered are not already in the service; 8 Allen 490. The same term is applied to a list of soldiers in the service of a government. Articles of War, R. S. § 1342.

MUSTER-ROLL. A written document containing the names, ages, quality, place of residence, and, above all, place of birth, of every person of the ship's company. It is of great use in ascertaining the ship's neutrality. Marsh. Ins. p. 407; Jacobson, Sea Laws 161; 2 Wash. C. C. 201.

MUSTIZO. A name given to the issue of an Indian and a negro. Dudl. S. C. 174.

MUTATION. In French Law. This term is synonymous with change, and is particularly applied to designate the change which takes place in the property of a thing in its transmission from one person to another. Permutation therefore happens when the owner of the thing sells, exchanges, or gives it. It is nearly synonymous with transfer. Merlin, Répert.

MUTATION OF LIBEL. In Practice. An amendment allowed to a libel, by which there is an alteration of the substance of the libel, as by propounding a new cause of action, or asking one thing instead of another. Law, Eccl. Law 165-167; 1 Paine 435; 1 Gall. 123; 1 Wheat. 261.

MUTATIS MUTANDIS (Lat.). The necessary changes. This is a phrase of frequent practical occurrence, meaning that matters or things are generally the same, but to be altered when necessary, as to names, offices, and the like.

MUTE (mutus). When a prisoner upon his arraignment totally refuses to answer, insists upon mere frivolous pretences, or refuses to put himself upon the country, after pleading not guilty, he is said to stand mute.

In the case of the United States v. Hare et al., Circuit Court, Maryland Dist., May sessions, 1818, the prisoner standing mute was considered as if he had pleaded not guilty. See 19 Blatch. 251; 13 Fed. Rep. 27; 48 Ark. 39. In consequence an act of congress of March 8, 1835, provided that if any person, in case of an offence not capital, shall stand mute, the trial shall proceed as upon a plea of not guilty. A similar provision is to be found in the laws of many states, and, in England, the same practice is adopted by the court.

In former times, in England, the terrible punishment or sentence of penance or peine (probably a corrupted abbreviation of prison) fort et dure was inflicted where a prisoner would not plead, and stood obstinately mute. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE. Prisoners sometimes suffered death in this way to save their property from forfeiture. In treason, petit felony, and misdemeanors, however, wilfully standing mute was equivalent to a conviction, and the same punishment might be imposed. Giles Corey, accused of witchcraft, was perhaps the only person pressed to death in America for refusing to plead. 8 Bancroft's Hist. U. S. 93. See DEAF AND DUMB.

MUTILLATION. In Criminal Law. The depriving a man of the use of any of those limbs which may be useful to him in fight, the loss of which amounts to mayhem. 1 Bla. Com. 130. See MAYHEM.

MUTINY. In Criminal Law. The unlawful resistance of a superior officer, or the raising of commotions and disturbances on board of a ship against the authority of its commander, or in the army in opposition to the authority of the officers; a sedition; a revolt. See Whart. Cr. L. § 1876.

By the act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, it is enacted as follows: Article 25. Any officer or soldier, who begins, excites, or causes, or joins in, any mutiny or sedition in any troop or company in the service of the United States, or in any party, or post, detachment, or guard, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as a court-martial shall direct. Article 26. Any officer or soldier who, being present at any mutiny or sedition, does not use his utmost endeavors to suppress the same, or, having knowledge of any intended mutiny, does not without delay give information thereof to his commanding officer, shall be punished by death, or suffer such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

And by the act for the better government of the navy of the United States, it is enacted as follows: Article 4. Any person in the naval service who makes, or attempts to make, any mutinous assembly, or, being witness to or present at any mutiny, does not do his utmost to suppress it, or knowledge of any mutinous assembly, or of any intended mutiny, does not immediately communicate his knowledge to his superior or commanding officer, shall suffer death or such other punishment as a court-martial may adjudge. And any person as aforesaid, who utters any seditious or mutinous words, or joins in or abets any combination to weaken the lawful authority of, or lessen the respect due to, his commanding officer, or treats his superior officer with contempt, or is disrespectful to him, while in the execution of his office, may be punished by such punishment as a court-martial may adjudge. R. S. § 1634.

Mutiny, revolt, and the endeavor to make a revolt or mutiny, on board merchant-vessels, are made criminal, and a punishment provided for them; R. S. § 4506; 2 Curt. C. C. 225; 1 Woodb. & M. 306; 2 Sumn. C. C. 582.

MUTINY ACT. In English Law. A statute, annually passed, to punish mutiny and desertion, and for the better payment of the army and their quarters. It was first passed 12th of April, 1689. The passage of this bill was the only provision for the payment of the army. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 416, 417, n. In 1879, the army discipline act, 42 and 43 Vict., s. c. 33, consolidated the provisions of the mutiny act with the articles of war.

MUTUAL. Proceeding from both sides; reciprocal; interchanged.

MUTUAL ACCOUNTS. Such as contain mutual credits between the parties; or an existing credit on one side which constitutes a ground for credit on the other, or where there is an understanding that mutual debts shall be a set-off pro tanto, between the parties. 27 Ark. 343. Such accounts, of however long standing, are not barred by the statute of limitations, if there be any items within the prescribed limit; 6 Term 189; Ang. Lim. 138. See MERCHANTS' ACCOUNTS; LIMITATIONS.

MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATIONS. See BENEFICIAL SOCIETIES; INSURANCE. ASSESSMENT INSURANCE.

MUTUAL CONSENT. Mutual consent is of the essence of every contract, and therefore it must always exist, in legal contemplation, at the moment when the contract is made. See Add. Contr. 13. It never, however, is the subject of direct allegation or proof, partly because it is generally incapable of direct proof, and partly because every contract is made by acts performed. Proof of the necessary acts carries with it presumptive proof of mutual consent. Thus, if two separate agreements be drawn up, signed and sealed, each of them purporting to be a contract between A. and B., and the parties, intending to deliver one of the instruments, deliver the other by mistake, there is no contract made; Langd. Contr. 198. Where the plaintiff's acceptance of the defendant's offer inadvertently made a slight change in a date, there was no contract, because there had not been mutual consent; 4 Bing. 653. Mutual consent must extend to the consideration as well as to the promise; Langd. Contr. 82.

MUTUAL CREDITS. Credits given by two persons mutually, i. e. each giving credit to the other. It is a more extensive phrase than mutual debts. Thus, the sum credited by one may be due at once, that by the other payable in futuro; yet the credits are mutual, though the transaction would not come within the meaning of mutual debts; 7 Term 378. And it is not necessary that there should be intent to trust each other; thus, where an acceptance of A. came into the hands of B, who bought goods of A, not knowing the acceptance to be in B's hands, it was held a mutual credit; 3 Term 507, n.; 3 Ves. 65; 8 Taunt. 156, 499; 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 179; 26 Barb. 310; 4 Gray 284; 9 N. J. Eq. 44; 7 D. & E. 378. See 85 N. Y. 590; 9 N. J. Eq. 49.

MUTUAL INSURANCE. That form of insurance in which each person insured becomes a member of the company, and the members reciprocally engage to indemnify each other against losses, any loss being met by an assessment laid upon all the members. See INSURANCE.

MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

Stock Insurance Companies. Such companies differ essentially from stock insurance companies. The former need many by-laws and conditions that are not required in stock companies, and each person who insures therein becomes a member of the association. A mutual company is also defined as one wherein the members constitute both insurer and insured, where the members all contribute by a system of assessments, to the creation of a fund from which all losses and liabilities are paid, and wherein the profits are divided among themselves in proportion to their interests. (171 Ind. 296.) 1 Joyce 831, 2nd ed.

MUTUAL PROMISES. Promises simultaneously made by two parties to each other, each promise being the consideration of the other. Ans. Contr. 72; 1 Pars. Contr. 484; Hob. 88; 14 M. & W. 855; Add. Contr. 18. If one of the promises be voidable, it will yet be good consideration, but not if void; Story, Contr. § 81; 2 Steph. Com. 114.

MUTUALITY. Reciprocity; an acting in return. Webster, Dict.; Add. Contr. 623; 9th ed. 13, 14; 26 Md. 37. See 83 Ky. 871.

MUTUARY. A person who borrows personal chattels to be consumed by him and returned to the lender in kind; the person who receives the benefit arising from the contract of mutuum. Story, Bailm. § 47.

MUTUATUS. A loan of money. See Gilbert, Com. Pleas 5.

A borrowing. Burrill; 2 Arch. Pr. 25. From Latin, mutuari, to borrow. Id.

MUTUUM. A loan of personal chattels to be consumed by the borrower and to be returned to the lender in kind and quantity; as, a loan of corn, wine, or money which is to be used or consumed, and is to be replaced by other corn, wine, or money. Story, Bailm. § 228; Edw. Bailm. § 120; Add. Contr. 724. See LOAN FOR USE.

MYSTERY (said to be derived from the French mestier, now written metier, a trade). A trade, art, or occupation. Co. 2d Inst. 668.

Masters frequently bind themselves in the indentures with their apprentices to teach them their art, trade, and mystery. See Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 23, s. 11.

MYSTIC TESTAMENT. A will placed in a sealed envelope. La. Civ. Code, art. 1567; 5 Mart. La. 182; Schoul. Wills. § 9; 5 La. 396.

N. E. I. See NON EST INVENTUS; FOUND.

NAAM. See NAMUM.

NABOB. Originally the governor of a province under the Mogul government of Hindostan, whence it became a mere title of any man of high rank, upon whom it was conferred without any office being attached. Wils. Gloss; Whart.

NAIF. See NEIF.

NAIL. A measure of length, equal to two inches and a quarter. See MEASURE.

NAIL COUSINS. See SIB-SHIP.

NAKED. This word is used in a metaphorical sense to denote that a thing is not complete, and for want of some quality it is either without power or it possesses a limited power. A naked contract is one made without consideration, and for that reason it is void. See CONSIDERATION. A naked authority is one given without any right in the agent, and wholly for the benefit of the principal. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1302. See NUDUM FACTUM.

NAKED TRUST. A dry or passive trust; one which requires no action on the part of the trustee, beyond turning over money or property to the cestui que trust. See TRUST.

NAKED TRUSTEE. See TRUSTEE.

NAM. Distress; seizure. Anc. Inst. Eng. See NAMUM.

NAMATION. The act of distraining or taking a distress. Cowel. See NAMUM.

NAME. One or more words used to distinguish a particular individual: as Socrates, Benjamin Franklin.

Names are Christian, as Benjamin, or surnames, as Franklin. One Christian name only is recognized in law; 1 Ld. Raym. 562; Bacon, Abr. Misnomer (A); 7 Coll. l. 69; 5 Johns. 84; though two or more names usually kept separate, as John and Peter, may undoubtedly be compounded, so as to form in contemplation of law but one; 5 Term 195. An initial is not part of a name. See INITIAL. Nor is the title junior (q. v.); nor the prefix Mrs. 13 Vroom 69; 33 Ill. App. 109. But it has been held that where Lewis R. instead of Lewis S. was inserted in a writ of sci. fa. to revive a judgment, the writ was not notice to purchaser for value in a chain of title, in which Lewis S. was the actual name; 1 Sup. Ct. Pa. 198. See 140 Pa. 335.

The name of a corporation is said to be "the very being of the constitution;" Bac. Abr. Corp. (C); 30 Ala. 604; and in general a corporation must contract and sue and be sued in its corporate name; 3 Johns. 295; 19 Ill. 300; 4 Rand. 359.

In the name of a corporation, which frequently consists of several descriptive words, the transposition, omission, or alteration of some of them may make no essential difference in the sense; 10 N. H. 124; 1 B. & Ald. 699; 10 Mass. 300; see 87 Ga. 734; if there is no possibility of mistaking the identity of the corporation; 12 La. 444. See 20 Me. 41; 2 Va. Cas. 362; 16 Mass. 141; 12 S. & R. 389.

A corporation, like an individual, may take a name by reputation; 2 N. H. 310; 10 Mass. 300; or may acquire it by usage; it is not indispensable that the name should be given by the charter; 30 Ala. 604; see 2 McLean 195; and after its name has been changed, it may continue under the old name and thus, by usage, regain the latter and sue thereunder; 25 N. J. Eq. 90. But it is held that a change of corporate name requires statutory authority, whether done directly or by user, though it may acquire a name by user when not given at incorporation; 132 Ill. 32; such change does not in any way affect its identity or rights; and an action against it by its former name cannot be defeated by showing the change, if the membership remains the same; 83 Va. 788. When a corporation is sued, a mistake in the name, in words and syllables, but not in substance, will not be regarded, unless pleaded in abatement; but if the mistake be in substance, the suit cannot be regarded as against the corporation; 1 B. & P. 39. Where the name in a contract in suit differed from the name in the declaration, but the identity was apparent, the variance was held not to constitute a defence; 31 Me. 290. There is said to be a distinction between a misnomer which incorrectly names, but correctly describes, a corporation and the statement in the pleading of an entirely different party: the former is curable by amendment, the latter is not; 30 Ala. 650. A grant to a corporation by the wrong name is good if the corporation really intended be apparent; 2 Kent 292; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 179; so of a contract; 6 S. & R. 12; and of a gift by will; 11 Eng. L. & Eq. 191. If a corporation conveys by the wrong name it cannot defeat its grant, if it has received the consideration; 132 Ill. 32.

As to the protection of a corporation, in the use of its corporate name, see Moraw. Priv. Corp. § 355; TRADE-MARK.

See GOOD-WILL; PARTNERSHIP; PARTNERS; MISNOMER.

The real name of a party to be arrested must be inserted in the warrant, if known; 8 East 828; 6 Cow. 456; 9 Wend. 320; if unknown, some description must be given; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 39; with the reason for the omission; 1 Mood. & M. 281.

Proof may be given that the maker of an instrument habitually applied a nickname or peculiar designation used therein to a particular person or thing; 26 Ohio St. 004. As to mistakes in devises, see LEGACY. As to the use of names having the same sound, see IDEM SONANS; 1 Over. 434. As to the effect of using a name having the same derivation, see 2 Rolle, Abr. 135; 1 Wash. C. C. 285. At common law one could change his name; 10 Fed. Rep. 894; 123 Mass. 415; 3 B. & Ald. 544; and a person not having a fraudulent or criminal purpose in so doing may enter into a contract by any name he may choose to assume; 74 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 147; 38 Minn. 361; 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 567; 31 N. C. 184; 31 Mo. 138. Under this rule, legal proceedings against a married woman under an assumed name have been held good after judgment; 19 Kan. 522; and obligations incurred by or with third parties under her maiden name are mutually binding; 78 Wis. 046; 96 Cal. 609; see Schoul. Dom. Rel. 40; although until a decree in divorce giving a married woman leave to resume her maiden name goes into effect, or widowhood is succeeded by a new marriage, she keeps her former husband's surname; 2 P. D. 263.

A person, not having a fraudulent or criminal purpose in doing so, may enter into a contract by any name he may choose to assume; it is only a question of identity; 74 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 147; 41 N. Y. Super. 507. A grant of land under an assumed name will pass title; and evidence is admissible to prove identity; 38 Minn. 361.

When a person uses a name in making a contract under seal, he will not be permitted to say that it is not his name: as, if he sign and seal a bond "A and B" (being his own and his partner's name), and he had no authority from his partner to make such a deed, he cannot deny that his name is A and B; 1 T. Raym. 2; 1 Salk. 214. And if a man describes himself in the body of a deed by the name of James, and signs it John, he cannot, on being sued by the latter name, plead that his name is James; 3 Taunt. 505; Cro. Eliz. 897, n. a. See 3 P. & D. 271; 11 Ad. & E. 594; 19 Abb. N. C. 123. A man may sue by the name by which he has been known from childhood, instead of by that given him by his parents; 31 Wkly. Law Bul. 102.

The right to the exclusive use of a name in connection with a trade or business is familiar to the law; and any person using that name, after a relative right of this description has been acquired by another, is considered guilty of a fraud, or at least an invasion of another's rights, and renders himself liable to an action, or he may be restrained from the use of the name by injunction. But the mere assumption of a name which is the patronymic of a family by a stranger who has never been called by that name is a grievance to the family for which the law affords no redress; L. R. 2 P. C. 441. See 11 Beav. 112; L. R. 2 Ch. 307. A name may be a trade-mark; L. R. 10 Ch. D. 436; 1 Eq. 518; 13 Beav. 209; 13 Am. Rep. 111. A person cannot, however, have an exclusive right of trade-mark in a name as against all others bearing the same name, and honestly using the name in competition, unless the defendant uses the same brand or stamp in connection with the name; 122 Mass. 139; 96 U. S. 245; 50 Barb. 236. Nor in the name of the city in which a thing is made; 44 Fed. Rep. 277. But such exclusive right to a name may be acquired as against a corporation called by the same name. See 11 Cent. L. J. 3; Poll. Torts 152; ELECTION; TRADE-MARK.

NAMED. Mentioned nominatim, if not by all their names, by some at least, either Christian or surnames. 22 L. J. Ch. 393. It is sometimes used, but only in a secondary sense, as meaning mentioned or referred to. 34 S. J. 129.

NAMELY. A difference, in grammatical sense, in strictness exists between the words namely and including. Namely imports interpretation, i. e. indicates what is included in the previous term; but including imports addition, i. e. indicates something not included. 2 Jarm. Wills 222.

NAMUM. An old word which signifies the taking or distraining another person's movable goods. 2 Inst. 140; 3 Bl. Com. 149. A distress. Dalrymple, Feud. Fr. 113.

NAMUM VETITUM. The unjust taking of another person's cattle and driving them to an unlawful place, under pretence of damage having been done by them, in which case the owner may demand satisfaction for the injury. Cowel.

NANTISSEMENT. In French Law. The contract of pledge; if of a movable, it is called gago, and if of an immovable, antichrèse; Brown, Dict.

NARR. (an abbreviation of the word narratio). A declaration in a cause.

NARRATIO. A common-law name for the plaintiff's count or declaration as being a narrative of facts on which he relies.

NARRATIVE CLAUSE. In Scotch Law. The first clause in an original charter which follows immediately after the name and designation of the grantor. Ersk. Prin. 129.

NARRATOR. A pleader who draws narrs. Serviens narrator, a sergeant-at-law. Flota, l. 2, c. 37. O'coleto.

NARROW SEAS. In English Law. Those seas which adjoin the coast of England. Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (B 3).

NASCITURUS. Not yet born. This term is applied in marriage settlements to the unborn children of a particular marriage, natus (born) being used to designate those already born.

NATALE. The state or condition of a man acquired by birth.

NATIO. A native place. Cowel.

NATION. An independent body politic. A society of men united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage by the joint efforts of their combined strength.

But every combination of men who govern themselves independently of all others will not be considered a nation; a body of pirates, for example, who govern themselves, is not a nation. To constitute a nation, another ingredient is required. The body thus formed must respect other nations in general, and each of its members in particular. Such a society has its affairs and interests; it deliberates and takes resolutions in common,—thus becoming a moral person, who possesses an understanding and will and is susceptible of obligations and rights. Vattel, Prelim. §§ 1, 2; 5 Pet. 52.

It belongs to the government to declare whether they will consider a colony which has thrown off the yoke of the mother-country as an independent state; and until the government have decided on the question, courts of justice are bound to consider the ancient state of things as remaining unchanged; 1 Johns. Ch. 543; 18 Johns. 141, 561. See 5 Pet. 1; 1 Kent 22.

In American constitutional law the word state is applied to the several members of the American Union, while the word nation is applied to the whole body of the people embraced within the jurisdiction of the federal government; Cooley, Const. Lim. See 7 Wall. 720. See FIVE CIVILIZED NATIONS.

NATIONAL. Belonging to, affecting, or pertaining to, a particular nation; as, national domicil, the national government. Often opposed to State, and nearly synonymous with Federal; as, in national bank (q. v.), or national banking association. Anderson.

NATIONAL BANKS. Banks created and governed under the provisions of the "National Bank Act."

They are private corporations organized under a general law of congress, by individual stockholders, with their own capital, for private gain, and managed by officers, agents, and employees of their own selection. They constitute no part of any branch of the government of the United States, and whatever public benefit they contribute to the country in return for grants and privileges conferred upon them by statute, is of a general nature arising from their business relations to the people through individual citizens, and not as direct representatives of the state as a body politic in exercising its legal and constitutional functions; 12 Ct. Cl. 281; but they are instruments designed to aid the government in an important branch of the public service; 91 U. S. 29. See 164 U. S. 347. Congress in the exercise of an undisputed constitutional power to provide a currency for the whole country, may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation, and to that end may restrain the circulation of any notes not issued under its authority; 8 Wall. 548.

Any number of persons, not less than five, may organize a national bank. They must sign, acknowledge before a court of record or notary public, and transmit to the comptroller of the currency, an organization certificate, containing the name of the bank, its place of business, the amount of capital stock and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, the names and residences of the shareholders, and the number of shares held by them, and that the applicants desire to avail themselves of the act of congress. The comptroller decides whether the bank is lawfully entitled to begin business; see 19 Mich. 196; if he so finds, his certificate of this fact must be published in a newspaper of the place where the bank is to do business for sixty days.

One hundred thousand dollars is the minimum capital allowed, except in places not exceeding 6,000 inhabitants, when, by consent of the comptroller, the capital may be $50,000; where the population exceeds 50,000 the capital must be at least $200,000. The term capital does not refer to borrowed money, but to the property or moneys of the bank permanently invested in its business; 21 Wall. 284. The capital stock is divided into shares of $100 each, which are personal property. At least fifty per cent. thereof must be paid in before organization, and the rest in monthly instalments of ten per cent. each. The stock of stockholders not paying these instalments may be sold, on notice; stockholders are individually responsible, in addition to what they have invested in their shares, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank, to the extent of their stock at its par value. This liability is several and not joint; 8 Wall. 505. The estate of a deceased owner of bank stock is liable to an assessment levied against his executor in consequence of the failure of the bank after his death; 60 Fed. Rep. 326; 121 U. S. 27.

Upon its organization a national bank has the usual corporate powers, also the right of succession for twenty years, and the power to exercise, by its board of directors or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, etc.; by receiving deposits, by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of title 62 of the Revised Statutes.

They have not the same rights in all the states. For all practical purposes they exercise their functions only within the limits of the state in which they are located and they have no authority to carry on business outside those limits; 2 McCrary 95; 6 Hun 71.

The powers of national banks are to be measured by the act creating them; 18 Wall. 589; 72 Pa. 456; 63 Mo. 329; 139 U. S. 67; the words of the act above quoted, "by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, etc.," are not to be read as limiting the mode of exercising the "incidental powers" necessary to carry on the business of banking, but as descriptive of the kind of business which is authorized; 22 Ohio St. 516. A national bank may buy negotiable notes and bills of exchange; 33 Minn. 40; 23 S. C. 399; 20 Kan. 440. This power, it has been held, simply implies an authority to realize upon such commercial paper as the bank may receive in the lawful conduct of its business, by negotiating, selling, and transferring it by means of a re-discount obtained or otherwise. It gives no implied authority to speculate or traffic in paper of this character or in financial securities of any description; 24 Minn. 140; 52 Md. 78. In the last case, by a divided court, the opinion was qualified by the remark that a national bank might invest its surplus capital in notes. The purchasing and discounting of paper has been held to be only a mode of loaning money; 26 Ohio 141; but it cannot discount a conditional note; 27 Alb. L. J. 447. It may collect notes; 9 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 709; deal in national bonds; 31 La. 69; 69 N. Y. 382; and own coupons on state bonds; 16 Blatch. 58; and it may deal in stocks; 12 Hun 97; but the tendency of the decisions is contra; 89 Pa. 824; 72 id. 456; 92 U. S.

122; 42 Md. 581; 3 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 124. It may lend on collateral security, including United States bonds; 44 Md. 47; or the stock of another national bank; 99 U. S. 628; or a warehouse receipt for merchandise; 40 Ohio 176; or a locomotive; 8 Biss. 158; 1 Hughes 101; but it may not lend its credit; 3 id. 487; 55 Fed. Rep. 465. It may borrow money on its own notes, and pledge its assets for its repayment; 41 Bank. Mag. 131. It may, in a fair and bona fide compromise of a contested claim against it, growing out of a legitimate banking transaction, pay a larger sum than would have been exacted in satisfaction of a demand, so as to obtain by the arrangement a transfer of stocks, if done in the belief that by turning the stocks into money under more favorable circumstances a loss which would otherwise accrue from the transaction might be averted or diminished; 92 U. S. 122, affirming 39 Md. 600.

It has authority to receive special deposits and is responsible for their loss if occasioned by gross negligence; 100 U. S. 699, affirming 79 Pa. 106; 26 Ia. 563; 99 Mass. 605; 58 Ga. 369; 33 Ohio 105; 80 N. Y. 82, affirming 17 Hun 419; 29 Fed. Rep. 498. See contra, 47 Vt. 546; 50 id. 388.

It may take legal proceedings to recover stolen property for itself or for depositors, and will be held responsible for lack of diligence, skill, and care in performing such an undertaking; 119 U. S. 861, affirming 15 Fed. Rep. 428.

A national bank has no power to indorse a note for compensation; 27 Hun 109; but, should it do so, only the government may object; id., citing 82 N. Y. 291; 96 U. S. 640; 84 N. Y. 190; 103 U. S. 99; but it may guarantee a note; 101 U. S. 183. It may not receive deposits when insolvent; 99 N. Y. 131. It cannot be garnished for a deposit of a trust estate or pay out funds of a bankrupt except upon a warrant of an assignee in bankruptcy of the district or by the register in bankruptcy of the district; 6 Thomp. & C. 346.

National banks may purchase, hold, and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others: 1. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business. 2. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security, for debts previously contracted. 3. Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings. 4. Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts due to it; title in the latter case to be held for no longer than five years.

It is now settled that a bank may lawfully take a mortgage to secure future indebtedness; 98 N. Y. 289; 31 Gratt. 228; 71 Mo. 228; 94 Pa. 64; 78 Ind. 19; 85 N. C. 240; 94 Ill. 349. Such a loan of money on real estate security by a national bank is valid between the parties; 98 U. S. 621, reversing 62 Mo. 329; contra, 72 Pa. 456; 87 Ill. 151; and that it had so loaned money in violation of the prohibition of the national banking law does not give the debtor a right to object; the United States alone can complain; 45 La. Ann. 75; 103 U. S. 99; 112 id. 489. It may take a purchase-money mortgage on real estate sold by it; 29 La. Ann. 855; and it may purchase real estate at a judgment sale; 70 Ind. 106; 112 U. S. 405; 120 Mass. 153; 88 Ill. 352; and a prior mortgage if needful to protect the interest of the bank; 90 Ind. 382. A converted bank may take real estate belonging to it whilst it was a state bank; 9 Neb. 316; it may accept personal property in payment upon the sale of real estate belonging to it; 78 Ia. 145; and the assignment of a mortgage on land to secure a loan made at the time of the assignment; 7 Wash. 261.

A transfer of stock in a national bank which is insolvent at the time, made with an intent to avoid liability, where the transferee has reason to believe that the bank is insolvent, will not relieve the transferor from the residuary liability to pay the debt of the bank, and such a transfer may be treated by the receiver as operative without regard to the financial condition of the transferee; but if the bank is solvent at the time of the transfer the motive with which it is made is immaterial; 169 U. S. 1.

When not defined by a board of directors the duties of the president and cashier are only such as may be incident to their offices respectively in their very nature, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the act of incorporation; 23 Gratt. 53. Neither of these officers, nor both acting together, can give up a debt or liability to the bank, nor make any admissions which would release the maker of a note due to the bank from his legal responsibility; id.; 6 Pet. 51; 8 id. 13; 50 How. Pr. 447. The president has no power to sell or surrender securities and receive others of an inferior value; 33 Mich. 520. Ordinarily his authority is very limited; he may bring actions at law and employ counsel for the purpose of protecting the rights of the bank, but he is not its executive officer nor has he charge of its money operations. He has no more power of management nor disposal of the property of the corporation than any other member of the board of directors unless further powers are conferred upon him by the charter of the bank or by the action of the managing board; 21 Neb. 280. He may not make an agreement binding on the bank and embodying a transaction not within the usual course of business of the bank; 89 Pa. 324; but see 7 Neb. 201; 9 Biss. 253.

A bank is liable upon notes, executed by it through its cashier, for loans made by another bank in an amount not so great as to create suspicion, where the actual management of the bank was left entirely to such cashier, and the negotiation and all the correspondence were such as might lead the officers of the lending bank to believe that he was acting on authority and in good faith and honest intention, though the money was used by him for his own individual purposes, and the signature of the president was forged; 80 Fed. Rep. 859; but where the affairs of a national bank were managed entirely by the cashier, who was universally believed to be honest and capable, but whose dishonesty and reckless management resulted in wrecking the bank, the president and directors, most of whom were farmers knowing little of banking, were not guilty of negligence so as to be liable for losses to creditors because they failed to examine the books, the statements being prepared and furnished them by the cashier, and reporting the bank to be in a prosperous condition, and there being no grounds of suspicion known to them; 82 Fed. Rep. 181, following 141 U. S. 132.

The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of all suits by or against national banks established in the district for which the court is held; R. S. § 629; see 3 Dill. 298; irrespective of the amount in controversy or the citizenship of the parties; Fed. Cas. No. 9670. A national bank may bring suit in the circuit court out of its district, against a citizen of the district where the court sits; 8 Blatch. 137; 9 Nev. 134. A national bank may waive its right to be sued in its own district; 2 Conn. 293; and state courts have jurisdiction of suits brought by national banks; 49 Vt. 1; 93 U. S. 130; but this must be a state court of its locality; 14 Wall. 333; 101 Mass. 240.

Mortgages held by national banks are not subject to taxation by a state; 21 Nev. 404; nor can the stock in a national bank be taxed in any state other than that in which the bank is located; 55 N. J. L. 110.

A national bank may go into liquidation and be closed by a vote of the shareholders of two-thirds of its stock; R. S. § 5220; although it be contrary to the wishes and against the interests of the owners of the minority of the stock; 51 Kan. 254. In case of a failure to pay its circulating notes, the comptroller may appoint a receiver to wind up national banks; R. S. §

State banks may be changed into national banks; the change when made is a transit, and not a creation; see 40 Mo. 140; and does not affect its identity or its right to sue upon obligations or liabilities incurred to it by its former name; 148 U. S. 293. See DEPOSIT; INTEREST; PROXY; RESERVE; BANK.

NATIONAL CHURCH. A church established by law in a country or nation. 25 Gratt. 965.

Usually refers to the Protestant Church of England, of which the sovereign is the head and supreme governor. R. & L. Dict.; 26 Hen. VIII. c. 1.

NATIONAL CURRENCY. Notes issued by national banks and by the government. See CURRENT MONEY; MONEY; LEGAL TENDER.

Not the United States notes or greenbacks. These are a national currency in their nature, more properly than the banking association notes; but "national currency" is generally used to signify the notes authorized by the acts to provide a national currency, and issued on the immediate responsibility of the associations; while greenbacks or treasury notes is the more common designation of the notes issued immediately by the government. In other words, national, as usually applied in America during recent years to currency, distinguishes the currency of banks authorized by the nation from that authorized by state laws, not that issued by the nation from that issued by corporations. Abbott.

NATIONAL DEBT. A sum owing by the government to individuals who have advanced money to it for public purposes, either in anticipation of the produce of the particular branches of the revenue, or on credit of the general power which the government possesses of levying the amount necessary to pay interest for the money borrowed or to repay the principal. See FUNDING SYSTEM.

In England. This national debt is in part funded, and in part unfunded; the former being that which is secured to the national creditor upon the public funds; the latter, that which is not so provided for. The unfunded debt is comparatively but of small amount, and is generally secured by exchequer bills and bonds. Abbott; 2 Steph. Com. 574.

NATIONAL DOMAIN. See LANDS, PUBLIC.

NATIONAL DOMICIL. See DOMICIL.

NATIONAL ENSIGN. The National flag. See FLAG.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT. A government of the people of a single state or nation, united as a community by what is termed the social compact, and possessing complete and perfect supremacy over persons and things so far as they can be made the lawful objects of civil government. A federal government is distinguished from a national government by its being the government of a community of independent and sovereign states united by compact. 6 Ohio St. 393.

NATIONAL GUARD. A name given to the organized militia in some parts of the United States.

NATIONAL LAW. See INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE LAW.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT. An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries. 41 Stat. 305 (Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½, et seq.).

The Eighteenth Amendment, which embodies the National Prohibition Act, became a part of the Constitution on January 16, 1919, when its ratification in the state legislatures was consummated; not on January 29, 1919, when the ratification was proclaimed by the Secretary of State. 256 U. S. 376. As this Amendment, by its own terms, was to go into effect one year after being ratified, it was in force on January 16, 1920. Id.

NATIONAL TREATMENT. See MOST FAVORED NATION TREATMENT.

NATIONALITY. Character, status, or condition with reference to the rights and duties of a person as a member of some one state or nation rather than another.

Nationality may be determined from origin, naturalization, domicile, residence, trade, or other circumstances; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 403.

The term is in frequent use with regard to ships. Nationality determined by one's birthplace or parentage is called nationality of origin; that which results from naturalization, is by acquisition. A woman, upon marriage acquires the nationality of her husband; Morse on Citizenship 142. In feudal times, nationality was determined exclusively by the place of birth, jure soli; but under the laws of Athens and Rome the child followed that of the parents, jure sanguinis. "Of these two tests, the place of birth and the nationality of the father, neither is at present adopted without qualification by British, French, or American law. The laws of these countries exhibit, in fact, different combinations of the two. Great Britain and the United States laying chief stress on the place of birth, while in France the father's nationality determines, though not absolutely and in all cases, that of the child; and this latter theory has found acceptance among other European nations," as Belgium, Bavaria, Prussia, and Spain. Morse, Citizenship 10.

Subject to the act of 1870, English jurists almost unanimously deny the right of expatriation to the extent of a change of primitive allegiance, without the consent of the liege lord. By the laws of France, a Frenchman loses his native character by naturalization in a foreign country, by accepting office under a foreign government without the permission of his own, or by so establishing himself abroad as to show an intention of never returning. In Austria national character is lost by authorized emigration from the empire without the intention of returning, and it is equally lost if effected without permission. In Germany, it is lost by unauthorized emigration except in the case of a German naturalized in the United States. Spain and the Spanish American Republics provide for the loss of Spanish nationality upon the acquisition of a new national character; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 403. The native, national character lost or suspended by a foreign domicile, easily reverts; id. 429.

A general rule is recommended by Westlake: "Legitimate children, wherever born, are regularly members of the state of which their parents form part the moment of their birth; but they may choose as their nationality the place of their birth." See 2 Kent 49; Cock. Nat.; Whart. Conf. Laws; Westlake, Priv. Int. Law. See, generally, ALLEGIANCE; CITIZEN; DENIZEN; DOMICIL; EXPATRIATION; NATURALIZATION. JUS SOLI; JUS SANGUINIS.

NATIONS, LAW OF. See INTERNATIONAL LAW.

NATIVE, NATIVE CITIZEN. A natural-born subject. 1 Bla. Com. 306. Those born in a country, of parents who are citizens. Morse, Citizenship 12. See CITIZEN. There is no distinction between native born as used in the French Extradition treaty and natural born as used in the extradition act; 37 W. R. 269.

NATIVO HABENDO. A writ which lay for a lord when his villen had run away from him. Termes de la Ley.

It was directed to the sheriff, and commanded him to apprehend the villain, and to restore him, together with his goods, to the lord. But if a villain had tarried in a town or ancient demesne lands for the period of a year and a day, without having been claimed by his lord, then the lord could not seize him in either of such places. Abbott; Termes de la Ley.

NATIVUS. See NEXI.

NATURA BREVIVM. A book compiled in the reign of Edward III giving the original writs then in use, succeeded, in the reign of Henry VIII, by the New Natura Brevium, which was compiled by Anthony Fitzherbert. The earlier book thereafter was known as the Old Natura Brevium. Byrme.

NATURAL AFFECTION. The affection which one naturally feels towards those who are nearly allied to him. It sometimes supplies the place of a valuable consideration in contracts; and natural affection is a good consideration in a deed. 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 68. See BARGAIN AND SALE; COVENANT TO STAND SEIZED; CONSIDERATION.

NATURAL ALLEGIANCE. See ALLEGIANCE.

NATURAL-BORN. See NATURALIZATION.

NATURAL-BORN SUBJECT. See NATURALIZATION.

NATURAL CHILDREN. Bastards; children born out of lawful wedlock. But in a statute declaring that adopted children shall have all the rights of "natural" children, the word "natural" was used in the sense of legitimate; 9 Am. L. Reg. 747.

In Civil Law. Children by procreation, as distinguished from children by adoption.

In Louisiana. Illegitimate children who have been adopted by the father. La. Civ. Code, art. 220.

NATURAL DAY. That space of time included between the rising and the setting of the sun. See DAY.

NATURAL DEATH. See DEATH.

NATURAL EQUITY. That which is founded in natural justice, in honesty and right, and which arises ex æquo et bono.

It corresponds precisely with the definition of justice or natural law, which is a constant and perpetual will to give to every man what is his. This kind of equity embraces so wide a range that human tribunals have never attempted to enforce it. Every code of laws has left many matters of natural justice or equity wholly unprovided for, from the difficulty of framing general rules to meet them, from the almost impossibility of enforcing them, and from the doubtful nature of the policy of attempting to give a legal sanction to duties of imperfect obligation, such as charity, gratitude, or kindness. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3720. See EQUITY.

NATURAL FOOL. An idiot; one born without the reasoning powers or a capacity to acquire them.

NATURAL FRUITS. The natural production of trees, bushes, and other plants, for the use of men and animals, and for the reproduction of such trees, bushes, or plants.

This expression is used in contradistinction to artificial or figurative fruits: for example, apples, peaches, and pears, are natural fruits; interest is the fruit of money, and this is artificial.

NATURAL GAS. See GAS.

NATURAL HEIRS. As used in a will and by way of executory devise, they are considered as of the same legal import as "heirs of the body." 19 Conn. 112.

NATURAL INFANCY. A period of non-responsible life, which ends with the seventh year. Whart. Dict.

NATURAL LAW. See LAW OF NATURE.

NATURAL LIBERTY. See LIBERTY.

NATURAL LIFE. The period between birth and natural death. The use of the word natural before life in a sentence of solitary confinement in a state prison for life, is a surplusage and does not affect the sentence; 89 Mich. 70. See DEATH.

NATURAL MERINO. See WOOL.

NATURAL OBLIGATION. One which in honor and conscience binds the person who has contracted it, but which cannot be enforced in a court of justice. Pothier, nn. 173, 191. See OBLIGATION; MORAL OBLIGATION.

NATURAL PERSONS. See PERSON.

NATURAL PRESUMPTIONS. In Evidence. Presumptions of fact; those which depend upon their own form and efficacy in generating belief or conviction in the mind, as derived from those connections which are pointed out by experience.

NATURAL AND REASONABLE WEAR AND TEAR. Wear and tear by use. Damage by operation of nature, as by freshets, is not included therein. 20 N. J. L. 544.

NATURAL RIGHTS. In Real Property Law. Such rights and privileges which pass with the property in the land as incidents to the land itself. They are such rights as the owner of property may enjoy in connection with his own property, as distinguished from easements (q. v.) which are supposed to be acquired by grant or prescription. 6 App. Cas. 740; 1 Thomp. Real Prop. 363. They are not created separately as a distinct subject of property, but are merely incidents of the right of ownership. 112 Fed. 98; id. For example, the right to have one's land supported by adjacent and subjacent land; the right to have the air in the vicinity of one's land reasonably free from disagreeable odors and noises, etc. 100 N. Y. 471; id.

NATURAL WATERCOURSE. A natural stream flowing in a defined bed or channel, with banks and sides, and having permanent sources of supply. 86 N. Y. 140; 55 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 78. See WATERCOURSE.

NATURAL WOOL. See WOOL.

NATURALEZA. In Spanish Law. The state of a natural-born subject. White, New Recop. b. 1, t. 5, c. 2.

NATURALIZATION. The act by which an alien is made a citizen of the United States of America.

The act of adopting a foreigner and clothing him with all the privileges of a native-born citizen. 9 Wheat. 827; 9 Op. Att.-Gen. 359.

A nation, or the sovereign who represents it, may grant to a stranger the quality of a citizen, by admitting him into the body of the political society. This is called naturalization. Vattel, Laws of Nat., bk. 1, ch. xix. §§ 212-214.

It is believed that every state in Christendom accords to foreigners, with more or less restrictions, the right of naturalization, and that each has some positive law or mode of its own for naturalizing the native-born subjects of other states, without reference to the consent of the latter for the release of the transfer of the allegiance of such subjects. See Morse, Citizenship 66.

The fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the states where they reside."

It affirms the ancient rule of citizenship by birth, within the territory, in the allegiance, and under the protection of the country, including all children here born of resident aliens, with the exception of the children of foreign sovereigns or their ministers, or born on a foreign public ship, or, of enemies, within and during a hostile occupation of part of our territory, and children of members of the Indian tribes owing direct allegiance to their several tribes. It includes a child, born in the United States, of parents of Chinese descent, who at the time of his birth are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent residence and domicile in the United States, and not employed in any diplomatic capacity; 189 U. S. 649, a learned opinion by Gray, J., Fuller, C. J., and Harlan, J., dissenting.

At common law a natural-born subject included every child born in England of alien parents except the child of an ambassador or diplomatic agent or of an alien enemy in hostile occupation of the place where the child was born; 169 U. S. 849. It made no difference whether the parents were permanently or only temporarily residing in England; Cockb. Nat. 7.

The term natural-born citizen used in the federal constitution is not therein defined. Its meaning must be gathered from the common law. An alien enemy cannot be naturalized; R. S. § 2171.

An applicant for naturalization must have been a resident of the United States for five years next preceding his admission to citizenship, but uninterrupted habitation is not required; R. S. § 2165. Naturalization, of itself, conveys no right of suffrage; Pars. Rights, Amer. Citizen 190; though by it a foreigner becomes, to all intents and purposes, a citizen of the United States, with no disability except that he cannot become president or vice-president. It does not operate as a bar against prosecution in one's native country for prior offences; 2 Whart. Dig. Int. L. § 180. The provision of the constitution applies to persons of foreign birth only; 19 How. 419; but not to Mongolians, or American Indians; 5 Sawy. 55; 7 Op. Att.-Gen. 746; and not, formerly, to a freeman of color, born in the United States; 26 Ind. 299. Indians may be naturalized by act of congress; 19 How. 393. Entire communities have been naturalized by a single act of national sovereignty; 86 Cal. 658; 143 U. S. 135. The act of July 14, 1870, extended the naturalization laws to persons of African descent. Under R. S. § 1994, providing that "any woman who is now or hereafter may be married to a citizen of the United States, and who might herself be lawfully naturalized, shall be deemed a citizen," applies to women of African blood; 86 Fed. Rep. 851.

An alien over twenty-one years who has enlisted in the United States army may, without previous declaration of intention, be naturalized on one year's residence, good moral character and honorable discharge; Act of July 17, 1862, § 21. An alien seaman may become a citizen by declaring his intention and serving three years on a merchant vessel of the United States; R. S. § 2174.

Minor children, though born out of the United States, if living within the United States at the time of the naturalization of the parents, become citizens by virtue of the naturalization of the parents; 97 Mo. 311; but not so if they came after the father had been naturalized; 135 Ill. 591. As to whether a child of a naturalized British subject is himself a British subject, see 5 L. Quart. Rev. 438.

A married woman may be naturalized; 1 Cra. C. C. 372; even without the concurrence of her husband; 16 Wend. 617; and an alien woman becomes a citizen when her husband is naturalized, even if she is not of age at the time; 44 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 635; and though she may have lived in a foreign country for years and has never come to the United States until after his death; 14 Op. Att.-Gen. 402.

The federal constitution, art. 1, § 8, vests in congress the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization. "It follows from the very nature of the power that to be useful it must be exclusive, for a concurrent power in the states would bring back all the evils and embarrassments which the constitution was designed to remedy, and accordingly, though there was a momentary hesitation when the constitution first went into operation as to whether the power might not still be exercised by the states subject only to the control of congress so far as the legislation of the latter extended as the supreme law, yet the power is now firmly established to be exclusive; 3 Story, Const. § 1104; 7 How. 556; 19 id. 393; 5 Cal. 800; 56 Fed. Rep. 578; and no state can pass a law which contravenes the acts of congress on the subject; 3 Rand. 276. A state may confer such rights of citizenship as it pleases so far as relates to itself only; 19 How. 393; 16 Wis. 443; but this is not to be confounded with the right of citizenship of the United States; 19 How. 393; 143 U. S. 180; and no state can make a citizen of the United States; 4 Dill. 425.

By act of April 14, 1803, congress has conferred power to naturalize upon state courts having common-law jurisdiction and a seal and clerk; 19 B. Monr. 693; 83 Me. 489; and it may invest state courts with jurisdiction to naturalize; 33 N. H. 89; but it is held that it cannot impose the duty of naturalization upon state courts; 3 D. R. (Pa.) 738; nor require them to act upon applications for naturalization; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 743. See 37 Neb. 399. In 10 Ark. 631, the court says, "Whether the state courts are bound to exercise concurrent jurisdiction permitted to be retained by them even when enjoined upon them by act of congress, is not altogether well settled. Some strong intimations to the contrary have been given by the judges of the supreme court of the United States, and in some instances the courts of the particular states have refused to exercise this jurisdiction." No state can confer jurisdiction on any court, which does not come within the terms of the act of congress; 50 N. H. 245.

Courts of record, in naturalizing foreigners, act judicially, ascertaining the facts and applying the law to them; 4 Pet. 407; the certificate of naturalization issued by a court of competent jurisdiction is conclusive proof of the citizenship of the person named therein; 147 Ill. 514; though not the only proof. The judgment of the court, like every judgment, has been decided to be complete evidence of its own validity; id.

When no record can be produced showing the naturalization of a foreigner, naturalization may be inferred from the fact that for a long time he voted, held office, and exercised all the rights and privileges of a citizen; 143 U. S. 135. The subject is fully discussed in Morse, Citizenship. See Miller, Const. 285, 302; 4 Am. Lawy. 848; 30 L. R. A. 761; CHINESE; CITIZEN; ALLEGIANCE; EXPATRIATION.

NATURALIZED CITIZEN. One who, being born an alien, has lawfully become a citizen of the United States under the constitution and laws.

In foreign countries he has a right to be treated as such, and will be so considered, even in the country of his birth, at least for most purposes; 1 B. & P. 430. See CITIZEN; DOMICIL; INHABITANT; NATURALIZATION.

NATURALLY. According to the usual course of things. 71 Cal. 164.

NAUCLEUS (Lat.). The master or owner of a vessel. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

NAUFRAGE. In French Maritime Law. When, by the violent agitation of the waves, the impetuosity of the winds, the storm, or the lightning, a vessel is swallowed up, or so shattered that there remain only the pieces, the accident is called naufrage.

It differs from échouement, which is when the vessel remains whole, but is grounded; or from bria, which is when it strikes against a rock or a coast; or from somber, which is the sinking of the vessel in the sea when it is swallowed up, and which may be caused by any accident whatever. Pardessus, n. 648. See Wreck.

NAUGHT. Bad; defective.

NAULAGE. See NAULUM.

NAULUM (Lat.). Freight or passage money. 1 Pars. Mar. Law 124, n.; Bened. Adm. § 288; Dig. l. 6, § 1, qui portiones in pignore.

NAUTA (Lat.). One who chartered (exerct) a ship. L. 1, § 1, ff. nautae, caupo; Calvinus, Lex. Any one who is on board a vessel for the purpose of navigating her. 3 Summ. 213; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; 2 Emerigon 448; Pothier, Pand. lib. 4, tit. 9, n. 2; lib. 47, tit. 5, nn. 1, 2, 3, 8, 10. A carrier by water. 2 Ld. Raym. 917.

NAUTICA, PECUNIA. Loans to a ship owner, to be repaid only in case of the successful termination of a voyage. Of such a nature are the contracts known as traiectitia, prêt à la grosse, bottomry, and respondentia. They have always been allowed to be effected, by way of compensation for the risk run by the lender, at an extraordinary rate of interest, — nauticum foenus. Holland, Jurispr. 12th ed., 308.

NAUTICAL ASSESSORS. Experienced shipmasters or other persons having special knowledge of navigation and nautical affairs, who are called to the assistance of a court of admiralty in difficult cases involving questions of negligence, and who sit with the judge during the argument and give their advice upon questions of seamanship or the weight of testimony. 19 Fed. Rep. 559.

NAUTICUM FOENUS. See NAUTICA PECUNIA.

NAVAGIUM. A duty on certain tenants to carry their lord's goods in a ship. 1 Mon. Ang. 922.

NAVAL CADET. Formerly, a pupil of the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, — now termed "midshipman." Stand. Dict. By settled usage which has the force of law, naval cadets are appointed by certificates under the hand and seal of the secretary of war. They are inferior officers who, for purposes of instruction, may be required to serve as officers, non-commissioned officers, or privates. Anderson.

NAVAL COURTS. Courts held abroad in certain cases to inquire into complaints by the master or seamen of a British ship, or as to the wreck or abandonment of such ship.

A Naval Court consists of three, four, or five members, being officers in her majesty's navy, consular officers, masters of British merchant ships or British merchants. It has power to supersede the master of the ship with reference to which the inquiry is held, to discharge any of the seamen, to decide questions as to wages, send home offenders for trial, or try certain offenses in a summary manner. R. & L. Dict.; Mer. Sh. Act, 1855, § 28.

NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL. See COURT MARTIAL.

NAVAL LAW. A system of regulations for the government of the navy. 1 Kent 877, n. Consult act of April 8, 1800; act of December 21, 1861; act of July 17, 1862; Homans, Nav. Laws; De Hart, Courts-Martial.

NAVAL OFFICER. An officer of the customs of the United States.

His office relates to the estimating duties, countersigning permits, clearances, etc., certifying the collectors' returns, and similar duties.

NAVAL PRIZE ACT. The act of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 25, which regulates questions of prize. See PRIZE.

NAVARCHUS, NAVICULARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The master of an armed ship. Navicularius also denotes the master of a ship (patronus) generally. Cic. Ver. 4, 55; also, a carrier by water (exer- citor navis). Calvinus, Lex.

NAVIGABLE WATERS. Those waters which afford a channel for useful commerce. 20 Wall. 430. See Patterson, Fed. Rest. 45.

The test by which the character of a stream as public or private is determined, is its navigability in fact; 122 Pa. 191; 100 N. C. 477.

In its technical sense, the term navigable, at common law, is only applied to the sea, to arms of the sea, and to rivers which flow and reflow with the tide, — in other words, to tide-waters, the bed or soil of which is the property of the crown. All other waters are, in this sense of the word, unnavigable, and are, prima facie, strictly private property; but in England even such waters, if navigable in the popular sense of the term, are, either of common right or by dedication, subject to the use of the public as navigable highways, the fee or soil remaining in the riparian proprietors; Davies 149; 5 Taunt. 705; 20 C. B. n. s. 1; 1 Pick. 180; 5 id. 199.

In the United States, this technical use of the term has been adopted in many of the states, in so far as it is employed to designate and define the waters, the bed or soil of which belongs to the state; 4 N. Y. 472; 4 Pick. 268; 2 Conn. 481; 3 Me. 209; 16 Ohio 540; 1 Halst. 81; 4 Wis. 486; 2 Swan 9. See 8 Abb. N. C. 68; 122 Pa. 191. But in Pennsylvania; 2 Binn. 475; 14 S. R. 71; in North Carolina; 3 Ired. 277; 2 Dev. 30; in Iowa; 8 Ia. 1; 4 id. 199; and in Alabama; 11 Ala. 436; the technical use of the term has been entirely discarded, and the large fresh-water rivers of those states have been decided to be navigable, not only as being subject to public use as navigable highways, but also as having their bed or soil in the state.

The rule of the common law, by which the ebb and flow of the tide has been made the criterion of navigability, has never been adopted in any of the United States, or, if adopted, it has been in a form modified and improved to fit the condition of the country and the wants of its inhabitants. According to the rule administered in the courts of this country, all rivers which are found "of sufficient capacity to float the products of the mines, the forests, or the tillage of the country through which they flow, to market;" 8 Barb. 239; or which are capable of use "for the floating of vessels, boats, rafts, or logs;" 31 Me. 9 (but see 6 Cal. 443; 17 Or. 185); 50 Fed. Rep. 429; 58 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 257; are subject to the free and unobstructed navigation of the public, independent of usage or of legislation; 5 Wend. 358; 42 Me. 552; 18 Barb. 277; 5 Ind. 8; 2 Swan 9; 29 Miss. 21; 6 Cal. 180; 3 Stockt. 211. See 51 Me. 256; 3 Ore. 445; 42 Wis. 202; 111 N. C. 661; 107 U. S. 682. Water navigable for pleasure boating must be regarded as navigable; 108 Mass. 456.

The navigable waters of the United States are such as are navigable in fact; 16 U. S. App. 152; and which by themselves, or in connection with other waters, form a continuous channel for commerce with foreign countries or among the states; 106 U. S. 385; 11 Wall. 411.

A river may be navigable below the ebb and flow of the tide in the sense of the common law, and, in fact, navigable above; and the question of boundary in respect to lands adjoining it will be determined by one principle above, and by another below tide-water; 12 N. J. Eq. 1. It is not necessary that the stream should be navigable all the year round; 81 Mich. 336; 25 Fla. 1. See 86 Ala. 88. There can be no prescriptive right to maintain or continue an obstruction to the navigation of a public stream; 86 Ala. 88.

In 108 Mass. 447, Gray, J., says: "The term 'navigable waters,' as commonly used in the law, has three distinct meanings: first, as synonymous with 'tide-waters,' being waters whether fresh or salt wherever the ebb and flow of the sea is felt; or second, as limited to tide-waters which are capable of being navigated for some useful purpose; or third, as including all waters, whether within or beyond the ebb and flow of the tide which can be used for navigation." See 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 147; Ang. Waterc. § 542; 19 Abb. N. C. 159. In North Carolina the test of navigability is not whether the stream is subject to the ebb and flow of the tide, but whether it is navigable for sea-going vessels; 114 N. C. 787; while in South Carolina the test is its navigable capacity, without regard to the character of the craft; 19 S. E. Rep. (S. C.) 963.

In New York, it seems that courts are bound to take judicial notice of what streams are, and what are not, highways, at common law; 8 Barb. 239; but it has been held that what is a navigable stream is a mixed question of law and fact; if a stream is not navigable the legislature cannot declare it to be so, because the legislature cannot appropriate it to public use without provision for compensation; 85 N. Y. 454. See WATERS; WATERCOURSE; RIVERS; LAKE; RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS; TIDE-WATER.

A navigable river in this country is one which is used, or is susceptible of being used in its ordinary condition, as a highway for commerce over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. It does not depend upon the mode by which trade is conducted upon it, whether by steamers, sailing vessels or flat boats, nor upon the difficulties attending navigation, but upon the fact whether the river in its natural state is such that it affords a channel for useful commerce. 260 U. S. 86.

What are navigable streams within the meaning of the local rules of property is for the determination of the States; and where a State by statute enumerates the navigable streams within its borders those not enumerated are non-navigable in law. 228 U. S. 244.

Navigability, in the sense of the law, is not destroyed by artificial obstructions subject to abatement by public authority; nor because the watercourse is interrupted by occasional natural obstructions or portages; nor need the navigation be open at all seasons of the year, or at all stages of the water. Id., 118, 122. The capability of use by the public for purposes of transportation and commerce affords the true criterion of the navigability of a river, rather than the extent and manner of that use. Id., 122, 123, quoting 10 Wall. 563.

NAVIGATING. A vessel which, though touching bottom, forces her way by her own screw through the soft mud is navigating. 59 Fed. Rep. 365.

NAVIGATION. See Fog.

NAVIGATION ACT. The stat. 12 Car. II. c. 78. It was repealed by 6 Geo. IV. c. 109, 110, 114. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107; 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 5 and 120; 3 Steph. Com. 145.

NAVIGATION, RULES OF. Rules and regulations which govern the motions of ships or vessels when approaching each other under such circumstances that a collision may possibly ensue.

These rules are firmly maintained in the United States courts. A federal question is presented by a ruling of a state court which substantially ignores the obligatory force of rules of navigation; 150 U. S. 874.

The rules of navigation which prevailed under the general maritime law, in the absence of statutory enactments, will be considered, although, as hereinafter stated, they have lately been superseded by express enactment in most of the commercial countries of the world.

These rules were derived mainly from the decisions of the high court of admiralty in England, and of the superior courts of the United States, and they are based upon the rules promulgated by the corporation of the Trinity House on the 30th of October, 1840, and which may be found in full in 1 W. Rob. 488. Though now codified, see infra, they are here continued as in the former edition as a matter of historical interest.

For sailing-vessels about to meet. 1. Those having the wind fair shall give way to those on a wind [or close-hauled].

2. When both are going by the wind, the vessel on the starboard tack shall keep her wind, and the one on the larboard tack bear up, thereby passing each other on the larboard hand.

3. When both vessels have the wind large or abeam, and meet, they shall pass each other in the same way, on the larboard hand; to effect which two last-mentioned objects the helm must be put to port.

For a sailing and a steam vessel about to meet. 1. Steam-vessels are to be considered in the light of vessels navigating with a fair wind, and should give way to sailing-vessels on a wind on either tack.

2. A steam-vessel and a sailing-vessel going large, when about to meet, should each port her helm and pass on the larboard side of the other; 1 W. Rob. 478; 2 id. 515.

But in the United States courts it has been almost uniformly held, and the rule is now firmly established, that when a sailing-vessel and a steamer are about to meet, the sailing-vessel must, under ordinary circumstances, and whether going large, or before the wind, or close-hauled by the wind, keep her course, and the steamer must take all the measures necessary to avoid a collision; 10 How. 557; 17 id. 152, 178; 18 id. 581; 3 Blatch. 92; Desty, Adm. § 357; 48 Fed. Rep. 760; 54 id. 411; 37 id. 330; 144 U. S. 371.

For steam-vessels about to meet. 1. When steam-vessels on different courses are about to meet under such circumstances as to involve the risk of collision, each vessel must put her helm to port, so as always to pass on the larboard side of the other.

2. A steam-vessel passing another in a narrow channel must always leave the vessel she is passing on the larboard hand.

The following abstract of authorities may also be referred to as furnishing rules of decision (in addition to the general rules of navigation) in the particular cases alluded to; and they will be found generally applicable in cases of collision arising under the new regulations, as well as in cases arising under the general maritime law.

When a steamer or other vessel is about to pass another vessel proceeding in the same general direction, she must allow the foremost boat to keep her way and course, and must take the necessary measures to avoid a collision; 23 How. 448; Abb. Adm. Pr. 108; Olc. 505; 1 Blatch. 363.

A vessel under sail or steam is bound to keep clear of a vessel stationary or at anchor, provided the latter is in a proper place, and exhibits a proper light,—the presumption in such cases being that the vessel in motion is at fault; 1 How. 89; 19 id. 108; 3 Kent 231; Daveis 359; 1 Swab. 88; 3 W. Rob. 49.

A vessel entering a harbor is bound to keep the most vigilant watch to avoid a collision; 18 How. 584; Daveis 359; see 51 Fed. Rep. 766; and in the night-time she ought generally to have her whole crew on deck; Daveis 359. And see 3 Kent 231; 1 Dods. 467.

By the general maritime law, vessels upon the high seas were not ordinarily required constantly to exhibit a light; 2 W. Rob. 4; 3 id. 49; 2 Wall. Jr. 268; but the subject is now regulated by statute in the various maritime countries.

Regulations made by various governments are binding upon all vessels within the jurisdiction of that government; Story, Conf. Laws, ch. 14; 1 Swab. 88, 93, 96; 1 How. 28; 14 Pet. 99; but it is beyond power of the legislature to make rules applicable to foreign vessels when beyond their jurisdiction; that is, more than a marine league from their shores; 1 Swab. 96. And see 18 How. 223; 21 id. 184. It has, accordingly, been held that an English rule is not applicable in a case of collision on the high seas between a British and a foreign vessel, and that the latter could not set up in its defence a violation of the English statute by the British vessel; 1 Swab. 93, 96; and it was declared that in such a case the general maritime law must be the rule of the court. See 92 U. S. 31.

The British Government, by an Order in Council, in 1863, promulgated certain regulations for preventing collisions at sea. An Order in Council, in 1879, promulgated new regulations, to take effect on September 1, 1880. These were adopted in pursuance of the recommendation of representatives of different nations, and are stated in the last-mentioned Order to have been very generally adopted by commercial nations. They were adapted to the United States with regard to vessels on the high seas and in coast waters, in 1864 (R. S. § 4233). A revised code was adopted by England in 1884, and then was adopted by the United States with reference to vessels on the high seas in 1885. In 1890 by international agreement congress adopted a complete system of rules of the road governing vessels both on the ocean and on our own inland waters. These rules consist of: 1. The International Rules agreed upon by all nations, which went into effect July 1, 1897; 1 R. S. Sup. 781. 2. Rules for the navigation of rivers, harbors, and inland waters of the United States, navigable by sea-going vessels, which went into effect October 7, 1897; 2 R. S. Sup. 620. 3. Rules to regulate the navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters as far east as Montreal, which went into effect March 1, 1895; 2 R. S. Sup. 320. 4. Rules for the navigation of the Red River of the North and rivers entering into the Gulf of Mexico and its tributaries, which are the same as were formerly in use, and are to be found in R. S. § 4233 and its amendments, and rules made pursuant to R. S. § 4412 by the Board of Supervising Inspectors of steam-vessels. Copies of all these rules are furnished on application by the Commissioner of Navigation. These various codes of rules are too long to be set forth here.

It is evident that these rules and regulations were intended to supersede all other rules of navigation, and every other system of vessels' lights, wherever they may be adopted. They establish a well-devised and complete system of vessels' lights, and furnish plain and simple rules of navigation applicable to all the ordinary cases of vessels approaching each other under such circumstances as to involve the risk of collision,—leaving extraordinary cases, such as the meeting of vessels in extremely narrow or other very difficult channels (in respect to which no safe general rule can be devised), to the practical good sense and professional skill of those in charge of such vessels. Under all ordinary circumstances a vessel discharges her full duty to another vessel by a faithful and literal observance of the international rules; 158 U. S. 187. Where there were no positive rules of navigation on a foreign river, but there was a certain practice, it was held that a vessel which disregarded the practice was responsible for a collision occurring thereby; L. R. 15 P. D. 194. A departure from the rules, to be justifiable, must be necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. But that necessity must not have been caused by the negligence or fault of the party disobeying the rule; and courts of admiralty lean against the exceptions; 18 How. 581, 583; 1 W. Rob. 157, 478. And see 2 Curt. C. C. 141, 363; 18 How. 581; 150 U. S. 674; 123 id. 349. It is no excuse that a vessel, in departing from the navigation rules, when rounding the Battery at New York, to say that vessels often agree with each other to do so, when it appears that the vessel in question took upon herself the responsibility of departing from the rules for her own convenience; 14 U. S. App. 684.

The maritime law, however, requires that in collision cases every violation of a rule of navigation, and every other act or omission alleged to be a fault, shall be considered in connection with all the attending circumstances; and when by inevitable accident, or the fault of one of two colliding vessels, a vessel free from fault is suddenly brought into such circumstances of imminent danger as probably to render the deliberate or proper exercise of the judgment and skill of an experienced seaman impossible, an error of judgment, or other mistake, is not regarded as a legal fault; 8 Blatch. 92; 13 How. 461; 14 Wall. 190; 19 id. 54; 54 Fed. Rep. 411; 128 U. S. 849; 144 id. 87.

The proper and continual exhibition of the bright and colored lights which these rules and regulations prescribe, and their careful observance by the officer of the deck and the lookout of every vessel, constitute the very foundation of the system of navigation established by such rules and regulations. The exhibition of such lights, and the strict compliance with the rules in respect to stationing and keeping a competent and careful person in the proper place and exclusively devoted to the discharge of the duties of a lookout, are of the utmost importance.

The stringent requirements of our maritime courts in respect to lookouts may be learned by consulting the following authorities: 10 How. 585; 13 id. 448; 18 id. 108, 223; 21 id. 548, 570; 23 id. 448; 3 Blatch. 92; 5 C. C. App. 390; 53 Fed. Rep. 669; 60 id. 1022. This rule admits of no exception on account of size, in favor of any craft capable of committing injuries; 56 Fed. Rep. 371. A sailing-vessel is entitled to assume that a steam-vessel, approaching her, is being navigated with a proper lookout and with reasonable attention to the obligations laid upon her; 1 U. S. App. 11. The absence of a lookout is not material where the presence of one would not have availed to prevent a collision; 144 U. S. 871.

The neglect to carry or display the lights prescribed by these rules and regulations will always by held, prima facie, a fault, in a collision case; 5 How. 441, 465; 21 id. 548, 556; 3 W. Rob. 191; Swab. 120, 245, 253, 319; 1 Lush. 392; 2 Wall. 538. And, upon the same principles, the neglect, in a fog, to use the prescribed fog-signals will also be considered, prima facie, a fault; Desty, Adm. § 360. See Foo.

It will be observed that the duty of slackening speed, in all cases when risk of collision is involved, is absolutely and imperatively imposed upon every steam-vessel, by these regulations, and that they require that every steam-vessel shall stop and reverse her engine when necessary to avoid a collision.

The duty of slackening speed in order to avoid a collision has been frequently declared by the maritime courts before the adoption of these regulations; 3 Hagg. Adm. 414; 3 Blatch. 92; Swab. 188; 2 W. Rob. 1; 3 id. 95, 270, 377; 10 How. 557; 12 id. 443; 18 id. 108; but there was no inflexible rule requiring a steamer to slacken speed in all cases when there was risk of collision; and the neglect to do it was held to be a fault only in those cases where its necessity was shown by the proofs. This left the question open to be determined by the courts in each particular case, and perhaps upon vague and unreliable estimates of time and distance and bearings, or upon conflicting and unsatisfactory testimony; but the legislature, in view of the great power and speed of the steamers now in general use, and the very disastrous consequences of a collision of such vessels when running at their ordinary speed, has wisely made the duty imperative; 5 Blatch. 256; 10 How. 596; 91 U. S. 200; 7 U. S. App. 20. See COLLISION; MARITIME LAW.

NAVIRE. In French Law. A ship. Emerig. Traité des Assur. c. 6, § 1.

NAVY. The whole shipping, taken collectively, belonging to the government of an independent nation, and appropriated for the purposes of naval warfare. It does not include ships belonging to private individuals nor (in the United States, at least) revenue vessels or transports in the service of the war department.

Under the constitution, congress has power to provide and maintain a navy. This power authorizes the government to buy and build vessels of war, to establish a naval academy, and to provide for the punishment of desertion and other crimes, and to make all needful rules for the government of the navy. See 3 Wheat. 337; 20 How. 66; 3 Wheat. 370.

NAVY BILLS. Bills drawn by the officers of the British navy for their pay, etc.

A bill of exchange drawn by the paymaster of a United States vessel, while abroad, to procure money for the expenses of his ship or fleet.

NAVY DEPARTMENT. See DEPARTMENT.

NAVY LIST. An official account of the officers of the British navy, with a list of the ships, published quarterly.

NAVY PERSONNEL ACT. An act of March 3, 1899, 30 Stat. 1004, equalizing the pay of army and navy officers. The act declared that "after June 30, 1899, commissioned officers of the line of the navy and of the medical and pay corps shall receive the same pay and allowances, except forage, as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for officers of corresponding rank in the army." By a former act, the relative rank of army and navy officers was fixed. It was, however, a source of dissatisfaction to navy officers that some of them did not receive the same pay as corresponding officers of the army, although others received a larger pay. To remove this dissatisfaction Congress passed the Naval Personnel Act, assimilating the pay of navy officers to army officers of corresponding rank, with a proviso, however, "that no provision of this act shall operate to reduce the present pay of any commissioned officer now in the navy; and in any case in which the pay of such an officer would otherwise be reduced he shall continue to receive pay according to existing law." The effect of this legislation was to raise the pay of certain navy officers to that received by army officers of corresponding rank, and to leave undisturbed the present pay of certain other navy officers, who were already receiving higher pay than army officers of the same rank. The intention of Congress was evidently to put officers of the army and navy on the same footing with respect to their general pay, and to make the act prospective in its application to future legislation, so that if Congress should thereafter raise the general pay of army officers as fixed by Revised Statutes, section 1261, a like increase should apply to navy officers. 195 U. S. 418, 420, 421. See RANK.

NAVY REGISTER. An official list published semi-annually of the officers of the United States navy, their stations, rates of pay, etc., with a list of the ships.

NAVY REGULATIONS. Regulations established by the Secretary of the Navy with the approval of the President. (12 Stat. 565; Rev. Stat., § 1547.) Such regulations have the force of law. 100 U. S. 22; 4 Hos. (U. S.) 80.

NE ADMITTAS (Lat.). The name of a writ now practically obsolete, so called from the first words of the Latin form, by which the bishop is forbidden to admit to a benefice the other party's clerk during the pendency of a quære impedit. Fitzh. N. B. 37; Reg. Orig. 81; 3 Bla. Com. 248; 1 Burn. Eccl. Law 51.

NE BAILA PAS (he did not deliver). In Pleading. A plea in detinue, by which the defendant denies the delivery to him of the thing sued for.

NE DISTURBA PAS. In Pleading. The general issue in quære impedit. Hob. 162. See Rast. Entr. 517; Winch. Entr. 708. Andr. Steph. Pl. 230.

NE DONA PAS, NON DEDIT. In Pleading. The general issue in form-don. It is in the following formula: "And the said C D, by J K, his attorney, comes and defends the right, when, etc., and says that the said E F did not give the said manor, with the appurtenances, or any part thereof, to the said G B, and the heirs of his body issuing, in manner and form as the said A B hath in his count above alleged. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." 10 Wentw. Pl. 162; Andr. Steph. Pl. 230.

NE EXEAT REPUBLICA, NE EXEAT REGNO (Lat.). In Practice. The name of a writ originally employed in England as a high prerogative process, for political purposes; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1467; 50 N. H. 358; but now applied in civil matters only, issued by a court of chancery, directed to the sheriff, reciting that the defendant in the case is indebted to the complainant, and that he designs going quickly into parts without the state, to the damage of the complainant, and then commanding him to cause the defendant to give bail in a certain sum that he will not leave the state without leave of the court, and for want of such bail that he, the sheriff, do commit the defendant to prison.

This writ is a part of the English chancery practice and is usually a part of that practice in states where it is in force. It may be issued by the United States District Courts; 48 Fed. Rep. 492.

This writ has been expressly abolished in very many of the states. Yet its place has been filled by other methods of procedure, similar in effect. The constitutions of Vermont, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Mississippi, and Louisiana prohibit any restraint upon emigration. In Arkansas the writ is abolished, and in the code of New York a system of arrest and bail is substituted. In Ohio and California it is abolished; 27 Ohio 654; 49 Cal. 465. In those jurisdictions where ne exeat is still recognized, the circumstances under which the writ will be granted, and the requisites to its issuance, are largely regulated by statute; but certain general principles govern in nearly every case. These will be found set forth in Rhodes v. Cousins, 6 Rand. 191. See 14 Amer. Dec. 560, n.

This writ is issued to prevent debtors from escaping from their creditors. It amounts, in ordinary civil cases, to nothing more than process to hold to bail, or to compel a party to give security to abide the decree to be made in his case; Bisp. Eq. § 86; 2 Kent 32; 1 Clark 551; Beames, Ne Exeat; 13 Viner, Abr. 587; 1 Suppl. to Ves. Jr. 33, 352, 467; 1 Bla. Com. 138; Madd. Ch. Pr. 1; 1 Smith, Ch. Pr. 576; 19 V. & B. 312; 6 Johns. Ch. 138; 27 Ohio 666; 46 Vt. 706; 1 Del. Ch. 32; id. 295; 6 Phila. 143.

Arrest under this writ is not in violation of a constitutional provision that a person shall not be imprisoned for debt, unless in cases of tort, or where there is a strong presumption of fraud; 16 Colo. 75.

The writ may be issued against foreigners subject to the jurisdiction of the court, citizens of the same state, or of another state, when it appears by a positive affidavit that the defendant is about to leave the state, or has threatened to do so, and that the debt would be lost or endangered by his departure; 3 Johns. Ch. 75, 412; 7 id. 192; 1 Hopk. Ch. 499. On the same principle which has been adopted in the courts of law that a defendant could not be held to bail twice for the same cause of action, it has been decided that a writ of ne exeat was not properly issued against a defendant who had been held to bail in an action at law; 8 Ves. 564.

This writ can be issued only for equitable demands; 4 Des. Eq. 108; 6 Johns. Ch. 138; 1 Hopk. Ch. 499; and not where the plaintiff by process of law may hold the defendant to bail; 3 Bro. C. C. 218; 8 Ves. Jr. 593; 36 Ga. 578; 18 N. J. Eq. 249; 28 Wisc. 245; and where there is an adequate remedy at law the writ will be dissolved; 30 Ga. 965. It may be allowed in a case to prevent the failure of justice; 2 Johns. Ch. 191. When the demand is strictly legal, it cannot be issued, because the court has no jurisdiction. When the court has concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of common law, the writ may, in such case, issue, unless the party has been already arrested at law; 2 Johns. Ch. 170. In all cases when a writ of ne exeat is claimed, the plaintiff's equity must appear on the face of the bill; 8 Johns. Ch. 414.

The writ may be provided for in the final decree and will continue in force until dissolved by the court or until the decree is satisfied; 48 Fed. Rep. 492. It is not superseded by a subsequent bond for the performance of final decree; 36 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 851. It may be granted on motion founded on affidavit, but where the facts charged in the bill are such as to entitle the complainant to the writ, it is sufficient to refer to them as showing the ground of the complainant's demand without restating them in the affidavit; 1 Del. Ch. 32.

The amount of bail is assessed by the court itself; and a sum is usually directed sufficient to cover the existing debt and a reasonable amount of future interest, having regard to the probable duration of the suit; 1 Hopk. Ch. 501.

The defendant arrested upon a writ of ne exeat may obtain a discharge of the writ upon giving bond, with surety, to answer and be amenable to the process of the court; 141 U. S. 250.

NE INJUSTE VEXES (Lat.). In Old English Law. The name of a writ which issued to relieve a tenant upon whom his lord had distrained for more services than he was bound to perform.

It was a prohibition to the lord, not unjustly to distrain or vex his tenant. Fitzh. N. B. Having been long obsolete, it was abolished in 1833.

NE LUMINIBUS OFFICIATUR (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a servitude which restrains the owner of a house from making such erections as obstruct the light of the adjoining house. Dig. 8. 4. 15. 17; SERVITUDE.

NE RECIPIATUR (Lat.). That it be not received. A caveat or words of caution given to a law officer, by a party in a cause, not to receive the next proceedings of his opponent. 1 Sell. Pr. 8.

NE RELESSA PAS (Law Fr.). The name of a replication to a plea of release, by which the plaintiff insists he did not release. 2 Bulstr. 55.

NE UNQUES ACCOUPLE (Law Fr.). In Pleading. A plea by which the party denies that he ever was lawfully married to the person to whom it refers. See the form, 2 Wils. 118; 10 Wentw. Pl. 158; 2 H. Bla. 145; 3 Chitty, Pl. 599.

NE UNQUES EXECUTOR. In Pleading. A plea by which the party who uses it denies that the plaintiff is an executor, as he claims to be; or that the defendant is executor, as the plaintiff in his declaration charges him to be. 1 Chitty, Pl. 484; 1 Saund. 274, n. 8; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (2 D 2); 2 Chitty, Pl. 498.

NE UNQUES SEISIE QUE DOWER. In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant denies the right of a widow who sues for and demands her dower in lands, etc., late of her husband, because the husband was not on the day of her marriage with him, or at any time afterwards, seised of such estate, so that she could be endowed of the same. See 2 Saund. 329; 10 Wentw. Pl. 159; 3 Chitty, Pl. 598, and the authorities there cited.

NE UNQUES SON RECEIVER. In Pleading. The name of a plea in an action of account-render, by which the defendant affirms that he never was receiver of the plaintiff. 12 Vin. Abr. 183.

NE VARIETUR (Lat. that it be not changed). A form sometimes written by notaries public upon bills or notes, for the purpose of identifying them. This does not destroy their negotiability. 8 Wheat. 338.

NEAP TIDES. Those tides which happen between the full and change of the moon, twice in every twenty-four hours. 18 Cal. 21.

Tides in which the rise and fall is least, occurring after the first and third quarters of the moon. English. Cf. SPRING TIDES.

NEAR. Close or at no great distance. 109 N. C. 358. Near is a relative term, and its precise meaning depends upon circumstances; 44 Mo. 197; 5 Allen 221; 89

N. J. Eq. 495; 108 U. S. 211; 31 Fed. Rep. 872.

Two and one half miles was held to be near; 44 Mo. 197. See AT OR NEAR.

NEAREST. Not necessarily nearest by geographical measurement, but by convenience of access, having regard to the usual travelled route. 54 Tex. 307. See MILEAGE.

NEAT, NET. The exact weight of an article, without the bag, box, keg, or other thing in which it may be enveloped.

NEAT CATTLE. Oxen or heifers. Whart. Dict. "Beeves" may include neat stock, but all neat stock are not beeves; 36 Tex. 324; 32 id. 479. The term neat cattle includes a cow. 17 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 745.

NEAT LAND. Land let out to the yeomanry. S. W. Cowel.

NEATNESS. In Pleading. The statement in apt and appropriate words of all the necessary facts and no more. Lawes, Plead. 62.

NEBRASKA. One of the states of the American Union, being the thirty-seventh admitted to the Union.

Its territory formed a part of the province of Louisiana as ceded by France and was afterwards included in the district and the territory of Louisiana as organized in 1804 and 1805, respectively, and in the territory of Missouri, to which the name of the last-named territory was changed in 1812. The territory of Nebraska, extending beyond the limits of the present state westward to the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and northward to the British possessions, was organized by the act of May 30, 1854. An enabling act for the formation of a state government was passed April 19, 1864; a state constitution was adopted June 21, 1866; on the 9th of February, 1867, an act was passed for the admission of the state into the Union, on condition that civil rights and the elective franchise should be secured to all races, excepting Indians not taxed; and on the first of March, 1867, a proclamation by the president announced the acceptance of this condition, whereupon by the terms of the act the admission of the state became complete.

NECATINE. The act of killing.

NECESSARIES. Such things as are proper and requisite for the sustenance of man, including food, clothing, medicine, and habitation. 47 Minn. 250.

The term necessities is not confined merely to what is requisite barely to support life, but includes many of the conveniences of refined society. It is a relative term, which must be applied to the circumstances and conditions of the parties; Add. Contr. 382; 7 B. & R. 247. Ornaments and superfluities of dress, such as are usually suitable to the party's rank and situation in life; 1 Campb. 120; 7 C. & P. 52; 8 Term 578; 47 Minn. 250; some degree of education; 4 M. & W. 727; 16 Vt. 688; lodging and house-rent; 1 B. & P. 840; see 12 Metc. 559; 1 M. & W. 67; 5 Q. B. 608; board bill; 83 Me. 305; pew rent; 40 Conn. 75; horses, saddles, bridles, liquors, pistols, but powder, whips, and fiddles have been held not to be necessities; 1 Bibb 519; 2 N. & M'C. 524. Nor is an infant liable on a contract for the erection of a dwelling-house; 78 Hun 603. But a racing bicycle is a necessary for an apprentice earning 21s. a week and living with his parents; 78 L. T. 296.

The rule for determining what are necessities is that whether articles of a certain kind or certain subjects of expenditure are or are not such necessities as an infant may contract for, is a matter of law, and for instruction by the court; but the question whether any particular things come under these classes, and the question, also, as to quantity, are generally matters for the jury to determine; 10 Vt. 225; 12 Metc. 559; 11 N. H. 51; 1 Bibb 519; 2 Humphr. 27; 3 Day 37; 6 M. & W. 42; 6 C. & P. 690; Ans. Contr. 113; Poll. Contr. 67.

Infants, when not maintained by parent or guardian, may contract for necessities; 4 M. & W. 727; 16 Mass. 28; 10 Mo. 451; 9 Johns. 141; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.), 345. But when living with and supported by their parents they are not liable for necessities; 4 Wend. 403; 61 Ill. 177; 48 Mo. App. 59; Ewell, Lead. Cas. 65. Nor can an infant pledge his father's credit, as a wife can her husband's, for abandonment of duty; 17

Vt. 349; 6 M. & W. 463; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 328. Infants are not liable at law for borrowed money, though expended for necessities; 10 Mod. 67; 1 Bibb 519; 7 W. & S. 83, 88; 10 Vt. 225. See 1 P. Wms. 558; 7 N. H. 368; 2 Hill S. C. 400; 32 N. H. 345. Otherwise in equity; 1 P. Wms. 558; 2 Duvall 149; 7 W. & S. 88. An infant is not liable upon a bill of exchange at the suit of an indorsee of the bill, although it was accepted for the price of necessities; [1891] 1 Q. B. 413. Services rendered by an attorney to an infant in examining the public records and advising him as to his rights to certain property are not necessities; 48 Neb. 891. Necessaries for the infant's wife and children are necessities for himself; Stra. 168; Com. Dig. Infant (B 5); 1 Bibb 519; 2 N. & M'C. 523; 9 Johns. 144; 16 Mass. 31; 14 B. Monr. 232. As to a note or acceptance by an infant for necessities, see 35 Cent. Law J. 203. See INFANT.

When a wife is living with her husband, it is presumed that she has his assent to pledge his credit for necessities. See 35 Me. 332; 83 id. 132; 79 Wis. 147; 64 Hun 634. But this presumption may be rebutted by showing a prohibition on his part or that he has already supplied her with necessities. The fact of cohabitation is not conclusive of the husband's assent; 2 Ld. Raym. 1006; 34 N. H. 420; 39 N. Y. 351; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 80; 29 Am. L. Reg. 324. But if the husband altogether neglects to supply the wife, she may pledge his credit notwithstanding he has forbidden tradesmen to trust her; the law here raising a presumption of agency to enforce the marital obligation and protect the wife; 41 Barb. 558; 15 Conn. 535; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 77; 2 Misc. Rep. 49. A wife is ordinarily authorized to purchase clothing on the husband's credit only in case of necessity, and where the wife has habitually clothed herself out of her separate income which is adequate for that purpose, the husband is not liable for clothing ordered by her; 47 N. E. Rep. 408; 114 Mass. 424; 183 id. 513. See 67 Me. 238. The husband is also liable when away from his wife without her fault or by his own misconduct; 24 Ala. 337; 8 Ia. 51; 8 Gray 172; 2 Kent 146; 43 Ill. App. 39; 180 Mass. 149. In order to charge a husband with necessities sold to his wife, it must affirmatively appear that the goods were sold on the husband's credit; 7 Misc. Rep. 118. But otherwise where it is the wife's fault; 10 Ill. 569; 29 N. H. 83; 40 Vt. 68; 19 Wisc. 263. But if the wife elopes, though it be not with an adulterer, he is not chargeable even for necessities; the very fact of the elopement and separation is sufficient to put persons on inquiry, and whoever gives credit to the wife afterwards gives it at his peril; 1 Stra. 647; 11 Johns. 281; 3 Pick. 289; 2 Halst. 146; 2 Kent 123; Bacon, Abr. Baron and Feme (H); 1 Hare & W. NECESSARY. Reasonably convenient. 19 So. Rep. 202.

This word has great flexibility of meaning. It is used to express mere convenience, or that which is indispensable to the accomplishment of a purpose, 43 Ill. 807. It frequently imports no more than that one thing is convenient, or useful, or essential to another; 4 Wheat. 414.

The word admits of all degrees of comparison and is often connected with other words, which increase or diminish the impression the mind receives of the urgency it imports. A thing may be necessary, very necessary, absolutely or indispensably necessary. 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 413, 414.

To employ the means necessary to an end.

is generally understood as employing any means calculated to produce the end, and not as being confined to those single means, without which the end would be entirely unattainable. Id.

What is "necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of an estate" cannot reasonably be held to be limited to absolute physical necessity, but to what is reasonably necessary. Anderson; 8 Allen 6. Necessary help for the warden of a prison includes the services of a physician. Id.; 13 Nev. 420. Necessary household furniture includes more articles than such as are absolutely indispensable, — articles which, to the common understanding, are required for comfort and convenience. But "necessary" is not to have the liberal sense given it in the rule as to "necessaries," q. v. Id.; 43 Conn. 529. Necessary implication, in construing a will, means so strong a probability of intention that an intention contrary to that imputed cannot be supposed. Id.; 1 Ves. & B. *466. Referring to taking private property for public uses, necessary means expedient. Id.; 7 Cow. 606. Necessary repairs to a vessel means such as are reasonably proper under the circumstances; not merely such as are indispensable for the safety of the ship or the accomplishment of the voyage. Id.; 3 Sumn. 237.

As used in a code exempting the wages of a laboring man when necessary for the support of his family in whole or in part, it does not mean that his wages must be absolutely indispensable to the bare subsistence of the family and that the family could not live without them, but is used in a broader and less rigid sense looking rather to the comfort and well being of the family, and contemplates the furnishing to it whatever is necessary to its comfort and well-being as distinguished from luxuries. 29 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 337.

Witness fees are not necessary disbursements where witnesses were not called at the trial, unless the party shows why he did not call them; 28 N. Y. Supp. 663.

Necessary material for the construction of a railroad includes the railroad as a completed structure, station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn outs, and water tanks. 150 U. S. 1.

Necessary help. A physician may be appointed by a warden of a state prison under authority to appoint all necessary help. 13 Nev. 419.

Necessary implication. In construing a will, not a natural necessity, but so strong a probability that a contrary construction cannot be supported. 1 V. & B. 466.

NECESSARY APPARATUS. All such articles as are usually employed in the business referred to. 7 J. J. Mar (Ky.) 113.

NECESSARY BALLAST. The ballast reasonably necessary to complete the road for the purpose for which it was built. 139 Ky. 358, 104 S. W. 370.

NECESSARY DOMICIL. That kind of domicile which exists by operation of law, as distinguished from voluntary domicile or domicile of choice.

NECESSARY EXPENSE. The acquisition of a place or home for a building and loan association for the conduct of its business is a "necessary expense," within a statute, making provision for the allowance of necessary and proper expenses from moneys accumulated. 129 Ky. 755, 112 S. W. 864.

NECESSARY SUPPLIES. The transportation of children to and from school in wagons held not to be "necessary supplies" within a clause relating to additional tax of subdistricts for educational purposes. 146 Ky. 460, 142 S. W. 1041.

NECESSITOUS CIRCUMSTANCES. In the civil code of Louisiana the words are used relative to the fortune of the deceased and to the condition in which the claimant lived during the marriage. 43 La. Ann. 1140.

NECESSITY. That which makes the contrary of a thing impossible.

Necessity is of three sorts: of conservation of life; see DURESS; of obedience, as the obligation of civil subjection, and, in some cases, the coercion of a wife by her husband; and necessity of the act of God, or of a stranger. Jacob; Moz. & W.

Whatever is done through necessity is done without any intention; and as the act is done without will (q. v.) and is compulsory, the agent is not legally responsible; Whart. Cr. L. § 95; Bacon, Max. Reg. 5. Hence the maxim, Necessity has no law; indeed, necessity is itself a law which cannot be avoided nor infringed. Clef des Lois Rom.; Dig. 10. 3. 10. 1; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (8 M 20, 3 M 30). As to the circumstances which constitute necessity, see 1 Russ. Cr. 16, 20; 2 Stark. Ev. 718; 31 Ind. 189; 4 Cush. 243; 55 Ga. 128.

NECK. In Mining. An entry driven narrow, or just wide enough to allow a car track into the room from which this "neck" is the outlet for the coal, as mined, to the cross entry. 160 Ky. 669, 170 S. W. 14.

NECK-VERSE. The Latin sentence Miserere mei, Deus, Ps. li. 1, because the reading of it was made a test for those who claimed benefit of clergy (q. v.).

If a monk had been taken
For stealing of bacon;
For burglary, murder, or rape;
If he could but rehearse
(Well prompt) his neck-verse,
He never could fall to escape.
Brit. Apollo 1770; Whart. Dict.

NEEDLESSLY. In a statute with reference to the needless killing or bad treatment of animals, it denotes an act done without any useful motive, in a spirit of wanton cruelty, or for the mere pleasure of destruction. 29 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 953; 87 Ark. 460; 4 Mo. App. 215.

NEFAS. That which is against right or divine law; a wicked thing or act. Calv. Lex.

NEGATIVE. Negative propositions are usually much more difficult of proof than affirmative, and in cases where they are involved, it is often a nice question upon which side lies the burden of proof. The general rule has been thus stated: Whoever asserts a right dependent for its existence upon a negative, must establish the truth of the negative, except where the matter is peculiarly within the knowledge of the adverse party. Otherwise rights of which a negative forms an essential element may be enforced without proof; 72 Ind. 113; 6 C. 37 Am. Rep. 141; 78 N. Y. 480. Thus inactions for malicious prosecution, the plaintiff must prove that there was no probable cause; 87 Ind. 375; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 454. The rule applies whenever the claim is founded in a breach of duty in not repairing highways, and in cases of mutual negligence; 78 N. Y. 480; Shearn & Red. Neg. 312. So one must prove the allegation that a negotiable promissory note was not taken in payment of a debt; 68 Ind. 254. So the onus is on a plaintiff who assigns as a breach by tenant that he did not repair; 9 C. & P. 734; 6 H. L. C. 672; 12 Mod. 528. In all actions for breach of warranty of the soundness of a personal chattel, the plaintiff must prove the negative. "It may be stated as a test admitting of universal application, that whether the proposition be affirmative or negative, the party against whom judgment would be given, as to a particular issue, supposing no proof to be offered on either side, has on him, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, the burden of proof which he must satisfactorily sustain." 1 Whart. Ev. § 387; see 14 M. & W. 95; 5 Cra. C. C. 398; 119 Mass. 469; 47 Pa. 476; 62 N. Y. 448; 33 Miss. 292; 39 Wis. 520; 69 Ill. 423; 52 Mo. 890; 123 U. S. 817; article in 25 Alb. L. Jour. 124; BURDEN OF PROOF; Tayl. Ev. § 865.

NEGATIVE AVERMENT. In Pleading. An averment in some of the pleadings in a case in which a negative is asserted.

NEGATIVE CONDITION. One where the thing which is the subject of it must not happen. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 751. See POSITIVE CONDITION.

NEGATIVE COVENANT. See COVENANT.

NEGATIVE EASEMENT. See EASEMENT.

NEGATIVE PREGNANT. In Pleading. Such a form of negative expression as may imply or carry within it an affirmative. 134 Ind. 46.

Thus, where a defendant pleaded a license from the plaintiff's daughter, and the plaintiff rejoined that he did not enter by her license, the rejoinder was objected to successfully as a negative pregnant; Cro. Jac. 87. The fault here lies in the ambiguity of the rejoinder, since it does not appear whether the plaintiff denies that the license was given or that the defendant entered by the license; Steph. Pl. 381.

This ambiguity constitutes the fault; Hob. 285; which, however, does not appear to be of much account in modern pleading; Conn. Dig. Pleader (R 8); Gould, Pl. c. 6, § 36.

A special denial in the words of the allegation denied is a mere negative pregnant and a motion to make more definite and certain will lie; 60 Hun 582. A mere denial in the language of the complaint, that a partial payment was made on a specified day, is an admission that the payment was made on some other day; 81 Wis. 581.

NEGATIVE STATUTE. One which is enacted in negative terms, and which so controls the common law that it has no force in opposition to the statute. Bac. Abr. Statutes (G); Brook, Abr. Parliament, pl. 72; Bish. Writ. L. § 153.

NEGGLDARE. To claim kindred. Jac. L. Dict.

NEGLECT. To omit, as to neglect business, or payment, or duty, or work. It does not generally imply carelessness or imprudence, but simply an omission to do or perform some work, duty, or act. 54 N. Y. 282. See NEGLIGENCE. GROSS NEGLIGENCE. UNAVOIDABLE DELAY WILFUL NEGLIGENCE.

NEGLECTED CHILD. See DEFENDENT CHILD.

NEGLECTANCE. The omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or the doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. 11 Ex. 784. See Webb, Poll. Torts 537; 4 Ind. App. 515. The standard is not that of a particular man, but of the average prudent man; 3 Bing. n. c. 468.

The failure to observe, for the protection of the interests of another person, that degree of care, precaution, and vigilance which the circumstances justly demand, whereby such other person suffers injury. Cooley, Torts 630; 91 Cal. 298.

The absence of care according to circumstances. See 78 Pa. 219; 46 Tex. 356; 9 W. Va. 252.

Such an omission by a reasonable person, to use that degree of care, diligence, and skill which it was his legal duty to use for the protection of another person from injury as, in a natural and continuous sequence, causes unintended injury to the latter. 25 Fla. 1.

The failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or the doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. 95 U. S. 441. See 82 Wis. 408.

Negligence, in its civil relation, is such an inadvertent imperfection, by a responsible human agent, in the discharge of a legal duty, as immediately produces, in an ordinary and natural sequence, a damage to another. Whart. Negl. § 3. It is conceded by all the authorities that the standard by which to determine whether a person has been guilty of negligence is the conduct of the prudent or careful or diligent man. Bigelow, Torts 261; 73 Tex. 692; 85 Ky. 423; 129 Ill. 335; 85 Tenn. 465. See 116 Mo. 450.

It is synonymous with, or about equivalent to, common prudence. 79 Ga. 44.

The opposite of care and prudence, the omission to use the means reasonably necessary to avoid injury to others. 39 Ill. 353. Opposed to diligence or carefulness. 95 Cal. 279.

The result of a failure to perform a duty. 109 Mo. 187; 33 Neb. 802. It implies a duty as well as its breach, and the fact can never be found in the absence of a duty; 55 Ark. 428.

When a contract creates a duty, the neglect to perform that duty, as well as the negligent performance of it, is a ground of action for tort. Hence it is at the election of the party injured to sue either on the contract or on the tort; Whart. Negl. § 435; 4 Gray 485; 24 Conn. 392; but there must be privity of contract between the parties, therefore an attorney who made a mistake in drawing a will is not liable to a person who, by the mistake, is deprived of a gift intended for him by the testator; 110 Cal. 339.

It is said that liability for negligence depends on the probability of the consequences, i. e. its capability of being foreseen by a reasonable man; Poll. Torts 37.

A person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences, but not against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur. See 5 Ex. 248. Some cases have gone to the extent of maintaining an action in tort even where no attempt has been made to perform a contract; 13 Ired. 39; 11 Cl. & F. 1.

It is said not to be essential to constitute negligence that the damage caused might reasonably have been expected from the negligent act; Whart. Negl. § 16. Thus Gray, C. J., says, in 107 Mass. 494: "A man who negligently sets fire on his own land and keeps it negligently, is liable to an action at common law for any injury done by the spreading or communication of the fire directly from his own land to the property of another, whether through the air or along the ground, and whether he might or might not have reasonably anticipated the particular manner in which it was communicated." And in L. R. 6 C. P. 14, where a railway company left a pile of rubbish in hot weather by the side of their track, and the pile was ignited by sparks from an engine, and the fire crossed a field and burned the plaintiff's cottage, Channell, B., said: "When there is no direct evidence of negligence, the question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in considering the question whether there is evidence for the jury of negligence or not, . . . but when it has been once determined that there has been evidence of negligence, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not."

Where a person unlawfully injures another, he is liable in damages, without regard to the intention with which the act was done; 32 N. J. L. 554; 44 N. H. 211; and good faith does not excuse negligence; 32 Vt. 632; 3 Sneed 677. As to the right of action for negligence resulting in the death of the injured person, see ACTIO PERSONALIS MORITUR CUM PERSONA.

The damage caused must arise from inadvertence. If it be intentional, a suit for negligence will not lie; the remedy is in trespass and not case.

One negligent person cannot escape liability for his negligence because the negligence of another concurred in producing the injury; 119 Ind. 583.

Proof of negligence. The first requisite for the plaintiff is to show the existence of the duty which he alleges has not been performed, and then he must show a failure to observe this duty; that is, he must establish negligence on the defendant's part. This is an affirmative fact, the presumption always being, until the contrary appears, that every man will perform his duty; Cooley, Torts 659. It is not sufficient for the plaintiff to prove a state of facts consistent with the accident having been caused either by the negligence of the defendant or by that of the person injured. He must prove that it was caused by the defendant; 12 App. Cas. 41. In many cases evidence of the injury done makes out a prima facie case of negligence on the defendant's part; for instance, when a bailee returns in an injured condition an article loaned to him, or when a passenger on a railway train is injured without fault on his part.

As a general rule this liability cannot be avoided by stipulation; thus, a common carrier will not be permitted to contract for immunity from the results of its own negligence or that of its agents; 4 Ohio St. 362; 114 Pa. 523; 111 N. C. 482; 84 Ind. 281; 34 Ga. 815; 90 Tenn. 17; 2 Hill N. Y. 623; 101 Mo. 631; 84 Ill. 239; 14 Bush 590; 89 Ala. 294; 3 Col. 280; 41 Conn. 338; 4 Sandf. 136; 102 Mass. 552; 26 Gratt. 328; 3 Kan. 205; 69 Miss. 191; 9 Ir. R. C. L. 20; 75 Tex. 300; 4 Ben. 271; this may be considered as the rule generally followed in this country, in which the leading case is Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, where the authorities are collected by Bradley, J. In England, however, the courts seem to find no conclusive objection to sustaining such contracts when specially made; L. R. 10 Q. B. 212; 5 East 438; 23 U. C. Q. B. 600; and in New York, though the contracts are upheld, it is only when expressed in clear and specific language and not by mere general words in the usual printed bills of lading or receipts; 1 Jones & S. 423; 19 id. 196, following 56 N. Y. 168; 71 id. 180. So the liability may be limited in consideration of a reduced rate of transportation; 86 Va. 481; L. R. 8 H. L. 703; L. R. 10 Q. B. D. 250; 18 C. B. 805; 29 L. J. Ex. 441; or by special contract, for all negligence except gross; 42 Ill. App. 322. Such a contract, made in New York, was enforced in an action in Pennsylvania according to the law of New York; 128 Pa. 217. See 35 A. & E. R. Cas. 672; COMMON CARRIERS: FLAG.

By an act of February 13, 1893 (Harter Act), common carriers by land or sea cannot exempt themselves from responsibility for loss or damage arising from the negligence of their own servants, and any stipulation for such exemption is contrary to public policy and void. The Harter Act (q. v.) provides that if the owner of a vessel transporting merchandise to or from any port in the United States shall exercise due diligence to make the said vessel in all respects seaworthy, when properly manned, etc., neither the vessel, or her owner or charterer, shall be liable for errors in navigation or in the management of the vessel. In England, except so far as controlled by the railway and canal traffic act of 1854, carriers can exempt themselves from responsibility for loss occasioned by the negligence of servants; 42 Ch. D. 321; 168 U. S. 116.

Taking precaution after an accident against the future is not to be construed as an admission of responsibility for the past; 20 U. S. App. 326; so a subsequent alteration or repair of the machine which caused an injury is not evidence of negligence in its original construction; 144 U. S. 202.

There is a rule exempting public charitable corporations from liability for negligence, but the Young Men's Christian Association is not within the rule; 165 Mass. 260.

Law or fact. It is generally said that the question of negligence is a mixed question of law and fact, to be decided by the court when the facts are undisputed or conclusively proved, but not to be withdrawn from the jury when the facts are disputed, and the evidence is conflicting; Whart. Negl. § 420; 134 Ind. 269; see 17 R. I. 658; 86 W. Va. 329. In the great majority of cases the question is left to the jury to determine whether the defendant's conduct was reasonable under the circumstances. When a well-recognized legal duty rested upon the plaintiff, it is usual for the court to define this duty to the jury, and leave to it the question as to whether the plaintiff fulfilled this duty. More recently the courts have drawn a distinction between what is evidence of negligence for the jury and what is negligence per se, and therefore a question of law for the court, and the tendency has been rather to increase the number of cases in which the question of negligence is passed upon by the court. In Pennsylvania, when the standard of duty is defined by law, and is the same under all circumstances, and when there has been such an obvious disregard of duty and safety as amounts to misconduct, the courts have withdrawn the case from the consideration of the jury. It is said to be clear, by most of the authorities, that when the facts are found, and it is perfectly manifest that a prudent man would or would not do as the defendant has done, the court may rule accordingly, or rather, may direct the jury to find accordingly. The same is also true when the law has prescribed the nature of the duty, and also when there exists a well-known practice in the community, of a proper character. In other cases, the inference concerning negligence is left to the jury; Bigelow, Torts 263; 35 W. Va. 389. See Bigelow, L. C. Torts 589. When the evidence is conflicting, the court should instruct the jury that there would or would not be negligence, accordingly as they might find the facts; 110 N. C. 58.

When the circumstances of a case are such that the standard of duty is fixed, when the measure of duty is defined by law and is the same under all circumstances, its omission is negligence and may be so declared by the court. But it is said that when the negligence is clearly defined and palpable, such that no verdict of a jury could make it otherwise, or when there is no controversy as to the facts, and from these it clearly appears what course a person of ordinary prudence would pursue under the circumstances, the question of negligence is purely one of law." 2 Thomp. Negl. 1236.

"As a general rule, a question whether a party has been guilty of negligence or not, is one of fact, not of law. Where, however, the plaintiff brings action for a negligent injury, and the action of the two parties must have concurred to produce it, it devolves upon him to show that he was not himself guilty of negligence; and if he gives no evidence to establish that fact, the court may properly instruct the jury that they should return a verdict for defendant. Where, however, the question of negligence depends upon a disputed state of facts, or when the facts, though not disputed, are such that different minds might honestly draw different conclusions from them, the court cannot give such positive instructions, but must leave the jury to draw their own conclusions upon the facts, and upon the question of negligence depending upon them. To warrant the court in any case in instructing the jury that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, the case must be a very clear one against him, and one which would warrant no other inference." Per Cooley, C. J., in 17 Mich. 99.

It is true, in many cases, that when the facts are undisputed, the effect of them is for the judgment of the court. That is true in that class of cases when the existence of such facts comes in question, rather than when deductions or inferences are to be made from the facts (and see 25 Kan. 391). In some cases, too, the necessary inference from the proof is so certain that it may be ruled as a question of law. Certain facts we may suppose to be clearly established from which one sensible, impartial man would infer that proper care had not been used; another man, equally sensible, equally impartial, would infer that proper care had been used. It is this class of cases and those akin to it that the law commits to the decision of a jury. Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and of little education, men of learning and men whose learning consists in what they have themselves seen and heard, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer; these sit together, consult, apply their separate experiences of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw a unanimous conclusion. This average judgment thus given, it is the final effort of the law to obtain; 17 Wall. 683. Although the facts are undisputed, it is for the jury and not for the judge to determine whether proper care was given or whether they established negligence; 73 Ind. 261; 34 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 618; 48 Neb. 563.

The terms "ordinary care," "reasonable prudence," and such like terms have a relative significance, and cannot be arbitrarily defined; and, when the facts are such that reasonable men differ as to whether there was negligence, the determination of the matter is for the jury; 144 U. S. 408; as it is in all cases where the inference from the facts is not so plain as to make it a legal conclusion that there was negligence; 163 id. 93; and it is only where they would draw the same conclusion that it is a question of law for the court; id. 353; 33 U. S. App. 1; 65 Fed. Rep. 181; and a decision of the trial judge on the question is subject to review; id.

Whether a railroad company should erect guards at its car windows is a question for the jury; 19 U. S. App. 655; so also where a workman, returning from his work on the train and being ordered by the conductor to jump off at a station when the train was moving about four miles an hour and where the platform was about a foot lower than the car step, jumped and was seriously injured, the question of contributory negligence was for the jury; 163 U. S. 93.

It is said that a presumption of negligence arises from the occurrence of an accident in the course of a business, which may, according to expert testimony, be safely carried on if conducted with due care; 107 Cal. 549.

See 13 Am. L. Reg. n. s. 284, where the subject is fully treated and the earlier decisions collected by states.

In the absence of a contract between the parties, the burden of proof of negligence is on the plaintiff, and if the evidence is equally consistent with the existence or non-existence of negligence, it is not competent to the judge to leave the matter to the jury; 11 C. B. n. s. 588; but the rule of the burden of proof is modified when there is a relation of contract between the parties; Poll. Torts 416; as in cases of common-carriers, or where the thing which was the cause of the mischief was "under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident was such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care;" 3 H. & C. 586.

In actions for negligence the English rule is said to be that the "judge has to say whether any facts have been established from which negligence may be reasonably inferred; the jurors have to say whether, from those facts, negligence ought to be inferred;" 3 App. Cas. 197; or better, whether, as reasonable men, they do infer it; Poll. Torts 420.

Contributory negligence. If the evidence shows that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury, there can be no recovery; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 14. The distinction, however, must be drawn between condition and causes, between causa causans and causa sine qua non. The question must always be considered whether the act of the plaintiff had a natural tendency to expose him directly to the danger which resulted in the injury complained of. If it had not, the plaintiff's negligence is not considered in law as contributing to the injury. Thus, when the defendant was driving carelessly along the highway, and ran into and injured the plaintiff's donkey, which was straying improperly on the highway with his fore feet fettered, it was held that the plaintiff's negligence had not contributed to the accident; 10 M. & W. 546. It has also been held that if the plaintiff could by the exercise of reasonable care, at or just before the happening of the injury to him, have avoided the same, he cannot recover; 5 C. B. n. s. 373; 75 Mich. 557; 126 Ill. 381. One who sees or could have seen if he had looked, and has the facilities to understand the dangers to which he is exposed, is charged with a knowledge of them; and his failure to act on the knowledge as a prudent and cautious man would act under like circumstances, is negligence which, notwithstanding the negligence of the defendant, will defeat a recovery; 73 Cal. 137. And when it appears that the plaintiff, by the defendant's misconduct, became frightened, and in endeavoring to escape the consequence of the defendant's misconduct, rushed into danger and was injured, the plaintiff's conduct does not contribute to the injury; 56 N. Y. 585. If, through the defendant's negligence, the injured person is placed in a position of peril and confronted with sudden danger, the law does not require him to exercise the same degree of care and caution that it does of a person who has ample opportunities for the full exercise of his judgment; 148 Ill. 409; 155 Pa. 279. See 153 U. S. 262. It is a general principle that one who invites another upon his premises is bound to exercise more than ordinary care towards him. If the person giving the invitation is alone benefited he is responsible for even the slightest negligence. So a storekeeper, who either expressly or impliedly invites the public to enter his place of business for the purpose of trading must exercise a high degree of care to keep his premises in a safe condition, and where such person is accidentally injured the shopkeeper is liable in the absence of negligence on the part of the person injured; 80 Cal. 574; 26 Neb. 118; 82 Mich. 1; 27 Ill. App. 391; 82 Ia. 652; 48 N. Y. 1046; 84 Ala. 186; 134 Pa. 203; so letter-carriers have an implied invitation to enter certain buildings for the purpose of placing mail in boxes; 152 Mass. 513; 52 N. Y. 801; and an employee and contractor for the construction of a building is not a trespasser and may maintain an action for injuries; 58 Hun 610; 12 N. Y. 482. See Webb, Elevators. A person invited to come upon a ship for the purpose of business is entitled to be protected by the exercise of such care and prudence as would render the premises reasonably safe; 8 U. S. App. 129; and one who, while riding in a private carriage of another at his invitation, is injured by the negligence of a third party, may recover against the latter, notwithstanding the negligence of the driver of the carriage may have contributed to the injury; 4 U. S. App. 542. But the owner of land and of buildings is not liable to one who is on his premises as a mere licensee. As one who enters on premises by permission only, without any inducement being held out to him by the occupant, cannot recover for injuries caused by obstructions or pitfalls; 143 Ill. 183; unless it was unlawful to erect the machine or contrivance, or the injury was wilful and wanton; the wilfulness will be presumed from gross negligence; 70 Tex. 400; 23 N. Y. 548; where an elevator is out of order or is intended for freight only and not for passengers, and notice of such fact is duly posted, one who has a reasonable opportunity for seeing and reading such posted notice assumes the risk of venturing on or near such elevator; 137 Ind. 15; 58 Hun 60; 148 Mass. 95; 156 id. 511. There is an ambiguity in the use of the word license in decisions relating to negligence. It is sometimes used for surferance of a trespass; L. R. 1 C. P. 274; sometimes equivalent to invitation; 4 C. B. n. s. 563, 567. See, also, 2 C. P. D. 310. When the defendant might, by proper care, have avoided the consequences of the plaintiff's negligence, the plaintiff may still recover; 85 N. C. 512; 144 U. S. 408; 139 id. 551. See 70 Tex. 602. Contributory negligence has been held to be no defence where defendant's negligence was reckless or wanton; 89 Kan. 581. See 111 N. C. 60.

Contributory negligence is a good defence to an action for damages for a personal injury; and it is immaterial to what extent it is proven, provided it contributed to the injury; 8 Houst. 185; 29 W. Va. 98; in order to bar a recovery, the contributory negligence must have been a proximate cause of the injury; 97 N. C. 11; 100 id. 280; 84 Va. 498; 17 Nev. 245.

In some cases it has been held that the plaintiff must show affirmatively that he was in the exercise of due care, when the injury happened; 83 Ill. 354; 19 Conn. 566; 78 N. Y. 480; 101 Mass. 455; 8 Misc. Rep. 224; 48 Ill. App. 534; 84 Me. 334; 24 U. S. App. 326. This is frequently termed the Illinois rule. Probably the proof need not be direct, but may be inferred from the circumstances of the case; 104 Mass. 187; 2 Thomp. Negl. 1178, n. In other states, contributory negligence is a matter of defence, the burden of proving which is on the defendant; 66 Pa. 30; 85 id. 275; 22 Minn. 152; 65 Mo. 34; 35 Ohio St. 627; 3 Mo. App. 565; 50 Cal. 70; 11 W. Va. 14; 43 Wis. 513; 95 Ala. 897; 88 Ga. 599; 6 U. S. App. 381; 147 U. S. 571; 151 id. 73; 157 Pa. 503; 28 Am. Rep. 558, where the cases are discussed. But even in these courts, if the plaintiff's own showing discloses contributory negligence, he cannot recover. The rule that a plaintiff cannot recover, if himself guilty of contributory negligence, applies where the party inflicting the injury is not guilty of negligence indulged in after the position of the injured party was discovered, or, by the exercise then of reasonable care, could have been discovered; 23 U. S. App. 448.

The fact that the plaintiff lived in his home near a powder magazine, with knowledge of the danger, does not constitute contributory negligence; 12 U. S. App. 665.

The burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant; 24 U. S. App. 176; 147 U. S. 571. It has been said that the true rule is that the onus of proving contributory negligence rests in the first instance on the defendant, although the plaintiff may disclose upon his own case such evidence of it as to relieve the defendant of that primary obligation and shift on to the plaintiff the onus of displacing the effect of his own evidence; 12 Q. B. D. 71.

If the plaintiff, by ordinary care, could have avoided the effect of the negligence of the defendant, he is guilty of contributory negligence, no matter how careless the defendant may have been at the last or any preceding stage; Tuff v. Warman, 2 C. B. n. s. 740. "The true ground of contributory negligence being a bar is that it is the proximate cause (or 'decisive' cause) of the mischief; and negligence on the plaintiff's part, which is only part of the inducing cause (i. e. a 'condition,' not a 'cause'; Whart. Negligence) will not dis-able him"; Poll. Torts 434; and it "would seem that a person who has by his own act or default deprived himself of ordinary ability to avoid the consequences of another's negligence, can be in no better position than if, having such ability, he had failed to avoid them; unless, indeed, the other has notice of his inability in time to use care appropriate to the emergency; in which case the failure to use that care is the decisive negligence." Poll. Torts 434.

No one is bound to anticipate that others will be guilty of negligence. See L. R. 5 H. L. 45.

Where one is in danger through fault of another and chooses between two methods of escape, he is not negligent if he chooses that which, otherwise, would not be prudent; 12 Q. B. 439. See, further, 15 Wall. 401; 41 Wis. 105; 44 N. Y. 465; 28 Am. Rep. 563, n.; 20 Alb. L. J. 304, 359.

The question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury, under proper instructions, and is not one of law for the court; 9 Utah 141; 144 U. S. 408; 71 Hun 526; 43 Ill. App. 418; 6 Ind. App. 890. Where the evidence of contributory negligence is not of such a conclusive character as would warrant the court in setting aside a verdict, the question should be left to the jury; 147 U. S. 571.

Comparative negligence. In Illinois a rule of comparative negligence has been laid down. If, on comparing the negligence of the plaintiff with that of the defendant, or the negligence of the person injured with that of the person inflicting the injury, the former is found to have been slight and the latter gross, the plaintiff may recover. See 20 Ill. 478; 83 id. 403; 95 id. 25. In 36 Ill. 409, it was said: "The rule of this court is that negligence is relative, and that the plaintiff, although guilty of negligence which may have contributed to the injury, may hold the defendant liable if he has been guilty of a higher degree of negligence, amounting to wilful injury. The fact that the plaintiff is guilty of slight negligence does not absolve the defendant from the use of care and the use of reasonable efforts to avoid the injury." It has also been held that the negligence of the plaintiff must be but slight, and that of the defendant gross in comparison; and both of these terms, "gross" and "slight," or their equivalents, should be used in every instruction to a jury on the subject. "Want of ordinary care is not equivalent to gross negligence;" 8 Bradw. 133; a mere preponderance of negligence against the defendant will not make him liable; 96 Ill. 42. The doctrine of comparative negligence has no application unless the person injured observed ordinary care for his safety with reference to the particular circumstances involved; 44 Ill. App. 56.

This doctrine has been adopted to a certain extent in Kansas; 14 Kan. 37; and perhaps in Georgia. See 30 Fla. 1; 35 W. Va. 359; 87 Mich. 400.

In admiralty, where both ships are in fault, the damages are equally divided; Marsden, Coll. ch. 6; this rule is preserved by the Judiciary Act in the Admiralty Division. See 2 L. Quart. R. 337; 13 id. 17; COLLISION; Report, Int. Law Assn. 1895.

Imputed negligence. In cases of actions brought by infants of tender years for damages caused by the defendant's negligence, it has sometimes been held that the negligence of the parent or guardian of the infant, in permitting it to become exposed to danger, is to be imputed to the infant so as to bar its right of action. This rule was laid down in Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615. The doctrine has been much discussed, and this case has been followed, sometimes with modification. See 104 Mass. 53; 88 Ill. 441; 28 Ind. 287; 2 Neb. 319; 52 Cal. 602; 83 Ala. 371; 78 Hun 248; but in other states, especially Pennsylvania (57 Pa. 187; 81 id. 19), its doctrine has been denied; 22 Vt. 213; 59 Tex. 64; 78 La. 598; 64 Mich. 514; 16 Neb. 189; 36 Mo. 439; 23 Vroom 446; 142 Mass. 301. The weight of authority is against the New York rule; 30 Ohio St. 451; 19 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 730; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 446. But see L. R. 1 Ex. 239. See, as to injuries to infants, 31 Am. Rep. 206; 14 Cent. L. J. 282. See 15 N. J. L. J. 262.

A child of such tender years as to be incapable of exercising any judgment or discretion is not chargeable with contributory negligence; but where he has attained such an age as to be capable of exercising judgment and discretion, he is held to such a degree of care as might be reasonably expected of one of his age and mental capacity; 39 Minn. 164; 46 Ohio St. 283; 70 Tex. 530; 83 Ala. 371; 81 Ga. 397; 39 Kan. 531; 129 Ill. 91.

At what age an infant's responsibility for negligence is presumed to begin is a question of law for the court; 20 N. Y. S. 262.

The negligence of a gripman on a cable car in running across the crossing of another road undergoing repairs, at an excessive rate of speed, is imputable to the conductor of such car in control of such gripman, and will prevent him recovering for injuries sustained by reason of such negligence; 53 Mo. App. 276.

A vessel colliding with an obstruction to navigation cannot be charged with the negligence of a tug acting as an independent contractor in towing her, and wholly controlling her movements; 63 Fed. Rep. 626.

In England, where a passenger has been injured by concurrent negligence of his own carrier and a third party, it was formerly held that the carrier's negligence was imputed to the passenger and barred his recovery; Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115. But the doctrine has been overruled in 13 App. Cas. 1. It was rejected in 47 N. J. L. 101; 19 N. Y. 341; 36 Ohio St. 86; 105 Ill. 364; and, after a review of the authorities, in 116 U. S. 366. It was followed in 39 Ia. 523; 105 Mass. 77; 43 Wis. 513.

The negligence of a husband cannot be imputed to his wife, who was riding with him over a defective highway, unless it be shown that he was at that time under her control and direction; 48 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 134. Such is the weight of the authorities; 36 Fed. Rep. 164; 111 N. Y. 199. There are cases to the contrary; 50 Conn. 379; 46 Ill. 402; 60 Ia. 429; 62 Tex. 344. See ORDINARY NEGLIGENCE; WANTON NEGLIGENCE, LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

NEGLIGENT ESCAPE. The omission on the part of a gaoler to take such care of a prisoner as he is bound to take, when in consequence thereof the prisoner departs from his confinement without the knowledge or consent of the gaoler, and eludes pursuit.

For a negligent escape, the sheriff or keeper of the prison is liable to punishment, in a criminal case; and in a civil case he is liable to an action for damages at the suit of the plaintiff. In both cases the prisoner may be retaken; 3 Bla. Com. 415. See ESCAPE.

NEGLIGENTLY. The failure to use the highest degree of care. 149 Ky. 346, 149 S. W. 835.

NEGOTIABLE. In Mercantile Law. A term applied to a contract, the right of action on which is capable of being transferred by indorsement (of which delivery is an essential part), in case the undertaking is to A or his order, A or his agent, and the like, or by delivery alone, in case the undertaking is to A or bearer,—the assignee in either case having a right to sue in his own name.

That which is capable of being transferred, by assignment, indorsement, or by delivery. 148 Pa. 583.

At common law, choses in action were not assignable; but exceptions to this rule have grown up by mercantile usage as to some classes of simple contracts, and others have been introduced by statute, so that now bills of exchange, promissory notes, and bank-notes, to order or bearer, are universally negotiable; and notes not to order or bearer have become quasi negotiable; that is, an indorsement will give a right of action in the name of the assignor; and in some states, by statute, bonds and other specialties are assignable by indorsement.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS. Besides notes, bills, and checks, the following have been held to be negotiable instruments: exchequer bills; 4 B. & Ald. 1; 12 Cl. & F. 787, 805; state and municipal bonds; 3 B. & C. 45; 96 U. S. 51; 3 Wall. 327; 113 U. S. 135; corporate bonds; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 758, 154; L. R. 11 Eq. 478; 21 How. 575; [1892] 3 Ch. 527; coupon bonds of an individual; 6 Ben. 175; coupon bonds of a corporation; 9 Wall. 477; 14 id. 282; 20 id. 583; 66 N. Y. 14; 44 Pa. 63 (the question has been whether such coupons are negotiable apart from the bonds to which they were formerly attached, and the decisions establish their negotiability; 102 Mass. 503); government scrip; L. R. 10 Ex. 337; U. S. treasury notes; 21 Wall. 138; 57 N. Y. 573; post-office orders; 65 Law Times 52; certificates of deposit; 13 How. 218; Pars. Bills 1, 2, 20; 34 Neb. 71; 40 id. 484. The following have been held not to be negotiable: lottery tickets; 8 Q. B. 134; dividend warrants; 9 Q. B. 396; iron scrip notes; 3 Macq. 1; debentures, on which authorities differ; L. R. 8 Q. B. 374; pass-book of savings bank; 60 Conn. 300; a treasury warrant not presented for three years, the amount having been covered back into the treasury; 27 Ct. Cls. 177.

In some of the states statutes have been enacted in regard to the nature and operation of bills of lading and warehouse receipts, but the statutes and interpretations of them lack uniformity. Warehouse receipts, bills of lading; 14 M. & W. 403; 44 Md. 11; 115 Mass. 224; 12 Barb. 310; 101 U. S. 559; letters of credit; 2 How. 249; 40 Tex. 306; 10 Fet. 482; 22 Pick. 226; 1 Macq. H. L. C. 513; certificates of stock; 28 N. Y. 600, 604; 86 Pa. 80; 74 N. Y. 226 (but see 53 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 291); county warrants are negotiable, transferable, or assignable; but not in the sense of the law merchant; 103 U. S. 74.

The weight of authority is in favor of the negotiability of instruments payable to bearer; 14 Conn. 362; [1891] 1 Ch. 370.

An instrument in the form of a promissory note drawn by a corporation, and bearing its seal, is not a promissory note negotiable by the law merchant; per Blatchford, J., in 8 Fed. Rep. 534.

Any addition to the form of a note which destroys its essential quality of a promise to pay, "simple, certain, unconditional, not subject to any contingency," will destroy its negotiable character; 84 Pa. 409. Thus, the addition of the words, "given as collateral security with agreement," 127 Mass. 293; "a warrant to confess judgment," 77 Pa. 131; "in facilities," 14 Mass. 322; "foreign bills," 4 id. 245; "and it is the understanding it will be renewed at maturity," 126 Pa. 195; "return notice ticket with this order," and "deposit book must be at bank before money can be paid," 139 Pa. 53; "with exchange" in varying forms with respect to place; 28 Fed. Rep. 865; 38 id. 283; 23 U. C. C. P. 503; 4 N. Dak. 30; 15 Ind. App. 563; contra, 39 Mich. 137; 55 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 988; 3 N. M. 45; 4 Biss. 473; with counsel fees, expenses of collection, or other words to the same effect; 84 N. C. 27; 63 Mo. 35; 14 Fed. Rep. 705; 37 id. 708; 60 Wis. 206; contra, 32 Ia. 184; 31 Fed. Rep. 649; 16 id. 89; 2 id. 44; 18 Kan. 432.

A note containing a tax clause is not negotiable; 35 L. R. A. 537; 110 N. Y. 469; nor is one given for rent and subject to set-off for repairs; 40 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 1010.

Contracts are not necessarily negotiable because by their terms they inure to the benefit of the bearer. Hence, a receipt acknowledging that a person has received from another named so many shares of stock in a specified corporation, entitling the bearer to so many dollars in certain bonds to be issued, is not free in the hands of a transferee from equities which would have affected it in the hands of the original recipient; 7 Wall. 392.

Indorsements of payment on the back of a promissory note before delivery do not destroy negotiability; 182 Pa. 24.

The rule in Illinois that a negotiable note, secured by a mortgage, transferred to a bona fide holder before maturity, is held subject to all equities between the original parties, is not binding on the federal courts, which hold in such cases that in a suit in equity brought to foreclose the mortgage, no other defences are allowed against it than would be allowed in an action at law to recover on the notes; 31 Fed. Rep. 658. Coupons attached to a railroad bond and payable to bearer, when detached and negotiated, are no longer incidents of the bond, but independent negotiable instruments; 34 Fla. 424. See COUPONS.

"By the decisive weight of authority in this country where negotiable paper has been put in circulation, and there is no infirmity or defence between the antecedent parties thereto, a purchaser of such securities is entitled to recover thereon, as against the maker, the whole amount, irrespective of what he may have paid therefor." 149 U. S. 327. See 107 Mass. 552; 25 Wis. 544; 33 Ia. 140.

A negotiable instrument act, codifying the law on the subject, went into effect in New York, October 1, 1897. It has also been enacted by Connecticut, Colorado.

Maryland, Massachusetts, Virginia, and Florida. One of the most important changes is in the rule of Coddington v. Bay, 5 Johns. Ch. 34, and provides that an antecedent indebtedness is a valuable consideration.

As to the early history of negotiable instruments, see 9 Law Quart. Rev. 70.

See generally, Dos Passos, Stock Brokers; 7 Harv. L. Rev. 1; Daniel, Negotiable Instruments; PROMISSORY NOTES; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; BOND; COUPONS.

A form of property. Not mere evidence of the interest which they represent, or of debt. (q. v.) 250 U. S. 381, citing 177 Mass. 337. See FOREIGN MONEY.

NEGOTIATE. The power to negotiate a bill or note is the power to indorse and deliver it to another, so that the right of action thereon shall pass to the indorser or holder. 43 Md. 581. See 69 N. Y. 369; 30 Minn. 408. A note transferred by delivery is negotiated; 49 Mo. App. 153. A national bank, under the power to negotiate evidences of debt, may exchange government bonds for registered bonds; 69 N. Y. 383.

To negotiate is a general word coming to us from the Latin and signifies to carry on negotiations concerning, and so to conduct business, to conclude a contract or to transfer or arrange. 70 S. W. 188.

NEGOTIATION. The deliberation which takes place between the parties touching a proposed agreement.

That which transpires in the negotiation makes no part of the agreement, unless introduced into it. It is a general rule that no evidence can be given to add to, diminish, contradict, or alter a written instrument; Leake, Contr. 26; 1 Dall. 426; 8 S. & R. 609. But this rule has been much modified, and parol evidence is now held admissible to contradict, vary, or even avoid a written instrument where it would not have been executed but for the oral stipulation, except in the case of negotiable paper; 90 Pa. 82. See EVIDENCE.

As to negotiations preceding a contract, see MERGER.

In Mercantile Law. The act by which a bill of exchange or promissory note is put into circulation by being passed by one of the original parties to another person.

The transfer of a bill or note in the form and manner prescribed by the law merchant, with the incidents and privileges annexed thereby, i. e. :—

The transferee can sue all parties to the instrument in his own name;

The consideration for the transfer is prima facie presumed;

The transferor can under certain conditions give a good title, although he has none himself;

The transferee can further negotiate the bill with the like privileges and incidents.

There are two modes of negotiation, viz.: by delivery and by indorsements. The former applies to bills, etc., payable to bearer; the latter to those payable to order. See Chalm. Dig. of Bills, etc. § 106; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 14; Byles, Bills 169.

Until an accommodation bill or note has been negotiated, there is no contract which can be enforced on the note; the contract, either express or implied, that the party accommodated will indemnify the other, is, till then, conditional; 2 M. & G. 911. See CONTRACT; MERGER.

NEGOTIUM GESTOR (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who spontaneously, and without authority, undertakes to act for another, during his absence, in his affairs.

In cases of this sort, as he acts wholly without authority, there can, strictly speaking, be no contract; but the civil law raises a quasi mandate by implication for the benefit of the owner, in many such cases; Mackelday, Civ. Law, § 460; 2 Kent 616, n.; Story, Bailm. §§ 82, 189.

NEGRO. A black man descended from the black race of Southern Africa; it has been held not to include a mulatto; 18 Ala. 726. See MIXED BURY; CIVIL RIGHTS;

RAILROAD; MISCEGENATION, COLORED PEOPLE.

NELIF, NAIF, NATIVUS. In Old English Law. A woman who was born a villein, or a bond-woman.

NEIGHBOR. One who lives in close proximity to another. The expression neighbour was discussed in 1 A. C. 22, where the following condition was embodied in a deed of grant: "That he (the grantee) shall have only four days at a time during the seasons the use of the water (meaning a stream called the Congo River) in succession with his neighbours, who now or hereafter may be dependant upon the stream for the use of their respective lands; De Villiers, C. J., held that the servitude must be construed strictly, and that the word neighbour, in that case must be confined to the proprietor of the next adjoining farm. 1 A. C., 22 (So. Africa.)

NEIGHBORHOOD. A surrounding or adjoining district. It depends upon no arbitrary rule of distance or topography. The neighborhood of a person will cover a larger space in a sparsely settled country than in a city; 116 Mo. 162. See 22 Ill. App. 179; 63 N. H. 246.

It is not synonymous with territory or district, but is a collective noun, with the suggestion of proximity, and refers to the units which make up its whole, as well as to the region which comprehends those units. A district or locality, especially when considered with relation to its inhabitants or their interests. 32 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 803.

NEM. CON. See NEMINE CONTRADICENTE.

NEM. DISS. See NEMINE DISSENTIENTE; NEMINE CONTRADICENTE.

NEMINE CONTRADICENTE (usually abbreviated nem. con.). Words used to signify the unanimous consent of the house to which they are applied. In England, they are used in the house of commons; in the house of lords, the words used to convey the same idea are nemine dissentiente.

NEMINE DISSENTIENTE. No one dissenting; abbreviated nem. diss. Stand. Dict. See NEMINE CONTRADICENTE.

NEPHEW. The son of a brother or sister. Ambli. 514; 1 Jac. 207.

The Latin nepos, from which nephew is derived, was used in the civil law for nephew, but more properly for grandson; and we accordingly find neveu, the original form of nephew, in the sense of grandson. Britton, c. 119.

According to the civil law, a nephew is in the third degree of consanguinity; according to the common law, in the second; the latter is the rule of common law; 2 Bla. Com. 206. But in this country the rule of the civil law is adopted; 2 Hilt. R. P. 194.

Nephews and nieces may be shown by circumstances to include grand-nephews and grand-nieces, and even a great-grand-niece; 8 Barb. Ch. 466; 131 N. Y. 456; but in a bequest, would not include, without special mention, nephews and nieces by marriage; 42 Pa. 25. See LEGACY.

NEPOS (Lat.). A grandson. See NEPHEW.

NEPTIS (Lat.). Granddaughter; sometimes great-granddaughter. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Code 33. See LEGACY.

NERVOUSNESS. See ILLNESS.

An instruction allowing recovery for "mental pain or nervous or physical suffering" is erroneous in the use of the word "nervous." 156 Ky. 828, 162 S. W. 110.

NET. Clear of all charges and deductions; that which remains after the deduction of all charges or outlay, as net profit. 22 Wall. 148.

NET BALANCE. In commercial usage it means the balance of the proceeds after deducting the expenses incident to the sale. 71 Pa. 74.

NET EARNINGS. The excess of the gross earnings over the expenditures defrayed in producing them, aside from, and exclusive of, the expenditure of capital laid out in constructing and equipping the works themselves. 99 U. S. 420. See 27 Fed. Rep. 1; 10 Blatchf. 271; 22 Wall. 148; 110 U. S. 205; 25 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 494. See EARNINGS.

NET PROFITS. This term does not mean what is made over the losses, expenses, and interest on the amount invested; it includes simply the gain that accrues on the investment, after deducting the losses and expenses of the business. 30 Ga. 350. See 40 N. J. Eq. 114. See PROFITS.

The words "net profits" define themselves. They mean what shall remain, as the clear gains of any business venture, after deducting the capital invested in the business, the expenses incurred in its conduct, and the losses sustained in its prosecution. Anderson; 40 N. J. Eq. 121. In the law of partnerships, "profits" are the excess of returns over advances; the excess of what is obtained over the cost of obtaining it. "Losses" are the excess of advances over returns; the excess of the cost of obtaining over what is obtained. "Profits" and "net profits" are, for all legal purposes, synonymous expressions; but the returns themselves are often called "gross profits"; hence it becomes necessary to call profits "net profits," to avoid confusion. Id.; Lindley, Partn. 15. See INCOME.

NET VALUE. The "net value" of a policy is the "reserve" or that part of the annual premiums paid by the insured, which, according to the American experience table of mortality, must be set apart to meet or mature the company's obligations to the insured, under the policy. 151 Ky. 609, 152 S. W. 780.

NETHER HOUSE OF PARLIAMENT. The house of commons so called in the time of Henry VIII.

NEUTRAL. In International Law. On neither side; taking neither side; belonging to neither side; indifferent between contending parties. See NEUTRALITY.

NEUTRAL PROPERTY. Property which belongs to neutral owners, and is used, treated, and accompanied by proper insignia as such.

Where the insured party has property and commercial establishments and depositories in different countries, if the property and concern of any one are in, or belong to, a belligerent country, they will have the national character of such country though the national character of the owner may be that of a neutral; 1 Phil. Ins. § 164; 5 W. Rob. 302; 1 Wheat. 159; 16 Johns. 128. The declaration of war by a nation subsequently to the time in reference to which the policy takes effect will, however, only affect ownership thereafter acquired or acts thereafter done; 6 Cra. 274; 4 Mas. 258; 1 Johns. 192; 14 id. 308; 1 C. Rob. 107, 336; 6 id. 364; 8 Wheat. 245; 8 Gall. 274; 12 Mass. 246.

The description of the subject in a policy of insurance as neutral or belonging to neutrals, is, as in other cases, a warranty that the property is what it is described to be, and it must, accordingly, in order to comply with the warranty, not only belong to neutral owners at the time of making the insurance, but must continue to be so owned during the period for which it is insured, and must, so far as it depends upon the assured, be accompanied by the usual insignia, as such, and in all respects represented, managed, and used as such; 1 Johns. 192; 1 Wash. C. C. 219; 6 Cra. 274; 4 Mas. 258; 1 C. Rob. 26, 836; 2 id. 133, 218.

NEUTRAL SPIRITS. See WHISKEY.

NEUTRALITY. The state of a nation which takes no part between two or more other nations at war with each other.

"Strictly speaking, [neutrality] consists in abstinence from any participation in a public, private, or civil war, and in impartiality of conduct toward both parties, but the maintenance unbroken of peaceful relations between two powers when the domestic peace of one of them is disturbed, is not neutrality in the sense in which the word is used when the disturbance has acquired such head as to have demanded the recognition of belligerency; and, as mere matter of municipal administration, no nation can permit unauthorized acts of war within its territory in infringement of its sovereignty, while good faith towards friendly nations requires their prevention." 166 U. S. 52.

"The relation of neutrality will be found to consist in two principal circumstances: Entire abstinence from any participation in the war, and impartiality of conduct towards both belligerents." 3 Phill. Int. L. 225. They remain the common friends of the belligerents, favoring the arms of neither to the detriment of the other; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 141.

A recent writer (Risley, Law of War) has classified the rights and duties of neutrals thus:—

A neutral state must abstain from the following acts:—

Furnishing either belligerent with troops, arms, warlike materials, ships of war, or money. Allowing passage of forces of either belligerent across its territory. Deciding in its courts upon the validity of captures made by either belligerent. Acquiring, during the war, any conquest made by either belligerent.

It must restrain the conduct of its subjects in the following respects:—

Pecuniary gifts or gratuitous loans to either belligerent. Enlistment within its jurisdiction in the forces of either belligerent.

It must prevent the following by all persons within its jurisdiction:—

The issue of commissions by persons acting for either belligerent within the jurisdiction. The fitting out of hostile expeditions on behalf of either belligerent. The use of its ports by the ships of either belligerent as a base of operations and supplies.

It must suffer certain interferences with the trade of its subjects by permitting both belligerents to exercise the following rights: To prevent carriage of contraband and breach of blockade; to capture enemy ships carrying neutral goods; and to exercise the right of search.

It has been said that there should be, on the part of a neutral state, not an impartiality of action, but of non-action; Masse, Droit Com. 199.

Where a neutral has bound itself, by previous treaty, to one belligerent, assistance under such treaty does not necessarily forfeit its neutral character; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 142.

The recognition of the belligerency of insurgents relieves the parent state from all responsibility for damages for any irregularities committed against neutrals by the other belligerent, which claims could be enforced against the parent nation if the injuries were committed by insurgents.

Maritime warfare, with its incidents of blockade and the right of search, imposes heavy burdens and restrictions upon all commercial nations; in the view of international law it is the right of sovereigns alone; 25 Fed. Rep. 408.

The public ships of a neutral are inviolable; and so are its private ships, subject, however, to laws relating to a breach of blockade, contraband, and search. Neutral territory, including the sea for a distance of three miles from low-water mark, is inviolable. If a ship is captured in neutral waters, in violation of neutrality, the neutral power is bound to enforce its restoration or compensate the injured belligerent; and, in general, a neutral is bound to prevent and punish a violation of its rights as a neutral by either belligerent; Halleck,

Int. L., Baker's ed. 143.

Where a United States war vessel captured a Confederate steamer in a neutral port of Brazil and brought it to a United States port, and it was there sunk by a collision, and the United States disavowed the action of its ship in making the capture, it was held that as the capture was unlawful, or had been disavowed by the government, it was as if it had never been made; 101 U. S. 37. A neutral may demand the return of a captured vessel and further redress. But where a neutral ship chooses to resist capture in neutral waters, its capture is not an offence against the neutral; Cobb, Int. L. Cas. 230.

"Where neutral immunity is violated by illegal outfit and equipment, the offence is deposited after the termination of the voyage; 6 Wheat. 848. A neutral ship should, ordinarily, submit to capture and seek its remedies in the courts for damage; 1 Rob. 374.

It has been suggested that a belligerent who has begun an attack on another belligerent outside of neutral territory or water may continue the contest within the neutral waters and complete the capture; 5 C. Rob. 885; but on the other hand it is said that the inviolability of neutral territory should allow of no exceptions, and that property captured under such circumstances must be restored, though it actually belonged to the enemy; 5 C. Rob. 15; 3 Phill. Int. L. 388.

It belongs exclusively to the neutral government to raise the question of a capture made within neutral territory; 6 Wall. 266; the owner of the captured ship must assert his claim through his government; 1 Kent 121; an enemy cannot do so; 5 Wall. 517; but whenever a capture is made by a belligerent in violation of neutral rights, if the prize come voluntarily within the jurisdiction of the neutral, it should be restored to its original owner; 3 Phill. Int. L. 582; 5 Wheat. 885.

A public vessel of a belligerent may enter a neutral port to make such repairs or to take in such coal and provisions as may be necessary; but the ordinary rule is that it must not remain more than twenty-four hours, except in case of necessity.

A belligerent vessel may bring a prize into a neutral port and sell it there, with the consent of the neutral; 5 Mas. 77; and a neutral may permit a prize to be brought into its ports for repairs; 1 Op. A. G. 608; but neutrals may prohibit this and have often, by proclamation, done so; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 148.

Where a neutral allows the right of passage through its territory to one belligerent, it must accord it to both; 3 Phill. Int. L. 188; 1 Kent *120; 21 Rev. de Dr. Int. 117. The troops of a belligerent cannot cross neutral territory, nor can even the wounded be taken across neutral territory, without the express permission of the neutral, which, in the case of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, was refused by Belgium; nor can a neutral allow its ports and waters to be used as a base of operations or supplies, or as a point from which to watch the other belligerent. Rules are generally laid down by neutrals in each war to regulate these questions.

The subjects of neutral states are entitled to carry on, upon their own account, a trade with a belligerent; this doctrine is well settled; 3 Phill. Int. L. 300. But it was considered unlawful, under the common law, for an English subject to raise a loan to support the subjects of a foreign state at war with a government in alliance with his own; 3 Phill. Int. L. 247; yet it now appears to be the opinion that, although the neutral state cannot loan money, yet the individual citizens of a neutral state may, and such loans are not considered a violation of neutrality any more than the sales of arms and ammunition; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 119. But such loans to an insurgent state or colony have been considered unlawful; Risley, Law of War; 9 Moore, P. C. 586.

A neutral will not permit a belligerent's ship to coal in its ports except in case of necessity, and then only to the extent necessary to carry them to their nearest home port; and a belligerent vessel cannot take on coal again at any port of such neutral within three months.

It was formerly held that citizens of a neutral state may send armed vessels as well as munitions of war to a belligerent port for sale; 7 Wheat. 283; though they would be subject, of course, to capture as contraband. But this doctrine has been modified as between the United States and Great Britain by the treaty relating to the Alabama claims, by which those nations agreed that "A neutral state is bound: 1. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, etc., within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace, and also to use due diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel, etc., such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use." 2. "Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men." It is said that there is a growing consensus of nations in favor of some rule resembling these; Risley, Law of War 304.

A belligerent may capture certain articles as contraband of war when carried in neutral ships and having a hostile destination. This includes munitions of war. Other articles are of doubtful use, ancipitis usus, and may be contraband or not according to circumstances. There is no settled definition of contraband, nor any practice in regard to its exact limits. Provisions, money, or coal destined for the use of a belligerent army or fleet have been included within the term. Coal is declared contraband in the proclamation of President McKinley, April 26, 1898, and by the British government on the breaking out of the Hispano-American war. Where things are of doubtful use, that is, occasional contraband, they are not usually confiscated, but are bought by the captor at a fair price. This is called Pre-emption (q. v.), and usually applies to cargoes of provisions. See CONTRABAND; 1 Kent 138.

The question whether a belligerent may take the goods of its enemy, not contraband, which are being carried in a neutral ship, has been much discussed, and also whether innocent goods of a neutral can be transported in a belligerent's vessel without being confiscated when the vessel is captured. Formerly it was held that a belligerent might take enemy's goods from neutral custody, on the high seas. But the Declaration of Paris changed the rule of the nations, except the United States, Spain, and Venezuela, and a neutral flag now covers enemy's goods with the exception of contraband of war. This is a general rule of international law, although some treaties made by the United States have laid down a different rule; Snow, Int. Law 164; it was applied by the United States during the war of the Rebellion; 1 Kent 128; and adopted by it in the Hispano-American war of 1898.

By the Declaration of Paris (q. v.) the following principles were adopted:—The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, except contraband of war. Neutral goods, except contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag.

Neutral goods on an armed belligerent cruiser are not subject to capture, though there was resistance to capture by the vessel, provided the neutral owner did not aid in the armament or the resistance, notwithstanding he had chartered the whole vessel and was on board at the capture; 9 Cra. 388; 3 Wheat. 409; contra, 1 Dods. 448. If the neutral vessel is in the direct employ of the enemy, both ships and goods are liable to capture; 24 Fed. Rep. 38; and so are neutral goods on a neutral vessel, if the latter be under the enemy's protection;

97 Ct. Cls. 90.

It is lawful for a neutral ship to carry contraband goods, but the right is always exercised subject to capture. Ordinarily the neutral ship is not subject to confiscation and will be released in the prize court, unless she belongs to the owner of the contraband, or her owner is privy to the carriage of the contraband goods, or uses false papers; Risley, Law of War 232; 1 Kent 143.

When two states are at war, it has become the practice of modern times for other states to issue a proclamation of neutrality to protect their commercial interests and territory.

The subjects of a neutral power residing in a belligerent territory are not entitled to any special protection for their property or to exemption from military contributions to which they may be liable in common with the inhabitants of the place in which they reside or in which their property may be situated; 2 Halleck, Int. L.; Baker's ed. 144.

By Convention of the Great Powers, 1887 and 1888, the Suez Canal is neutralized, and is to remain open in war or peace, to vessels of commerce and war of all nations. See id. 149. In 1815, the Rhine was neutralized, as between the States of the Rhine, to a certain extent. In 1839, entrance into the Black Sea was admitted to belong to Russia and to powers at amity with Russia. By the treaty of Paris the Black Sea was neutralized, but this was largely abrogated in 1871. By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, 1850, Great Britain and the United States agreed that any canal built between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans should be forever neutral.

The neutrality acts of the United States, which regulate the conduct of its citizens and of aliens while within its jurisdiction, constitute Title LXVII. of the Revised Statutes. Their origin and scope are as follows:—President Washington, in his annual message to Congress, December 3, 1793, said: "The original arming and equipping of vessels in the ports of the United States by any of the belligerent parties for military services, offensive or defensive, is deemed unlawful." The act of 1794, which has been generally recognized as the first instance of municipal legislation in support of the obligations of neutrality, and a remarkable advance in the development of international law, was passed in accordance with this recommendation. The acts of 1817 and 1818 were successively passed and carried forward into R. S. Title LXVII., which forbids citizens from accepting a commission from a foreign prince against a foreign prince with whom we are at peace; enlisting or hiring or retaining another to enlist, or going away to enlist in the army or navy of such foreign prince; fitting out or arming a vessel in the service of a foreign prince to commit hostilities against a foreign prince, etc. (the vessel to be forfeited—one half to the informer); increasing the force of any vessel of war of such foreign prince by adding any equipment solely applicable to war; preparing any military expedition in the United States to be carried on thence against any foreign prince with whom we are at peace.

Sec. 5288 provides that the president may employ the land and naval forces of the United States and militia in compelling any foreign vessel to depart the United States in all cases in which by the laws of nations or the treaties of the United States she ought not to remain therein. Sec. 5289 provides that the owners or consignees of every armed vessel sailing out of our ports belonging wholly or in part to citizens thereof shall before clearing give bond in double the value of the vessel and cargo, conditioned that she shall not commit any hostilities against any foreign prince, etc., with whom we are at peace. Sec. 5290 provides that the United States shall detain any vessel manifestly built for warlike purposes and about to depart the United States, the cargo of which consists principally of munitions of war, when the number of men on board or other circumstances render it probable that it is intended to commit hostilities against any such foreign prince, etc., until the decision of the president is had thereon or the owner gives bond and securities as required in cases under § 5289. Sec. 5291 provides that this title shall not extend to subjects of any foreign prince, etc., transiently within the United States, who enlist on a vessel of war or privateer which at the time of its arrival here was equipped as such, or who employ other citizens of the same foreign prince, etc., to enlist on board such vessel of war, etc., if the United States shall then be at peace with such foreign prince, etc. Offences under these sections are made high misdemeanors.

The act does not prohibit armed vessels belonging to citizens from sailing out of our ports, but only requires their owners to give security; 6 Pet. 445.

The word "people," as used in § 5283, covers any insurgent or insurrectionary body conducting hostilities, although its belligerency has not been recognized; 166 U. S. 1.

Where a vessel is chartered by a foreign government to carry a cargo of arms to that government, she is not liable to seizure; 87 Fed. Rep. 799. It is not the intent of § 5288 to interfere with the commercial activities of citizens of the United States, but to prevent complications between this government and foreign powers, and fitting out military expeditions against friendly nations; 84 id. 609, per Bradford, J.

The offence covered by the act consists of an act done in the United States, with the intent to commit an offence against the act; the intent is a necessary ingredient; 38 Fed. Rep. 431; and it must be formed and exist within the United States; 24 id. 83. The offence is complete when the expedition is organized; 53 id. 536; and although it is formed and detached in separate parts; 18 id. 529.

No particular number of men is necessary to constitute a military expedition under the act; its character may be determined by the designation of the officers, the organization of the men in regiments or companies, and the purchase of military stores; 53 id. 536. Where insurgents carrying on war against a foreign country sent a vessel to procure arms in the United States, the purchase of such arms and placing them on board the vessel was held not within § 5288, though they were intended to be used by the insurgents in carrying on war against a foreign country, if they are not designed to constitute any part of the furnishings of the vessel herself; 48 id. 99. Placing munitions of war on a vessel, with intent to carry them to insurgents in a foreign country, but without intent that they shall constitute any part of the furnishings of the vessel, is not within the act; 49 id. 648. One who provides the means for transporting a military expedition on any part of its journey, with knowledge of its ultimate destination and unlawful character, commits an offence under § 5288; 84 id. 799. Sec. 5283 is not applicable to such a case; 13 Op. Att. Gen. 177.

A proceeding under § 5283 is a simple suit in admiralty, where the decree is that the libel be dismissed, or the vessel condemned; and no decree of restitution is necessary; 38 Fed. Rep. 431.

The British Foreign Enlistment Act of 1819 forbade British subjects to enlist or to induce others to enlist, or to leave or to induce others to leave the queen's dominions in order to enlist; and forbade ship-owners to take aboard their ships persons illegally enlisted. It is a substantial copy of the American act of 1818; 166 U. S. 60. In 1870 a new British act was passed.

NEVADA. One of the states of the United States of America.

It was admitted into the Union, Oct. 31, 1864. Its boundaries were defined by an enabling act, approved March 21, 1864, as amended by the act of

May 5, 1866.

NEVER INDEBTED. A plea to an action of indebitatus assumpsit, by which the defendant asserts that he is not indebted to the plaintiff. 6 C. & P. 545; 1 M. & W. 342; 1 Q. B. 77. The plea of never indebted has, in England, been substituted for nil debet, in certain actions specified in schedule B (38) of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852; and the effect of the plea never indebted is to deny those facts from which the liability of the defendant is alleged. In actions on negotiable bills or notes, never indebted is inadmissible; Reg. Gen. Hil. T. 1833, §§ 6, 7; 3 Chitty, Stat. 560. By the judicature act, 1875, Ord. xix. r. 20, a defendant is no longer allowed to deny generally the facts alleged by the plaintiff; Whart. Lex. A defendant cannot, under the plea of "never indebted," contend that, though a contract was made in fact, it was void in point of law, for the facts from which its invalidity is inferred must form the subject of a special plea; Moz. & W.

NEVERTHELESS. Equivalent to notwithstanding. 112 Ky. 486, 66 S. W. 32.

NEW. This term in its ordinary acceptation, when applied to the same subject or object, is the opposite of old. 14 Pet. 364.

A distinction must be observed between a new article of commerce and a new article which, as such, is patentable. Any change in form from a previous condition may render the article new in commerce. But to render the article new in the sense of the patent law, it must be more or less efficacious, or possess new properties by a combination with other ingredients; not from a mere change of form produced by a mechanical division. It is only where one of these results follows that the product of the compound can be treated as the result of invention or discovery, and be regarded as a new and useful article. 97 U. S. 6. See PATENT.

Business. When an existing business is enlarged, transferred to a new plant, and put in the name of a corporation, it is not a new business in the city, within the meaning of an ordinance exempting from taxation for five years new manufacturing establishments to induce their location in the city. 151 Ky. 758, 152 S. W. 980.

NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION. A phrase used in the act of congress relating to patents for inventions. See PATENT.

NEW ASSIGNMENT. A re-statement of the cause of action by the plaintiff, with more particularity and certainty, but consistently with the general statement in the declaration. Steph. Pl. 241; 20 Johns. 43.

Its purpose is to avoid the effect of an evasive plea which apparently answers the declaration, though it does not really apply to the matter which the plaintiff had in view; 1 Wms. Saund. 299 b. Thus, if a defendant has committed two assaults on the plaintiff, one of which is justifiable and the other not, as the declaration may not distinguish one from the other, the defendant may justify, and the plaintiff not being able either to traverse, demur, or confess and avoid, must make a new assignment.

There may be several new assignments in the course of the same action; 1 Chitty, Pl. 614. A plaintiff may reply to a part of the plea and also make a new assignment. A new assignment is said to be in the nature of a new declaration; 1 Saund. 299 c; but is more properly considered as a repetition of the declaration; 1 Chit. Pl. 602; differing only in this, that it distinguishes the true ground of complaint, as being different from that which is covered by the plea. Being in the nature of a new or repeated declaration, it is, consequently, to be framed with as much certainty or specification of circumstances as the declaration itself. In some cases, indeed, it should be even more particular; Gould, Pl. 339 n.; Bac. Abr. Trespass (1 4, 2); 1 Chit. Pl. 610.

See 3 Bla. Com. 311; Archb. Civ. Pl. 286. In England, under the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. xix. r. 14, no new assignment is necessary or to be used; but everything which has heretofore been alleged by way of new assignment is to be introduced by way of amendment of the statement of claim; Whart. Dict.

NEW CODE. A Code which came into operation under Justinian December 29, 534. This was a second edition of the Code, the first edition having been published April 7, 529. The object of the second edition was to incorporate under the proper heads the Fifty Decisions, and a large number of constitutions subsequent to the first edition, and "suppressing without scruple whatever appears to be superfluous, abrogated provisions, repetitions, and contradictions." This new edition of the Code was called, codex repetitæ prælectionis. Hunter, Rom. l. 92. See OLD CODE.

NEW FOR OLD. A term used in marine insurance in cases of adjustment of a loss when it has been but partial. In making such adjustment, the rule is to apply the old materials towards the payment of the new, by deducting the value of them from the gross amount of the expenses for repairs, and to allow the deduction of one-third new for old upon the balance. See 1 Cow. 285; 4 Ohio 284; 7 Pick. 259. The deduction, in the United States, is usually one-third, and is made from the cost of labor and material, and in practice also from the incidental expenses of repairs, as towage, etc.; but see, as to this last, 3 Sumn. 45; 9 Wall. 203. The deduction is without regard to the age of the vessel; 11 Johns. 315. A writer criticizes the rule of thirds, and suggests that the increase of iron hulls will change the rule of law; Gourlie, Gen. Av. In Liverpool, no deduction is made on iron vessels for the first eighteen months.

NEW FOREST. The royal forest in Hampshire, founded by William the Conqueror. See FOREST LAW.

It contains about 92,000 acres, of which about 63,000 acres are strictly speaking forest; 2,000 belong to the Crown, and 27,000 acres belong to private persons. Some parts of the 27,000 acres are subject to certain forest rights of the Crown. Byrne.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY DISPUTE. See HAGUE CONFERENCE.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. The name of one of the original thirteen United States of America.

It was subject to Massachusetts from 1641 to 1690. It was governed as a province, under royal commissions, by a governor and council appointed by the king, and a house of assembly elected by the people, until the revolution. In January, 1776, a temporary constitution was adopted, which continued till 1784. The constitution adopted in 1784 was amended by a convention of delegates held at Concord, approved by the people in their town-meetings, and established by the convention in February, 1782. This constitution was amended in 1830, by abolishing the property qualifications for certain offices, and amended again in 1877, changing it in eleven particulars: the principal of which were the abolition of the religious test, and adoption of biennial elections, increasing the number of senators, and changing the election from March to November.

NEW INDUSTRY. See LABOR.

NEW INN. An inn of chancery. See INNS OF COURT.

NEW JERSEY. The name of one of the original thirteen states of the United States of America.

The territory of which the state is composed was included within the patent granted by Charles II. to his brother James, Duke of York, bearing date on the 12th of March, 1684. This grant comprised all the lands lying between the western side of Connecticut river and the east side of Delaware bay, and conferred powers of government over the granted territory. At this time the province was in the possession and under the government of Holland. Before the close of the year the inhabitants of the province submitted to the government of England, on the 23d and 24th of June, 1684. The Duke of York, by deeds of lease and release, conveyed to John Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret their heirs and assigns forever, "all that tract of land adjacent to New England and lying and being to the westward of Long Island and Manhattan Island, and bounded on the east part by the main sea, and part by Hudson river, and last, upon the west Delaware bay or river, and extendeth southward to the main ocean as far as Cape May at the mouth of Delaware bay, and to the northward as far as the northernmost branch of the said bay or river of Delaware, which is in 41 degrees and 40 minutes of latitude, and crosseth over thence in a straight line to Hudson's river in forty-one degrees of latitude; which said tract of land is hereafter to be called Nova Casaria, or New Jersey."

This grant first defined the boundaries and gave the name of the province. It conferred upon the grantees, with the territory, powers of government in as full and ample manner as they were conferred by the crown upon the Duke of York. Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret, being by virtue of this conveyance the sole proprietors of New Jersey, on the 10th of February, 1684-5, signed a constitution which they published under the title of "The Concessions and agreement of the lords proprietors of the province of Nova Casaria, or New Jersey, to and with all and every of the adventurers, and all such as shall settle or plant there." This document, under the title of "The Concessions," was regarded as the first constitution of New Jersey, and continued in force until the division of the province in 1678. The instrument was considered as irrevocable, and therefore of higher authority than the acts of assembly, which were subject to alteration and repeal. War having been declared by England against Holland in 1672, the Dutch were again in possession of the country, and the inhabitants submitted to their authority.

By the treaty of peace between England and Holland on the 9th of February, 1674, the country was restored to the possession of the English. On the conclusion of peace, in order to remove all grounds of objection to his title on account of the recapture of the country by the Dutch, the Duke of York obtained from the crown a new patent, similar to the first, and dated on the 29th of June, 1674. On the 20th of July in the same year, the Duke of York made a second grant of a portion of the province to Sir George Carteret individually. The partition which this patent was intended to secure, in addition to the confirmation of Carteret's grant, was accomplished by deeds of partition executed July 1, 1676, between Carteret and the trustees of Byllinge. In 1702, the proprietors of the two provinces, called respectively East New Jersey and West New Jersey, surrendered their powers of government to Queen Anne, still retaining their title to the land. The two divisions constituted thenceforth but one colony. The colony was governed by a governor and council appointed by the crown, and an assembly of the representatives of the people chosen by the freeholders. This form of government continued till the American revolution.

The first constitution of the state of New Jersey was adopted by the provisional congress on the second day of July, 1776. This body was composed of representatives from all the counties of the state, who were elected on the fourth Monday of May, and convened at Burlington on the tenth day of June, 1776. It was finally adopted on the second day of July, but was never submitted to a popular vote. This constitution continued in force until the first day of September, 1844, when it was superseded by the existing constitution. The new constitution was adopted May 14, 1844, by a convention composed of delegates elected by the people in pursuance of an act passed by the legislature. The constitution thus framed, having been submitted to and adopted by the people at an election held on the thirteenth day of August, took effect and went into operation, pursuant to one of its provisions, on the twenty-second of September, 1844. This constitution was amended at a special election held September 7, 1875.

NEW MATTER. In Pleading. Matter not previously alleged. Statements of fact not previously alleged by either party to the pleadings. Where special pleading prevails, such matter must be pleaded in avoidance, and it must, in general, be followed by a verification; Gould, Pl. c. 8, § 185; 1 Chitty, Pl. 538; Steph. Pl. 251; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (E 32); 1 Wms. Saund. 103, n. 1; Ventr. 121. See PLEA.

In equity, new matter, discovered by either plaintiff or defendant, may be introduced by cross or supplemental bill before a decree has been pronounced, but not by amendment after an answer has been filed; 1 Paige, Ch. 200; Harr. Ch. 488.

NEW MEXICO. The name of one of the United States of America.

By act of congress, approved September 9, 1850, the territory of New Mexico was constituted and described. A proviso was annexed that the United States might divide the territory into two or more, and that when admitted as a state the said territory, or any portion of the same, should be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution might prescribe at the time of admission.

Colorado was partly formed from New Mexico in 1861, and in 1863 the entire territory of Arizona, which reduced New Mexico to its present boundaries. By the organic act, the powers of the territory are lodged in three branches,—the legislative, executive, and judicial. The operation of this act was suspended until the Texan boundary was agreed upon, when it went into force by proclamation of the president, December 13, 1850.

NEW PROMISE. A contract made after the original promise has, for some cause, been rendered invalid, by which the promisor agrees to fulfil such original promise. Within the meaning of the statute of frauds the renewal of a promise to pay is a new promise; 24 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 576. See LIMITATIONS.

NEW TRIAL. In Practice. A re-examination of an issue in fact before a court and a jury, which has been tried at least once before the same court; Hill. N. Tr. 1. A rehearing of the legal rights of the parties, upon disputed facts, before another jury, granted by the court on motion of the party dissatisfied with the result of the previous trial, upon a proper case being presented for the purpose; 4 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 30; Grah. & W. N. Tr. 32. It is either upon the same, or different, or additional evidence, before a new jury, and probably, but not necessarily, before a different judge. It is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury, court or referee; 99 Cal. 285.

The origin of the practice of granting new trials is of extremely ancient date, and, consequently, involved in some obscurity. Blackstone gives the most connected and satisfactory account of it of any writer; 3 Com. 387.

Courts have, in general, a discretionary power to grant or refuse new trials, according to the exigency of each particular case, upon principles of substantial justice; 1 Burr. 390. That the trial judge is not satisfied with a verdict is not binding on the court in banc, but deserves serious consideration; L. J. 55 Q. B. 403. This discretion is generally not reviewable on error; 10 Vt. 520; 14 N. H. 441; 20 Pick. 285; 10 Ga. 93; 132 U. S. 103. It should be exercised with great caution where a new trial is asked only because the verdict is against the weight of the evidence; 31 W. Va. 428.

Where one party moves for a new trial and the opposing party consents thereto, the court is not compelled to grant the same; 44 Kan. 144; 45 Ill. App. 426. An order granting a new trial operates to set aside the judgment; 76 Cal. 90.

The usual grounds for a new trial may be enumerated as follows:

The not giving the defendant sufficient notice of the time and place of trial, unless waived by an appearance and making a defence, will be a ground for setting aside the verdict; 3 Price 72; 1 Wend. 22. But the defendant's ignorance must not have been owing to his own negligence, and the insufficiency of the notice must have been reasonably calculated to mislead him; 2 Bibb 177; 3 B. & P. 1; 13 Tex. 516; 32 Conn. 402; 36 N. H. 74.

Pleadings. Failure of the complaint to state a cause of action is available on motion for a new trial; 46 Pac. Rep. (Ariz.) 74; so of one which shows the cause of action alleged to be barred; 26 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 431.

Misconduct of parties, counsel, or witnesses. The use of crutches by plaintiff in going to and from the witness stand, when just before and after the trial he walked readily without them, is ground for a new trial; 42 N. Y. S. 941; but plaintiff's hysteria while on the witness stand is not; 45 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 290; nor is a controversy, between court and counsel, during the trial, not prejudicial to the defeated party; 37 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 115; nor improper remarks made by counsel in his argument; 27 U. S. App. 663.

Mistakes or omissions of officers in summoning and drawing jurors, when the irregularity deprives the party complaining of a substantial right, will entitle him to a new trial; 2 Haist. 244; 16 Ark. 37; 12 Pick. 496. Likewise, where the officer summoning the jury is nearly related to one of the parties; 10 S. & R. 334; 1 South. 864; 20 Tex. 234; 1 Dev. & B. 196; or is interested in the event; 5 Johns. 133; unless the objection to the officer was waived by the party; 3 Me. 215; 21 Pick. 457; or the authority of the officer be so circumscribed as to put it out of his power to select an improper jury; 7 Ala. 253; 7 Cow. 720. A verdict will be set aside for the following causes: The unauthorized interference of a party, or his attorney, or the court, in selecting or returning jurors, unless the interference can be satisfactorily explained; 8 Humphr. 412; that a juror not regularly summoned and returned personated another; 77 Ga. 108; 7 Dowl. & R. 684; but not if the juror personated another through mistake, was qualified in other respects, and no injustice has been done; 12 East 229; 12 Ohio Cir. Ct. 867. That a juror sat on the trial after being challenged and stood aside, unless the party complaining knew of it, and did not object; 3 Yeates 318; that a juror was discharged without any sufficient reason, after being sworn; 1 Ohio St. 66; but not if the juror was discharged by mistake and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the party; 9 Meto. Mass. 572; 5 Ired. 58; that the jury were not sworn, or that the oath was not administered in the form prescribed by law; 1 How. 497; 2 Me. 270.

The disqualification of jurors, if it has not been waived, will be ground for a new trial; but a principal cause of challenge to a juror, not discovered during the trial, will not require a new trial in a criminal case, unless injustice resulted to the prisoner from the fact that such juror served; 36 W. Va. 720; that a juror was also a member of the grand jury finding the bill will not sustain a motion in arrest of judgment, where no objection was made to the juror on the trial; 30 S. C. 105; 41 La. Ann. 638; 4 Utah 42. The want of a necessary property qualification is ground for a new trial; 4 Term 473; 15 Vt. 61; irregularity in selection, which results in injury to the defeated party; 59 Mo. 417; but after a plea of not guilty and conviction, defendant may not object to the venire or to jurors summoned under it; 9 Humphr. 626; or to a juror whose name was not in the box, on the list, or on the books of the tax receiver; 63 Ga. 791; but not if it appears that injustice was not done; 31 W. Va. 459; and there was a fair trial, and the verdict was fully warranted by the evidence; 53 Fed. Rep. 565. Relationship to one of the parties; 32 Me. 310; or to one of the counsel; 81 Me. 158; 17 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 631; or business relations with the counsel; 43 N. Y. S. 569; is ground; but knowledge of such relation must not have been obtained before trial, else the disqualification is waived; 84 Me. 304; unless the relationship be so remote as to render it highly improbable that it could have had any influence; 12 Vt. 661. So is interest in the event; 2 Johns. 194; 21 N. H. 438; concealment of his interest by juror; 111 Ind. 59; bias or prejudice; 3 Dall. 515; where a juror was deputy prosecuting attorney; 100 Ind. 357; conscientious scruples against finding a verdict of guilty; 18 N. H. 536; 16 Ohio 364; 13 Wend. 351; an opinion held by juror which would have excluded him if discovered before he was sworn; 36 W. Va. 729; and mental or bodily disease unfitting jurors for the intelligent performance of their duties; 6 Humphr. 59; 8 Ill. 298; alienage; 6 Johns. 332; 2 Ill. 476; 60 Vt. 449 (but not criminality of juror; 10 Oreg. 145; 15 Colo. 270; but see 8 Ill. 202; 4 Dall. 333). The want of purely statutory qualifications, such as citizenship, age, property, etc., which are not essential to an intelligent and impartial discharge of duty by a juror, are not treated with the same strictness as bias and like causes; 22 Fed. Rep. 234. See 2 N. H. 349.

When indirect measures have been resorted to, to prejudice the jury, or tricks practised or disingenuous attempts made to suppress or stifle evidence or thwart the proceedings, or to obtain an unconscionable advantage, they will be defeated by granting a new trial. For example: where papers material on the point in issue, not previously submitted, are surreptitiously handed to the jury; Cas. temp. Hardw. 116; 2 Yeates 273; or where the party, or some one in his behalf, directly approaches the jury on the subject of the trial; 7 S. & R. 439; 13 Mass. 219; or where one not a member of the jury slept in the same room with them, and had a conversation with one or two of them, in which he made statements reflecting on the character of the party against whom the verdict was rendered; 78 Ia. 207. But if the other party is aware of such attempts, and neglects to correct them when in his power, he will be deemed to have waived all objection; 11 Mod. 118. If the interference with the jury comes from a stranger, be without fault in the jury, and without the knowledge of the parties, and no injury has thereby ensued, the verdict will not be disturbed; 5 Mo. 525; 3 Bibb 8; 11 Humphr. 169, 401. But see 9 Miss. 187; 16 id. 465; 20 id. 308. Where the jury, after retiring to deliberate, examined witnesses in the case, a new trial was granted; Cro. Eliz. 189; 2 Bay 94; 1 Brev. 16; so, also, when one of their number communicates to his fellows private information possessed by him, which influences the finding; 1 Swan 61; 2 Yeates 166; 4 Yerg. 111; 36 Neb. 708; or the judge addresses a note to them, or privately visits them, after they have retired to deliberate; 1 Pick. 387; 10 Johns. 338; or a juror takes a private view; 157 Mass. 579; 57 Fed. Rep. 898; 52 Minn. 329.

Misconduct of the jury will sometimes avoid the verdict; as, for example, jurors betting as to the result; 4 Yerg. 111; sleeping during the trial; 8 Ill. 968; see 181 Pa. 172; unauthorized separation; 1 Va. Cas. 271; 11 Humphr. 502; 3 Harr. N. J. 468; but see 101 N. C. 761; 7 Mont. 489; 147 Ill. 385; taking refreshment at the charge of the prevailing party; 4 Wash. C. C. 32; 23 Neb. 171; see 49 Kan. 643; drinking spirituous liquor; 4 Cow. 17, 26; 4 Harr. 387; 78 Cal. 317; if any mental incapacity results therefrom; 8 Mont. 57; but see 40 La. Ann. 739; 8 Mont. 57; 7 id. 489; 100 N. C. 528; talking to strangers on the subject of the trial; 3 Day 223; 9 Humphr. 646; but not general conversation; 36 W. Va. 729; determining the verdict by a resort to chance; 15 Johns. 87; 8 Blackf. 32; 49 Cal. 275; 21 Ia. 379; 4 Wis. 67; 1 Minn. 156; 45 N. H. 408; by returning as the verdict the quotient obtained by dividing by twelve the total of the sums named by the jurors; 15 Johns. 87; 86 Tenn. 240; 35 Fed. Rep. 649; 11 L. R. A. 706. But every irregularity which would subject jurors to censure will not overturn the verdict, unless there be some reason to suspect that it may have had an influence on the final result. See 26 Tex. App. 260; 40 Kan. 253; 40 La. Ann. 751. In general, if it does not appear that the misconduct was occasioned by the prevailing party or any one in his behalf, does not indicate any improper bias, and the court cannot see that it either had or might have had an effect unfavorable to the party moving for a new trial, the verdict will not be disturbed. For gross misconduct of the jury a new trial may be granted on grounds of public policy; Hilly. New Tr. 198. Where the jury after returning an informal verdict were discharged, and within thirty seconds recalled and the verdict corrected, the separation will not vitiate the verdict; 26 Tex. App. 669. When the jury were kept out eighty-four hours it was held that their agreement was coerced and a new trial ordered; 156 N. Y. 268; s. c. 19 N. Y. L. J. 607.

Error of the judge will be ground for a new trial; such as, admitting illegal evidence which has been objected to,—unless the illegal evidence was wholly immaterial, or it is certain that no injustice has been done; 77 Ga. 692; and where the illegal testimony was admitted in gross violation of the well-settled principles which govern proof, it has been deemed per se ground for a new trial, notwithstanding the jury were directed to disregard it; 13 Johns. 850; but see 6 N. H. 383; improperly rejecting evidence tending in any degree to aid the jury in determining a material fact; 3 J. J. Marsh. 229; the admission of incompetent evidence, although of slight importance, if the party has suffered or might have suffered prejudice by its admission; 101 N. C. 184; 78 Ga. 490; 80 id. 549; 61

id. 93; (but the objection that the jury were not allowed to take to their room letters introduced in evidence cannot first be raised on a motion for a new trial; 70 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 780; nor the admission of improper evidence not objected to at the trial; 3 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 115;) withdrawing testimony once legally before the jury, —unless the excluded testimony could not be used on a second trial; 4 Humphr. 22; denying to a party the right to be heard through counsel; 2 Bibb 76; 3 A. K. Marsh. 405; erroneously refusing to grant a nonsuit; 10 Johns. 154; improperly restricting the examination or cross-examination of witnesses, or allowing too great latitude in that respect, under circumstances which constitute a clear case of abuse; 6 Barb. 383; refusing to permit a witness to refer to documents to refresh his memory, where, by the denial, the complaining party has sustained injury; 3 Litt. 338; improperly refusing an adjournment, whereby injustice has been done; 2 South. 518; 9 Ga. 121; improperly denying the right to open and close at the trial; 78 Ga. 79; refusing to give such instructions to the jury as properly arise in the case, where it is manifest that the jury erred through want of instruction; 4 Ohio 389; 9 Mo. 305; giving to the jury binding instructions, when there are circumstances in the case which ought to have been submitted to them,—unless the verdict is in strict accordance with the weight of evidence; 10 Wenu. 402; 5 Humphr. 478; giving an erroneous exposition of the law on a point material to the issue,—unless it is certain that no injustice has been done, or the amount in dispute is very trifling, so that the injury is scarcely appreciable; 4 Conn. 356; 5 Sandf. 180; 3 Johns. 239; misleading the jury by a charge which is not explicit, or which is absurd and impossible, or contradictory, or argumentative and evasive; 0 Humphr. Tenn. 411; 11 Wend. 83; 6 Cow. 682; erroneous instruction as to the proof that is requisite; 3 Bibb 481; 21 Me. 20; misapprehension of the judge as to a material fact, and a direction to the jury accordingly, whereby they are misled; 1 Mills 200; see MISDIRECTION; instructing the jury as to the law upon facts which are purely hypothetical,—but not if the charge was correct in point of law, and the result does not show that the jury were misled by the generality of the charge; 8 Ga. 114; 2 Ala. n. s. 694; submitting as a contested point what has been admitted; 9 Conn. 216; erroneously leaving to the jury the determination of a question that should have been decided by the court, whereby they have mistaken the law; charging as to the consequences of the verdict; 1 Pick. 106; 2 Graham & W. New Tr. 595. Neither the rejection nor admission of immaterial evidence is cause for a new trial; 77 Ga. 692.

Surprise, as a ground for setting aside the verdict, is cautiously allowed. When it is occasioned by the act of the adverse party, or by circumstances out of the knowledge and beyond the control of the party injured by it, this has sometimes been held to constitute grounds for relief; but not when he might have been fully informed by the exercise of ordinary diligence; 6 Halst. 242; 12 Colo. 125; although even when the complainant is not entirely free from fault, the court, in cases where great wrong would otherwise be done, will, for the sake of promoting justice, grant a new trial. Among the cases of surprise may be enumerated the following: the unexpectedly being summoned and detained as a witness or juror in another court, or sudden and serious illness, which prevents the party from attending at the trial; 3 T. E. Monr. 113; 4 Litt. 1; 1 Halst. 344; that the cause was brought on prematurely, in the absence of the party; 6 Dana 69; erroneous ruling of the court as to the right to begin, which has worked manifest injustice; 4 Pick. 158; but see 8 Conn. 254, 296; perturbation of counsel, arising from sudden and dangerous sickness occurring in his family and coming to his knowledge during the trial; 14 Pick.

494; where some unforeseen accident has prevented the attendance of a material witness; 6 Mod. 22; 1 Harp. 267; that testimony beyond the reach of the party injured, and completely under the control of the opposite party, was not produced at the trial; 7 Yerg. 502; 7 Wend. 62; that competent testimony was unexpectedly ruled out on the trial; 9 Dana 26; 2 Vt. 573; 2 J. J. Marsh. 515; where a party's own witnesses, through forgetfulness, mistake, contumacy, or perjury, testify differently than anticipated, or where evidence is unexpectedly sprung upon a party by his opponent; 8 Ga. 136; 18 Miss. 326; see 60 Tex. 437; the withdrawal of a material witness before testifying, attended with suspicions of collusion; 25 Wend. 663; that a material witness was suddenly deprived of the power of testifying by a paralytic stroke, or other affection, or that the testimony of the witness was incoherent on account of his being disconcerted at the trial; 1 Root 175; where it is discovered after the trial that a material witness who testified is interested in the event, or where it is probable that the verdict was obtained by false testimony, which the party injured could not until after the trial contradict or expose; 2 C. B. 342; 1 Me. 322. But a new trial cannot be obtained on the ground of surprise caused by evidence which was clearly within the issues presented by the pleadings; 1 Tex. Civ. App. 343. There is no such ground for granting a new trial as mistake or inadvertence, as distinguished from accident or surprise; 96 Cal. 38. Accident or surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, does not include ignorance, mistake, nor misapprehension of an attorney, not occasioned by the adverse party, nor mismanagement of the defence by the attorney, through design, ignorance, or neglect; 52 Kan. 743; 107 Mo. 500.

New trials on account of after-discovered testimony are granted but rarely, and with great caution. The court, in order to set aside the verdict on this ground, must be satisfied that the evidence has come to the applicant's knowledge since the trial; 3 Stor. 1; 21 N. H. 166; see 76 Ga. 602; that it is not owing to the want of diligence that it did not come sooner; 6 Johns. Ch. 479; 60 Fed. Rep. 85; 91 Ga. 171; 99 Cal. 607; see 132 Mass. 341; 49 How. Pr. 53; 19 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 1107; 73 Hun 195; 1 Black. 967; 49 Ill. App. 224; that it is so material that it will probably produce a different result; 1 Dudd. 85; 48 Ill. App. 417; see 76 Ga. 585; 41 Kan. 345; 39 W. Va. 410; 88 Tenn. 430; and that it is not cumulative; Woodb. & M. 348; as mere cumulative evidence is insufficient to warrant a new trial; 78 Cal. 41; 76 Ga. 602; 129 Ill. 101; 120 Ind. 188; 39 Minn. 190; 69 Tex. 679; 83 Va. 581; but the rule does not apply where it is cumulative evidence to prove an alibi; 3 Wash. 206. Nor must the sole object of the newly-discovered evidence be to impeach witnesses examined on the former trial; 7 Barb. 271; 8 Gratt. 637; 79 Ga. 633; 116 Ind. 84; 39 Kan. 320; 102 N. C. 347; 85 Va. 205; 43 Ill. App. 161; 41 La. Ann. 787. The moving party must state what the evidence is, and what diligence he has used in the preparation of his case; and his application must be accompanied by affidavits of the newly-discovered witness, unless some cause be shown why they cannot be produced; 5 Halst. 250; 1 Tyl. Vt. 441; 22 Me. 246. Evidence which could have been procured before the trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence is not sufficient; 76 Ga. 618; 73 La. 696; 41 Kan. 485; 62 Mich. 186; 69 Tex. 437; 82 Va. 827.

When a continuance on account of absent testimony is refused, and it subsequently appears that such evidence is necessary and material to the defendant, he should be awarded a new trial; 25 Tex. App. 27, 247; 26 id. 668.

Excessive damages may be good cause for granting a new trial; first, where the measure of damages is governed by fixed rules and principles, as in actions on contracts, or for torts to property, the value of which may be ascertained by evidence; second, in suits for personal injuries, where, although there is no fixed criterion for assessing the damages, yet it is clear that the jury acted from passion, partiality, or corruption; 10 Ga. 37.

A new trial should be granted for an error of law, where the general merits of the case, as one for a recovery at all, are doubtful, and where the damages are apparently excessive; 80 Ga. 602. In actions for personal torts, a new trial will not, in general, be granted on account of the smallness of the damages, unless the verdict is the result of contrivance by the defendant, or surprise on the plaintiff, or of partiality or misconduct of the jury, or unless the finding is entirely disproportionate to the injury. See 49 L. J. Q. B. 283, where a verdict of £7,000 in favor of a physician for damages, caused by defendant's negligence, was set aside on the ground of the damages being insufficient.

A state statute forbidding new trials on account of inadequate damages, if binding on the federal courts, would be in violation of the constitutional right of a trial by jury; 80 Fed. Rep. 72. Where the verdict is for an amount exceeding the damages laid in the writ, it will be set aside unless the plaintiff will release the excess; 7 Wend. 330. See JURY; DAMAGES.

It is within the discretion of the trial court, after a verdict awarding excessive damages, to make an order denying a motion for a new trial on the condition that the plaintiff will remit a certain part of the verdict; 98 Cal. 13; 130 U. S. 69; see 48 Mo. App. 79; 70 Ga. 119; 91 id. 818. It is error to set aside a verdict as excessive unless the amount is such as to show misconduct and impropriety on the part of the jury; 74 Hun 284. Where the question of damages is peculiarly for the jury, if the court grant a new trial, it should be granted absolutely and not on condition of a refusal to file a remittitur; 28 L. R. A. 653.

When the verdict is clearly against the law, it will be set aside, notwithstanding the jury had power to decide both the law and the fact, or the issue was one exclusively of fact and there have been concurrent verdicts by two successive juries; 1 Dudd. 218; 4 Ga. 198; see 79 Ga. 770; if, however, substantial justice has been done, a new trial will not be granted though the law arising on the evidence would have justified a different result; 1 Burr. 54; 4 Term 468.

Courts are at all times reluctant to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence; and where the jury have passed upon a mere question of fact, they will only do so when the verdict is palpably against the evidence; injustice must have been done by the verdict, and there must be a probability that justice will be done on a retrial; 21 Conn. 245; 5 Ohio 509; 3 Strobb. 358. A statute forbidding courts to set aside a third verdict in the same action, does not apply to a case where there is no evidence, and thus construed, is constitutional; 89 Tenn. 311. See 134 U. S. 614; 36 Neb. 642. Where the verdict is founded on circumstantial evidence, the court will rarely, if ever, interfere with it; 16 Mass. 345; 11 Ill. 86. On the other hand, when the issue approximates to a purely legal question, courts are somewhat more liberal in granting new trials; 2 McMull. 44. The verdict will be set aside where the witnesses upon whose testimony it was obtained have since the trial been convicted of perjury; 8 Dougl. 24; so where the testimony on which the verdict is founded derives its credit from circumstances, and those circumstances are afterwards clearly falsified by affidavit; 1 B. & P. 437; 3 Grah. & W. N. Tr. 1208.

The verdict may be void for obscurety or uncertainty; 1 S. & R. 367; and where special findings are contradictory on essential questions, a new trial should be granted; 111 N. C. 661. It will be set aside where it is not responsive to the issue, or does not comprehend all of the issues, unless the finding of one or more of the issues will be decisive of the cause; 2 Ala. n.s. 359; 11 Pick. 45; or where it is contrary to the instructions, whether the latter are right or wrong; 74 La. 330; or where the verdict shows that it includes items not shown by the evidence to be due; 45 Ill. App. 328. So, where the findings on the issues are contradictory, thus rendering the general verdict inconsistent and unintelligible; 97 N. C. 68. That it was not recorded in open court, or was received in the absence of the plaintiff, or was altered after it was recorded and the jury dismissed, will be ground for a new trial; 1 Ill. 109; 1 Wend. 88; 16 S. & R. 414. If rendered on Sunday, it will, in general, be void; but there are many instances in which verdicts have been sustained though rendered on that day; 1 South. 156; 15 Johns. 119; 3 Watts 56; 18 Ohio 490.

In the United States courts no exception lies to the overruling of a motion for a new trial; 7 U. S. App. 359; 85 Fed. Rep. 957; or where a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence is refused; 24 U. S. App. 601.

The Pennsylvania act of 1891 provides that "the supreme court shall have power in all cases to affirm, reverse, amend, or modify a judgment, decree, etc., and to enter such judgment or decree as it may deem proper, without returning the record to the court below, and may order a verdict and judgment to be set aside and a new trial had." In 178 Pa. 481, it was said by the court that this was "a new power, a wide departure from the policy of centuries in regard to appellate courts and clearly exceptional in character;" but the act was held to be constitutional, and the court ordered the verdict set aside.

An act of Montana authorizing its supreme court to grant a new trial for excessive damages, was upheld in 181 U. S. 29, where it was held that the court below could order a new trial, or, with the plaintiff's consent, reduce the verdict, but could not enter judgment itself for a lesser sum than the verdict.

Courts of equity have always proceeded with great caution in awarding new trials at law. At the present day they are but seldom applied to for this purpose, as courts of law are liberal in exercising the same jurisdiction, and it has been held to be unconscionable and vexatious to bring into courts of equity a discussion which might have been had at law; 1 Sch. & L. 201. But, in general, when it would have been proper for a court of law to have granted a new trial if the application had been made while that court had the power, it is equally proper for a court of equity to do so if the application be made on grounds arising after the court of law can no longer act; 1 A. K. Marsh. 237. A court of equity will not grant a new trial at law to enable a party to impeach a witness, or because the verdict is against evidence; 1 Johns. Ch. 482; or when the new trial can be obtained by application to a law court; 52 N. J. Eq. 887. It will only interpose in cases of newly-discovered evidence, surprise, fraud, or the like, where the party is deprived of the means of defence by circumstances beyond his control; 1 Litt. 140; 2 Bibb 241; 2 Hawks 605; Will. Eq. Jur. 857.

A court of equity will often grant a second, and sometimes a third, fourth, and even fifth trial of a feigned issue, in cases where a court of law would not disturb a first verdict; 1 Edw. Ch. 96. This arises from the consideration that the responsibility of the decision rests upon the judge in equity; 3 Grah. & W. N. Tr. 1570.

New trials may be granted in criminal as well as in civil cases, at the solicitation of the defendant, when he is convicted even of the highest offences. But a person once lawfully convicted on a sufficient indictment can never after, against his consent, be a second time put in peril for the same offence, unless the former conviction was instituted by the fraudulent procurement of the defendant with a view to shield himself from adequate punishment; 2 Grah. & W. N. Tr. 61. Where the accused has been acquitted, and his acquittal has not been procured by his own fraud or evil practice, the law, mingling justice with mercy in favorem vite et libertatis, does not permit a new trial; 16 Conn. 54. In civil actions for the recovery of penalties, and in some cases where the form of proceeding is criminal, if the object be only to establish a civil right, as in cases of quo warranto and the like, new trials may be granted even after acquittal. But, in such cases, when the verdict is for the defendant, it will not, in general, be disturbed unless some rule of law be violated in the admission or rejection of evidence or in the charge of the court to the jury; 4 Term 753; 2 Cow. 811; 2 Graham & W. New Tr. 61. See Graham & Waterman; Hilliard, New Trials; JURY; MISDIRECTION; CHARGE; MISTRIAL.

NEW WORKS. By a new work is understood every sort of edifice or other work which is newly commenced on any ground whatever. Where the ancient form of work is changed, either by an addition being made to it or by some part of the ancient work being taken away, it is styled also a new work. La. Civ. Code, Art. 856.

NEW YORK. The name of one of the original states of the United States of America.

In its colonial condition this state was governed from the period of the revolution of 1783 by governors appointed by the crown, assisted by a council, which received its appointments also from the parental government, and by the representatives of the people. 1 Story, Const. b. 1, ch. 10.

There have been four constitutions adopted by the state since its colonial period: one in 1777, which remained in force until January 1, 1802, when the second went into operation. This second constitution remained until January 1, 1847, when a constitution, adopted by a convention of the people at Albany, went into force. This constitution was amended in certain particulars, and remained in force until January 1, 1866, when the present constitution was adopted by a convention at Albany and went into effect on January 1, 1866, except article six, relating to the courts, which became operative January 1, 1866.

NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE. In Practice. Proof of some new and material fact in the case, which has been ascertained since the verdict. See New Trial.

NEWS. Information respecting current events. The history of the day. It is not the creation of the writer, but is a report of matters that ordinarily are publici juris. 248 U. S. 234. There is a distinction between the substance of the information (news element), and the particular form or collocation of words in which the writer has communicated it (literary element). Id.

To the newspaper owners, news matter, however little susceptible of ownership or dominion in the absolute sense, is stock in trade, to be gathered at the cost of enterprise, organization, skill, labor, and money, and to be distributed and sold to those who will pay money for it, as for any other merchandise. Id. 236. See also PLAGIARISM OF NEWS.

NEWSPAPERS. Papers for conveying news, printed and distributed periodically.

A paper issued every day of the week except one is a daily newspaper; 45 Cal. 30.

A paper devoted principally to legal intelligence is a newspaper in which notices required by statute may be published; 75 Ill. 51; but see 25 Minn. 147.

Publication of notice from June 28 to July 26, both dates inclusive, is a sufficient compliance with an ordinance directing publication for thirty days, although the paper in which the publication is made is not issued on Sundays or on the 4th of July; 60 Fed. Rep. 961. See 7 Exch. 118; 4 Op. Atty. Gen. 11; LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

NEXI. In Roman Law. Persons bound (nexi); that is, insolvents, who might be held in bondage by their creditors until their debts were discharged. Heinzeius, Antiq. Rom. ad Inst. lib. 8, tit. 380; Calvinus; Mackelday, Civ. Law § 486 a.

NEXT. Nearest or highest, not in the sense of propinquity alone, as, for example, three persons on three chairs, one in the midst, those on each side of the middle one are equally near, each "next" to the middle one; but it signifies also order, or succession, or relation as well as propinquity. 27 L. J. Ch. 654. See generally 8 Q. B. 728; 4 Johns. Ch. 26; 3 Cal. (N. Y.) 89.

NEXT FRIEND. One who, without being regularly appointed guardian, acts for the benefit of an infant, married woman, or other person not sui juris. Where a person of unsound mind, not found so by inquisition, conveys his land by deed to another, the proper mode of proceeding in equity to have such deed cancelled, annulled, and made void is not by information exhibited by the attorney-general on the relation of others, but by a bill in the name of the incompetent person by a responsible next friend; 5 Del. Ch. 338, where the practice in such cases was elaborately discussed, both in argument and by Saalsbury, Ch., who permitted an information in the name of the attorney-general to be amended into a bill by next friend, and whose decision was affirmed on appeal, where the only question was the propriety of the amendment. It has been held in other states that such suit may be brought by next friend in behalf of a person not adjudged insane and having no guardian appointed; 11 Tex. Civ. App. 877; 73 Miss. 888; but in Ohio it was held that such action must be by guardian, not next friend; 41 N. E. Rep. 239; and in Iowa that it could not be done independently of statute; 96 Ia. 560. In such cases the court may supersede a next friend by a guardian ad litem, and in its discretion stay proceedings instituted by the former; 64 Fed. Rep. 381. See 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. 513, 614; PROCHIN AMI.

Where an infant is so young as to be incapable of making a selection of a person to represent him, the court will permit any person to institute suit in his behalf, exercising, however, discretion to prevent any abuse of that right; 184 U. S. 650.

NEXT OF KIN. This term is used to signify the relations of a party who has died intestate.

In general, no one comes within this term who is not included in the provisions of the statutes of distribution; 8 Atk. 422, 701; 1 Ves. Sen. 84; 28 How. Pr. 417. The phrase means relation by blood; 72 N. Y. 313. It has been held, on the other hand, that next of kin in a will means "nearest of kin"; 10 Cl. & F. 215; 63 N. C. 242; 47 Ill. App. 292. A wife cannot, in general, claim as next of kin of her husband, nor a husband as next of kin of his wife; 113 Mass. 430; 113 Ill. 431; 4 Ired. Ex. 56; 14 Ves. 372; 44 Ill. 446; 106 Pa. 176. But see 34 Barb. 410; 28 Ohio 192; 84 Iowa 635. But when there are circumstances in a will which induce a belief of an intention to include them under this term, they will be so considered, though in the ordinary sense of the word they are not; Hovenden, Fr. 288, 289; 1 My. & K. 82; the same rule holds as to the interpretation of statutes; 7 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 185; 51 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 145; 25 Alb. L. J. 496. This phrase as used in the act of March 3, 1891 (French Spoliation claims), means next of kin living at the date of the act, to be determined according to the statutes of distribution of the respective states of the domicile of the original sufferers; 162 U. S. 439; 160 Pa. 391, reversing 150 Pa. 85; 20 D. C. 261; 49 Leg. Int. 147, a Maryland case.

In the construction of wills and settlements, after a considerable conflict of opinions, the established rule of interpretation in England is that next of kin when found in ulterior limitations must be understood to mean nearest of kin without regard to the statute of distribution; 2 Jarm. Wills 108; 162 U. S. 484. This rule was followed in 144 Mass. 135; 63 N. C. 242, but it was not approved in 95 N. Y. 17; 57 N. H. 236.

Speaking generally, under our dual system of government who are next of kin is determined by the legislation of the various States to whose authority that subject is normally committed. It would seem to be clear that the absence of a definition in the Act of Congress plainly indicates the purpose of Congress to leave the determination of that question to the state law. But it is urged that as next of kin was a term well known at common law, it is to be presumed that the words were used as having their common law significance and therefore as excluding all persons not included in the term under the common law, meaning of course the law of England as it existed at the time of the separation from the mother country. 240 U. S. 493.

See LEGACY; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; KIN; KINDRED; RELATIONS.

NEXUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. The transfer of the ownership of a thing, or the transfer of a thing to a creditor as a security.

In one sense nexum includes mancipium; in another sense, mancipium and nexum are opposed, in the same way as sale and mortgage or pledge are opposed. The formal part of both transactions consisted in a transfer per aes et libram. The person who became nexus by the effect of a nexum placed himself in a servile condition, not becoming a slave, his ingenitus being only in suspense, and was said nexus inire. The phrases nexi datio, nexi liberatio, respectively express the contracting and the release from the obligation.

The Roman law as to the payment of borrowed money was very strict. A curious passage of Gellius (lar. 1) gives us the ancient mode of proceeding in the case of debt, as fixed by the Twelve Tables. If the debtor admitted the debt, or had been condemned in the amount of the debt by a judex, he had thirty days allowed him for payment. At the expiration of this time he was liable to the creditor, and ultimately to be assigned over to the creditor (addictus) by the sentence of the praetor. The creditor was required to keep him for sixty days in chains, during which time he publicly exposed the debtor on three nundinae, and proclaimed the amount of his debt. If no person released the prisoner by paying the debt, the creditor might sell him as a slave or put him to death. If there were several creditors, the letter of the law allowed them to cut the debtor in pieces and take their share of his body in proportion to their debt. Gellius says that there was no instance of a creditor ever having adopted this extreme mode of satisfying his debt. But the creditor might treat the debtor, who was addictus, as a slave, and compel him to work out his debt; and the treatment was often very severe. In this passage Gellius does not speak of nexi, but only of addicti, which is sometimes alleged as evidence of the identity of nexi and addicti, but it proves no such identity. If a nexus is what he is here supposed to be, the laws of the Twelve Tables could not apply; for when a man became nexus with respect to one creditor, he could not become nexus to another; and if he became nexus to several at once, in this case the creditors must abide by their contract in taking a joint security. This law of the Twelve Tables only applied to the case of a debtor being assigned over by sentence to several creditors, and it provided for a settlement of their conflicting claims. The precise condition of a nexus has, however, been a subject of much discussion among scholars. See Smith, Dict. Rom. & Gr. Antiq.; MANCIPIUM.

NICARAGUA. A republic of Central America. The president is elected for four years. The Senate of eighteen members is elected for six years and the House of Representatives of twenty-one members is elected for four years.

By a treaty of January 15, 1898, it was provided that Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, and San Salvador should constitute one republic in respect of their relations with foreign countries, to be called the Greater Republic of Central America. The treaty was to be ratified by the several republics. It has been ratified by Honduras, Nicaragua, and San Salvador, which are now known as states of the Greater Republic.

NICHILLS or NIHILS. Debts due to the exchequer which the sheriff could not levy, and as to which he returned nil. These sums were transcribed once a year by the clerk of the nichills, and sent to the treasurer's remembrancer's office, whence process was issued to recover the "nichill" debts. Both of these offices were abolished in 1833; Manning's Exch. Fr. 321; Moz. & W.

NICKNAME. A short name; one nicked or cut off for the sake of brevity, without conveying any idea of opprobrium and frequently evincing the strongest affection or the most perfect familiarity. Bush, Eq. 74.

When a nickname is used, evidence will be received as to the true name. Such a name is but an alias for the true name. Anderson; 55 Vt. 313.

NIDERLING. A vile, base person or sluggish; chicken-hearted. Spelm. Sometimes Nidering and Nothing. Toml. Dic.

NIECE. The daughter of a brother or sister. Ambl. 514; 1 Jac. 207. See NEPHEW; LEGACY.

NIEFE. See NEIF.

NIENT COMPRISE (Law Fr. not included). An exception taken to a petition because the thing desired is not contained in that deed or proceeding whereon the petition is founded. Toml. Law Dict.

NIENT CULPABLE (Law Fr. not guilty). The name of a plea used to deny any charge of a criminal nature, or in an action for a tort.

NIENT DEDIRE (Law Fr. to say nothing). Words used to signify that judgment be rendered against a party because he does not deny the cause of action: i. e. by default.

When a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county where the venue is laid, the practice in the English courts is, on an affidavit of the circumstances, to change it, in transitory actions; or, in local actions, they will give leave to enter a suggestion on the roll, with a nient dedire, in order to have the trial in another county. 1 Tidd, Pr. 655.

NIENT LE FAIT (Law Fr.). In Pleading. The same as non est factum, a plea by which the defendant asserts that the deed declared upon is not his deed.

NIENT SEIST. In Old Pleading. Not seised. The general plea in a writ of annuity. Crabb, Eng. L. 424.

NIGHT. That space of time during which the sun is below the horizon of the earth, except that short space which precedes its rising and follows its setting, during which by its light the countenance of a man may be discerned. It is night when there is daylight, crepusculum or diluiculum, enough left or begun to discern a man's face withal. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 550; 4 Bla. Com. 224; Bac. Abr. Burglary (D); 2 Russ. Cr. 32. See 47 Conn. 182; 78 Ill. 295.

The common-law rule has been modified by statute in some of the states, and by the stat. 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, the night, for purposes of poaching, was held to begin one hour after sunset, and end one hour before sunrise. By the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, the night, during which a burglary may be committed, is deemed to commence at 9 P. M., and end at 6 A. M.; 4 Steph. Com. 105. But see 88 Wis. 163, where it was held that such an instruction is erroneous, as it is day when there is daylight enough by which to discern a person's face.

In the time of the English Saxons and even till Henry I., time was computed by nights: as fortnight for two weeks.

NIGHT WALKERS. Persons who sleep by day and walk by night; 5 Edw. III. c. 14; that is, persons of suspicious appearance and demeanor, who walk by night. In many of the states there are statutes against it; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 501, n. See 45 N. H. 543.

Watchmen may undoubtedly arrest them; and it is said that private persons may also do so; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 120. But see 3 Taunt. 14; Hamm. N. P. 135.

NIHIL CAPIAT PER BREVE (Lat. that he take nothing by his writ). In Practice. The form of judgment against the plaintiff in an action, either in bar or in abatement. When the plaintiff has commenced his proceedings by bill, the judgment is nil capiat per billam. Co. Litt. 363.

NIHIL DICIT (Lat. he says nothing). The name of the judgment rendered against a defendant who fails to put in a plea or answer to the plaintiff's declaration by the day assigned. In such a case, judgment is given against the defendant of course, as he says nothing why it should not. See 15 Viner, Abr. 556; Dane, Abr. Index.

NIHIL EST (Lat. there is nothing). A form of return made by a sheriff where he has been unable to serve the writ. "Although non est inventus is the more frequent return in such case, yet it is by no means so full an answer to the command of the writ as is the return of nil. That amounts to an averment that the defendant has nothing in the bailiwick; no dwelling-house, no family, no residence; and no personal presence to enable the officer to make the service required by the act of assembly. It is, therefore, a full answer to the exigency of the writ." 33 Pa. 139.

NIHIL HABET (Lat. he has nothing). The name of a return made by a sheriff, marshal, or other proper officer, to a scire facias or other writ, when he has not been able to serve it on the defendant. 5 Whart. 367.

Two returns of nil in proceedings in rem, in general, equivalent to a service; Yelv. 112; 1 Cow. 70; 1 Law Rep. N. C. 491; 4 Blackf. 188; 5 S. & R. 211; 24 Pa. 491; 71 id. 81.

NIHILS. See NICHILLS.

NIL DEBET (Lat. he owes nothing). In Pleading. The general issue in debt on simple contract. Gould. Pl. 284. It is in the following form: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he does not owe the said sum of money above demanded, or any part thereof, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." When, in debt on specialty, the deed is the only inducement to the action, the general issue is nil debet. Steph. Pl. 174, n.; 8 Johns. 83. In English practice, by rule 11, Trinity Term, 1853, the plea of nil debet was abolished; 2 Chitty, Pl. 275.

NIL HABUIT IN TENEMENTIS. (Lat.). In Pleading. A plea by which the defendant, who is sued by his landlord in debt for rent upon a lease, but by deed indented, denies his landlord's title to the premises, alleging that he has no interest in the tenements. 2 Lilly, Abr. 214; 12 Viner, Abr. 184.

NINETEENTH AMENDMENT. See CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

NISI PRIUS (Lat. unless before). In Practice. For the purpose of holding trials by jury. Important words in the writ (venire) directing the sheriff to summon jurors for the trial of causes depending in the superior courts of law in England, which have come to be adopted, both in England and the United States, to denote those courts or terms of court held for the trial of civil causes with the presence and aid of a jury.

The origin of the use of the term is to be traced to a period anterior to the institution of the commission of nisi prius in its more modern form. By Magna Charta it was provided that the common pleas should be held in one place, and should not follow the person of the king; and by another clause, that assizes of novel disseisin and of mort d'ancestor, which were the two commonest forms of actions to recover land, should be held in the various counties before the justices in eyre. A practice obtained very early, therefore, in the trial of trifling causes, to continue the cause in the superior court from term to term, provided the justices in eyre did not sooner (nisi prius iudicariis) come into the county where the cause of action arose, in which case they had jurisdiction when they so came. Bracton, l. 8, c. 1, § 11. By the statute of nisi prius, 13 Edw. I. c. 30, enforced by 14 Edw. III. c. 16, justices of assize were empowered to try common issues in trespass and other suits, and return them, when tried, to the superior court, where judgment was given. The clause was then left out of the continuance and inserted in the venire, thus: "Precipimus tibi quod venire facias coram iudicariis nostris apud Westm. in Octavis Sancti Michaelis, nisi talis et talis, tali die et loco, ad partes illas venerint, duodecim," etc. (we command you that you cause to come before our justices at Westminster, on the octave of Saint Michael, unless such and such a one, on such a day and place, shall come to those parts, twelve, etc.) Under the provisions of 43 Edw. III. c. 11, the clause is omitted from the venire, and the jury is respited in the court above, while the sheriff summons them to appear before the justices, upon a habeas corpora iudicariis, or, in the king's bench, a distingas. See Sell. Fr. Introd. lxxv; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 116; 3 Sharr. Bl. Com. 352-354; 1 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 245, 382.

See, also, ASSIZE; COURT OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS; JURY.

NISI PRIUS ROLL. In Practice. The transcript of a case made from the record of the superior court in which the action is commenced, for use in the nisi prius court.

It includes a history of all the proceedings in the case, including the declaration, plea, replication, rejoinder, issue, etc. It must be presented in proper manner to the nisi prius court. When a verdict has been obtained and entered on this record, it becomes the postea, and is returned to the superior court.

Under the Judicature Act of 1875, 1st Sched. Ord. xxxvi. r. 17, the party entering the action for trial is to deliver to the officer a copy of the pleadings for the use of the judge. Moz. & W.

NITHING. See NIDERLING.

NO AWARD. The name of a plea in an action on an award. 2 Ala. 520; 1 N. Chipm. 131; 3 Johns. 367.

NO BILL. Words frequently indorsed on a bill of indictment by the grand jury when they have not sufficient cause for finding a true bill. They are equivalent to Not found, or Ignoramus. 2 N. & M'C. 558.

NOBILE OFFICIUM. In Scotch Law. An equitable power of the court of sessions, by which it is able, to a certain extent, to give relief when none is possible at law. Stair. Inst. b. iv. tit. 3. § 1; Erskine, Inst. 1. 3. 22; Bell, Dict.

NOBILITY. An order of men, in several countries, to whom special privileges are granted. The constitution of the United States provides, Art. 1, § 10, that "no state shall grant any title of nobility," and § 9, that "no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of congress, accept of any title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state." It is singular that there should not have been a general prohibition against any citizen whatever, whether in private or public life, accepting any foreign title of nobility. An amendment for this purpose has been recommended by congress, but it has not been ratified by a sufficient number of states to make it a part of the constitution, probably from a growing sense that it is unnecessary; Rawle, Const. 120; Story, Const. §§ 1350-52; Fed. No. 84.

NOCHELL. See NOTCHELL.

NOCTES DE FIRMA. In Domesday book understood of entertainment of meat and drink for so many nights. Toml. Law Dict. See NIGHT.

NOCUMENTUM (Lat. harm, nuisance). In Old English Law. A thing done whereby another man is annoyed in his free lands or tenements. Also, the assize or writ lying for the same. Fitzh. N. B. 183; Old N. B. 108, 109. Manw. For. Laws, c. 17, divides nocumentum into generale, commune, speciale. Reg. Orig. 197, 199; Coke, Will. Case. Nocumentum was also divided into damnosum, for which no action lay, it being done by an irresponsible agent, and injuriousum et damnosum, for which there were several remedies. Bracton 221; Fleta, lib. 4, c. 26, § 2.

NOISE. See NUISANCE; INJUNCTION.

NOL. PROS. See NOLLE PROSEQUI.

NOLENS VOLENS (Lat.). Whether willing or unwilling.

NOLISSEMENT. In French Law. Affranchissement. Ordi. Mar. liv. 3, l. 1.

NOLLE (Lat.). To be unwilling; to will not to do a thing; to refuse to do a thing. See NOLLE PROSEQUI.

NOLLE PROSEQUI. In Practice. An entry made on the record, by which the prosecutor or plaintiff declares that he will proceed no further. See Tr. & H. Pr. 566.

A nolle prosequi may be entered either in a criminal or a civil case. In criminal cases, before a jury is impanelled to try an indictment, and also after conviction, the attorney-general has power to enter a nolle prosequi without the consent of the defendant; but after a jury is impanelled a nolle prosequi cannot be entered without the consent of the defendant: 17 Pick. 395; 12 Vt. 93; 3 Hawks 613; 7 Humphr. 152; 1 Rail. 151; 9 Ga. 308. See 103 Mass. 487; 49 N. H. 155. It is for the prosecuting officer to enter a nol. pros. in his discretion: 3 Hawks 613; but in some states leave must be obtained of the court: 1 Hill N. Y. 377; 1 Va. Cas. 139; 12 Vt. 93; 7 Smith, Pa. Laws 227.

It may be entered as to one of several defendants: 11 East 307.

The effect of a nolle prosequi, when obtained, is to put the defendant without day; but it does not operate as an acquittal; for he may be afterwards reindicted, and, it is said, even upon the same indictment fresh process may be awarded: 6 Mod. 261; Com. Dig. Indictment (K); 2 Mass. 172; 4 Cush. 235; 13 Ired. 256. See 3 Cox, C. C. 93; 7 Humphr. 159; 67 Ga. 478; 61 Mo. 173.

A nolle prosequi as to some of the counts in an indictment works no acquittal, but leaves the prosecution just as though such counts had never been inserted in the indictment: 152 U. S. 539.

In civil cases, a nolle prosequi is considered not to be of the nature of a retraxit or release, as was formerly supposed, but an agreement only not to proceed either against some of the defendants, or as to part of the suit. See 1 Wms. Saund. 207, note 2, and the authorities there cited; 1 Chitty, Pl. 546. A nolle prosequi is now held to be no bar to a future action for the same cause, except in those cases where, from the nature of the action, judgment and execution against one is a satisfaction of all the damages sustained by the plaintiff: 3 Term 511; 1 Wils. 96.

In civil cases, a nolle prosequi may be entered as to one of several counts; 7 Wend. 301; or to one of several defendants; 1 Pet. 80; or in the case of a joint contract, where one of two defendants pleads infancy, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to him and proceed against the other: 1 Pick. 500. See, generally, 1 Pet. 74; 2 Rawle 334; 1 Bibb 337; 3 Cow. 335; 374; 5 Gill & J. 469; 5 Wend. 224; 3 Watte 480.

The name of the person himself: e. g. nomen curiis addere. The name denoting the condition of a person or class: e. g. nomen liberorum, condition of children. Cause or reason (pro causa aut ratione): e. g. nominis culpe, by reason of fault. A mark or sign of anything, corporeal or incorporeal. Nomen supremum, i. e. God. Debt or obligation of debt. A debtor. See Calvinus, Lex.

In Scotch Law. Nomen debiti. Right to payment of a debt.

NOMEN COLLECTIVUM (Lat.). A word in the singular number which is to be understood in the plural in certain cases.

Misdemeanor, for example, is a word of this kind, and when in the singular may be taken as nomen collectivum and including several offences. 2 B. & Ad. 75. Heir, in the singular, sometimes includes all the heirs. Felony is not such a term.

NOMEN GENERALISSIMUM (Lat.). A most universal or comprehensive term: e. g. land. 2 Bla. Com. 19; 3 id. 172; Tayl. Law Gloss. So goods. 2 Will. Ex. 1014.

NOMINAL DAMAGES. In Practice. A trifling sum awarded where a breach of duty or an infraction of the plaintiff's right is shown, but no serious loss is proved to have been sustained.

Those awarded where, from the nature of the case, some injury has been done, the amount of which the proofs fail entirely to show; 5 Wash. 807.

Wherever any act injures another's right, and would be evidence in future in favor of a wrong-doer, an action may be sustained for an invasion of the right without proof of any specific injury: 1 Wms. Saund. 346 a; 28 N. H. 438; 13 Conn. 289; and wherever the breach of an agreement or the invasion of a right is established, the law infers some damage, and if none is shown will award a trifling sum: as, a penny, one cent, six and a quarter cents, etc.; 14 Ill. 301; 4 Denio 554; Sedgw. Dam. 47; Field, Damages § 860.

Thus, such damages may be awarded in actions for flowing lands; 2 Stor. 661; 1 Rawle 27; 12 Me. 183; 28 N. H. 438; injuries to commons; 2 East 154; violation of trade-marks; 4 B. & Ad. 410; and see 7 Cush. 322; 2 R. I. 566; infringement of patents; 1 Gall. 429, 483; 49 Fed. Rep. 747; diversion of water-courses; 5 B. & Ad. 1; 17 Conn. 288; 2 Ill. 544; 6 Ind. 39; 32 N. H. 90; but see 21 Ala. n. s. 309; 6 Ohio St. 187; trespass to lands; 24 Wend. 188; 2 Tex. 206; see 4 Jones, N. C. 139; neglect of official duties, in some cases; 5 Metc. Mass. 517; 1 Denio 548; 27 Vt. 563; 12 N. H. 341; breach of contracts; 2 Hill N. Y. 644; 6 Md. 274; 129 N. Y. 148; 61 Conn. 56; 62 Fed. Rep. 136; 42 Mo. App. 659; when substantial damages have not been sustained; 44 Ill. App. 358; and many other cases where the effect of the suit will be to determine a right: 12 Ad. & E. 488; 13 Conn. 361; 20 Mo. 603; 28 Me. 505; 19 Miss. 98; 2 La. Ann. 907; 89 Ga. 815; 51 Mo. App. 601; 8 Wash. 307; 45 La. Ann. 1401. And see, in explanation and limitation; 10 B. & C. 145; 1 Q. B. 638; 22 Vt. 231; 1 Dutch. 255; 14 B. Monr. 330; 5 Ind. 250; 6 Rich. 75.

NOMINAL PARTNER. One who allows his name to appear as a member of a firm, wherein he has no real interest. See PARTNER.

NOMINAL PLAINTIFF. One who is named as the plaintiff in an action, but who has no interest in it, having assigned the cause or right of action to another, for whose use it is brought.

In general, he cannot interfere with the rights of his assignee, nor will he be permitted to discontinue the action, or to meddle with it: 1 Wheat. 283; 7 Cra. 162; 1 Johns. Cas. 411; 1 Johns. 532, n.; Bisp. Eq. § 172; Greenl. Ev. § 173.

NOMINATE. See APPOINT.

NOMINATE CONTRACT. A contract distinguished by a particular name, the use of which name determines the rights of all the parties to the contract: as, purchase and sale, hiring, partnership, loan for use, deposit and the like. The law thus supersedes the necessity for special stipulations, and creates an obligation in the one party to perform, and a right in the other to demand, whatever is necessary to the explication of that contract. In Roman law there were twelve nominate contracts, with a particular action for each. Bell, Dict. Nominatæ and Innominatæ; Mackeldey, Civ. Law §§ 395, 408; Dig. 2, 14, 7, 1.

NOMINATION (from Lat. nominare, to name). An appointment: as, I nominate A B executor of this my last will.

A proposal or naming. The word nominate is used in this sense in the constitution of the United States, art. 2, s. 2, § 2: the president "shall nominate, and by and with the consent of the senate shall appoint, ambassadors," etc.

In an agreement for reference, a provision that each party shall nominate a referee means not only naming him, but also the communication of the nomination to the other party. 17 L. J. Q. B. 2; 11 Q. B. 7.

As to nominations under modern ballot laws, see ELECTION.

NOMINE PENÆ (Lat. in the nature of a penalty). In Civil Law. A condition annexed to heirship by the will of the deceased person. Domat, Civ. Law; Hallifax, Anal.

At Common Law. A penalty fixed by covenant in a lease for non-performance of its conditions. 2 Lilly, Abr. 221.

It is usually a gross sum of money, though it may be anything else, appointed to be paid by the tenant to the reversioner, if the duties are in arrear, in addition to the duties themselves. Hamm, N. P. 411.

To entitle himself to the nomine penæ, the landlord must make a demand of the rent on the very day, as in the case of a re-entry: 1 Saund. 287 b, note; 7 Co. 28 b; Co. Litt. 202 a; 7 Term 117. A distress cannot be taken for a nomine penæ unless a special power to distress be annexed to it by deed; 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2451. See Bac. Abr. Rent (K 4); Woodf. Landl. & T. 253; Dane, Abr. Index.

NOMINEE. One who has been named or proposed for an office.

NOMOCANON. A body of canon law with the addition of imperial laws bearing upon ecclesiastical matters: also a collection of the canons of the ancient church and fathers without regard to the imperial constitutions.

The first nomocanon was made by Johannes Scholasticus in 554. Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, in 883, compiled another nomocanon, or collation of the civil laws with the canons; this is the most celebrated. Balamon wrote a commentary upon it in 1180. R. & L. Dict.; Ency. Lond.

NON (Lat.). Not. The common particle of negation.

NON-ABILITY. Inability; an exception against a person. Fitz. Nat. Brev. 35, 65.

NON ACCEPTAVIT (Lat. he did not accept). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action of assumpsit brought against the drawee of a bill of exchange upon a supposed acceptance by him. See 4 M. & G. 561.

NON-ACCESS. The non-existence of sexual intercourse between husband and wife is generally expressed by the words non-access of the husband to the wife; which expressions, in a case of bastardy, are understood to mean the same thing. 2 Stark, Ev. 218, n. See ACCESS.

NON-AGE. By this term is understood that period of life from birth till the arrival at twenty-one years. In another sense it means under the proper age to be of ability to do a particular thing: as, when non-age is applied to one under the age of fourteen, who is unable to marry. See AGE.

NON-APPARENT OR NON-CONTINUOUS EASEMENTS. Discontinuous easements. Such that have no means specially constructed or appropriated to their enjoyment, and that are enjoyed at intervals, leaving between these intervals no visible sign of their existence; such as a right of way, or right of drawing a seine upon the shore. One to the enjoyment of which the act of the party is essential, and of this class is a right of way. (L. R. 1 Q. B. 156.) The continuous and non-continuous easement may both be granted and annexed to the same estate, and upon the unity of title they would both cease to exist as easements. Upon the severance of the estate the continuous would revert and pass by the conveyance, but the non-continuous would not revert or pass but by a new creation. This distinction, and this result, is recognized by all the authorities on the subject. (9 R. 1. 564.) A non-continuous easement is one whose enjoyment depends upon an actual interference of man at each time of its enjoyment; as the personal action of walking or driving over a way. (4 B. 6 S. 258.) 1 Thomp. Real Property 468, 469. See CONTINUOUS EASEMENT; EASEMENT.

NON ASSUMPSIT (Lat. he did not undertake). In Pleading. The general issue in an action of assumpsit. Andr. Steph. Pl. 231.

Its form is, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he did not undertake or promise, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this he puts himself upon the country."

Under this plea almost every matter may be given in evidence, on the ground, it is said, that as the action is founded on the contract, and the injury is the non-performance of it, evidence which disaffirms the obligation of the contract, at the time when the action was commenced, goes to the gist of the action. Salk. 279; 2 Stra. 738; 1 B. & P. 481. See 12 Vin. Abr. 159; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 G) 1.

NON ASSUMPSIT INFRA SEX ANNOS (Lat. he has not undertaken within six years). In Pleading. The plea by which, when pleadings were in Latin, the defendant alleged that the obligation was not undertaken and the right of action had not accrued within six years, the period of limitation of the right to bring suit. See LIMITATION. It is still in use.

NON BIS IN IDEM. In Civil Law. A phrase which signifies that no one shall be twice tried for the same offence: that is, that when a party accused has been once tried by a tribunal in the last resort, and either convicted or acquitted, he shall not again be tried. Code 9. 2. 9. 11; Merlin, Repert. See JEOPARDY.

NON CEPIT MODO ET FORMA (Lat. he did not take in manner and form). In Pleading. The plea which raises the general issue in an action of replevin; or rather which involves the principal part of the declaration, for, properly speaking, there is no general issue in replevin; Morris, Repl. 142.

Its form is, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he did not take the said cattle (or, goods and chattels, according to the subject of the action) in the said declaration mentioned, or any of them, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country."

It denies the taking the things and having them in the place specified in the declaration, both of which are material in this action. Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. 239, n.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 490.

NON-CLAIM. An omission or neglect by one entitled to make a demand within the time limited by law: as, when a continual claim ought to be made, a neglect to make such claim within a year and a day.

NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICER. A subordinate officer who holds his rank not by commission from the executive authority of a state or nation, but by appointment by a superior officer.

NON COMPOS MENTIS (Lat. not of sound mind, memory, or understanding). A generic term, including all the species of madness, whether it arise from idiocy, sickness, lunacy, or drunkenness. Co. Litt. 247; 4 Co. 124; 4 Comyns, Dig. 613; 5 id. 186; Shelf. Lun. 1. See INSANITY, and titles there referred to.

NON CONCESSIT (Lat. he did not grant). In English Law. The name of a plea by which the defendant denies that the crown granted to the plaintiff by letters-patent the rights which he claims as a concession from the king: as, for example, when a plaintiff sues another for the infringement of his patent right, the defendant may deny that the crown has granted him such a right. It does not deny the grant of a patent, but of the patent as described in the plaintiff's declaration; 3 Burr. 1544; 6 Co. 15 b. Also a plea resorted to by a stranger to a deed, because estoppels do not hold with respect to strangers. It brought into issue the title of the grantor as well as the operation of the deed; Whart. Dict.

NON-CONFORMISTS. In English Law. A name given to certain dissenters from the rites and ceremonies of the church of England.

NON CONSTAT (Lat. it does not appear. It is not certain). Words frequently used, particularly in argument, to express dissatisfaction with the conclusions of the other party: as, it was moved in arrest of judgment that the declaration was not good, because non constat whether A B was seventeen years of age when the action was commenced. Swinb. pt. 4, § 22, p. 331.

NON CULPABILIS (Lat.). In Pleading. Not guilty. It is usually abbreviated non cul.; 16 Vin. Abr. 1.

NON DAMNIFICATUS (Lat. not injured). In Pleading. A plea in the nature of a plea of performance to an action of debt on a bond of indemnity, by which the defendant asserts that the plaintiff has received no damage. 1 B. & P. 640, n. a; 1 Saund. 116, n. 1; 2 id. 81; 14 Johns. 177; 10 Wheat. 396, 405; 3 Halst. 1.

NON DECIMANDO. See DE NON DECIMANDO.

NON DEDIT. In Pleading. The general issue in formendon. See NE DONA PAS.

NON DELIVERY. Neglect, failure, or refusal to deliver goods on the part of a carrier, vendor, etc. See COMMON CARRIER.

NON DEMISIT (Lat. he did not demise). In Pleading. A plea proper to be pleaded to an action of debt for rent, when the plaintiff declares on a parol lease. Gilb. Debt 436; Bull. N. P. 177; 1 Chitty, Pl. 477. A plea in bar, in replevin, to an avowry for arrears of rent, that the avowant did not demise. Morris, Repl. 179. It cannot be pleaded when the demise is stated to have been by indenture; 12 Vin. Abr. 178; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 W) 48.

NON DETINET (Lat. he does not detain). The general issue in an action of detinue. Its form is as follows: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he does not detain the said goods and chattels (or 'deeds and writings,' according to the subject of the action) in the said declaration specified: or any part thereof, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country." Andr. Steph. Pl. 231.

It puts in issue the detainer only: a justification must be pleaded specially; 8 Dowl. Pract. Cas. 347. It is a proper plea to an action of debt on a simple contract in the case of executors and administrators. 6 East 549; Bac. Abr. Pleas (I); 1 Chitty, Pl. 476. See DETINET.

NON EST FACTUM (Lat. is not his deed). In Pleading. A plea to an action of debt on a bond or other specialty.

Its form is, "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that the said supposed writing obligatory (or 'indenture,' or 'articles of agreement,' according to the subject of the action) is not his deed. And of this he puts himself upon the country." 6 Rand. 86; 1 Litt. 158.

It is a proper plea when the deed is the foundation of the action; 1 Wms. Saund. 38, note 3; 2 id. 187 a, note 2; 2 Ld. Raym. 1500; 11 Johns. 476; and cannot be proved as declared on; 4 East 585; on account of non-execution; 8 Term 317; or variance in the body of the instrument; 1 Campb. 70; 4 Maule & S. 470; 2 D. & R. 662. Under this plea the plaintiff may show that the deed was void ab initio; 2 Campb. 272; 12 Johns. 337; 10 S. & R. 25; see 2 Salk. 275; 6 Cra. 219; or became so after making and before suit; 5 Co. 119 b; 11 id. 27. See 1 Chitty, Pl. 417, n.

In covenant, the defendant may, under this plea, avail himself of a mis-statement or omission of a qualifying covenant; 2 Stra. 1146; 9 East 188; 1 Campb. 70; or omission of a condition precedent; 11 East 639; 7 D. & R. 249. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. xix. rr. 20, 23.

The sheriff's return to a writ requiring him to arrest the person of the defendant, which signifies that he is not to be found within his jurisdiction. The return is usually abbreviated N. E. I. Chitty, Pr. The English form "not found" is also commonly used. See FOUND.

NON-FEASANCE. The non-performance of some act which ought to be performed.

When a legislative act requires a person to do a thing, its non-feasance will subject the party to punishment; as, if a statute require the supervisors of the highways to repair such highways, the neglect to repair them may be punished. See 1 Russ. Cr. 48; MANDATUM.

NON FECIT (Lat. he did not make it). The name of a plea, for example in an action of assumpsit on a promissory note. 3 M. & G. 446. Rarely used.

NON FECIT VASTUM CONTRA PROHIBITIONEM (Lat. he did not commit waste against the prohibition). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action founded on a writ of estrepement, that the defendant did not commit waste contrary to the prohibition. 2 Bla. Com. 226, 227.

NON INFREGIT CONVENTIONEM (Lat. he has not broken the covenant). In Pleading. A plea in an action of covenant. This plea is not a general issue: it merely denies that the defendant has broken the covenants on which he is sued. It being in the negative, it cannot be used where the breach is also in the negative. Bacon, Abr. Covenant (L); 8 Lev. 19; 2 Taunt. 278; 1 Aik. 150; 4 Dall. 436; 7 Cow. 71.

NON-INTERCOURSE. The refusal of one state or nation to have commercial intercourse with another. See EMBARGO.

It remained in force till March 15, 1809, so far as related to all countries but France and Great Britain, and as to them, after the end of the next session of congress. On June 12, 1798, intercourse with France and her dependencies was forbidden by an act of congress. See EMBARGO; WAR.

NON INTROMITTENDO QUANDO BREVE DE PRECIPI IN CAPITIS SUBDOLE IMPETRATUR. A writ which used to be directed to the justices of the bench or in eyre, commanding them not to give one who had (under cover of entitling the king to land, etc., as holding of him in capite) deceitfully obtained the writ, the benefit of the same, but to put him to his writ of right if he thought fit to use it. Cowel.

S. 213; 5 Ill. 424; 24 Me. 119. See 64 N. H. 2. The objection may be taken by demurrer, if the defect appear on the face of the bill; 5 Ill. 424; 1 Des. 315; 8 Ga. 506; 4 Rand. 451; or by plea, if it do not appear; 9 Mo. 605. The objection may be avoided by waiver of rights as to the party omitted; 4 Wisc. 54; or a supplemental bill filed, in some cases; 4 Johns. Ch. 805. It will not cause dismissal of the bill in the first instance; 3 Cra. 189; 6 Conn. 421; 17 Ala. 270; 1 T. B. Monr. 189; 1 Dev. Eq. 354; 1 Hill S. In Law. See ABATEMENT; PARTIES.

In England, the Judicature Act of 1873, Ord. xvi., has made very full provisions as to the joinder of parties, and the consequences of misjoinder and non-joinder. All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative.

NON JURIDICUS. See DIES NON.

NON JURORS. In English Law. Persons who refuse to take the oaths, required by law, to support the government. See 1 Dall. 170.

NON LIQUET (Lat. it is not clear). In Civil Law. Words by which the judges (judices), in a Roman trial, were accustomed to free themselves from the necessity of deciding a cause when the rights of the parties were doubtful. On the tablets which were given to the judges wherewith to indicate their judgment, was written N. L.

NON MERCHANTIZANDO VICTUALIA. An ancient writ directed to justices of assize commanding them to inquire whether the officers of certain towns sold victuals in gross or by retail during the exercise of their office, contrary to a statute then in force, and to punish them accordingly. Cowel; Reg. Orig. 184.

NON MOLESTANDO. A writ which lay for him who was molested, contrary to the king's protection granted him. Cowel.

NON OBSTANTE. In English Law. These words, which literally signify notwithstanding, were used to express the act of the English king by which he dispensed with the law, that is, authorized its violation.

He would by his license or dispensation make an offence punishable which was malum in se; but in certain matters which were malum prohibitum he could, to certain persons and on special occasions, grant a non obstante. Vaugh. 380; Lev. 217; Sid. 6, 7; 13 Co. 18; Bacon, Abr. Prerogative (D 7); 2 Reeve, Eng. C. L. 8, p. 88. But the doctrine of non obstante, which set the prerogative above the laws, was demolished by the bill of rights at the revolution; 1 W. & M. Stat. 2, c. 2; 1 Bla. Com. 342; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 441.

NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO. Notwithstanding the verdict. See JUDGMENT.

Judgment non obstante veredicto, strictly and technically, is a judgment given for the plaintiff, on his motion, where the defendant had a verdict, but it appears from the record that, either from some matter growing out of the pleading, or because the fact found by the jury is immaterial, the defendant is not, in law, entitled to the judgment. In such cases where the common-law practice prevails, a writ of inquiry is awarded to assess the damages; 2 Tidd, Pr. 920. "The right method . . . is not to state the entry of judgment upon the verdict by rule, but to enter the verdict upon record, and then the judgment for the plaintiff non obstante veredicto." Id. For a statement of the nature and effect of such a judgment at common law, see JUDGMENT, sub-title Classification, 1, (3). As appears from the definition there given, this was a judgment for the plaintiff, and in many of the states, it has been uniformly held that judgment non obstante veredicto can only be given for a plaintiff; the remedy for a defendant is to have the judgment arrested; 2 Ohio St. 287; 2 Hill 86; 6 Rich. 208. A motion by a defendant for a judgment non obstante veredicto is never allowable; 10 Ia. 402; 15 N. H. 548; 4 Wend. 486; 89 Wis. 6; 65 Vt. 281; 17 R. 1, 206, 544; Steph. Pl. [98]; 1 Freem. Judg. § 7; 1 Black, Judg. § 16; unless the well-settled common-law rule has been relaxed by statute or decisions; 68 Fed. Rep. 144; 19 U. S. App. 24.

A motion for such judgment must be founded on the record alone; 8 Vt. 309; 63 id. 92; 2 Wend. 624; it cannot be rendered after a judgment upon a verdict has been entered; 14 Miss. 218; 12 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 628. It is allowed where a verdict has been found for the defendant on an insufficient plea in avoidance; 1 G. Green 184; 5 Pick. 187; that is, where the plea confesses the action and entirely fails to avoid it; 14 Ind. 115; 7 Blackf. 384; or if found true, is neither bar nor answer; 14 Ohio 204; or if an immaterial issue tendered by the plaintiff was found for the defendant and a replender was unnecessary to effect justice; 7 Mo. 473; or if on motion for a new trial it is clear that in no event could damages be recovered on the cause of action; 5 R. I. 419.

It has been said that in Pennsylvania, where a point of law is reserved at the trial, the jury is instructed to find for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant moves for judgment on the point reserved non obstante veredicto. See 2 Brewster, Prac. 1219. And, in some other states, the technical common-law rule that this form of judgment should not be given for the defendant, has not been observed; though it would seem that this change of practice is due, in some degree, to the confusion of this subject with judgment on special verdicts and points reserved, and to the fact that judgments are frequently entered under the name non obstante veredicto, which properly and technically would not be such if the common-law distinctions were carefully observed. Such judgment for defendant has been entered in an action for damages where a plea of contributory negligence was not controverted; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 924; or where plaintiff's evidence is a mere scintilla; 156 Pa.

156; or where special findings in plaintiff's favor were set aside as against undisputed evidence, and defendant moved for judgment on the remaining findings and undisputed evidence; 81 Wis. 447. But such motion by defendant will not be granted where the defence is a general denial; 115 N. C. 402; or where the pleadings and evidence raise questions of fact proper for a jury; 87 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 730; or where the evidence supports a verdict for plaintiff, but the undisputed facts show the transaction to be within the statute of frauds; 25 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 736. A reservation of "the question whether there is any evidence in this case, to be submitted to the jury, on which plaintiff is entitled to recover," does not present a "point reserved" to authorize judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto; 170 Pa. 346; 184 id. 73; nor can such judgment be rendered for plaintiff where verdict is for defendant, subject to the question reserved, whether, notwithstanding the findings, plaintiff was not entitled to recover; 151 id. 415.

A motion for such judgment is properly denied, after verdict upon an issue distinctly raised by the answer and submitted to the jury without objection; 112 N. C. 402; or where the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict; 15 Ind. App. 188; or where there is a general finding for the party against whom the motion is made; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 1060; or where, after reserving a point on certain facts, other evidence is submitted to the jury, and it is uncertain on which evidence the jury found; 110 Pa. 1.

It is not sufficient that the verdict was contrary to the weight of the evidence; 43 Neb. 712; and the judgment can be entered only when the moving party is entitled to it upon the pleadings of the party who had the verdict; 43 Neb. 132.

In Ohio, judgment against a general verdict cannot be entered unless all the facts necessary to support such judgment are expressly found; 66 Fed. Rep. 471. In Indiana, a judgment non obstante will not be granted unless there is an irreconcilable conflict between the general verdict and the answer to the interrogatories; 5 Ind. App. 204; 6 id. 52, 340, 646; 132 Ind. 278. When the special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former controls the latter, and the court may give judgment accordingly; 51 Kan. 781. In Oregon, there is a statutory provision authorizing judgment for the other party where the verdict does not correspond with pleadings, and it is held that that right is not impaired by failing to move for judgment before verdict; 21 Ore. 495. In Minnesota, such judgment can be given only to a party who, after the testimony, moved to direct a verdict in his favor; 64 Minn. 136.

In many states there are statutes on the subject which must be considered in connection with the decisions.

NON OMITTAS (Lat. more fully, non omittas propter libertatem, do not omit on account of the liberty or franchise). In Practice. A writ which lies when the sheriff returns on a writ to him directed, that he hath sent to the bailiff of such a franchise, which hath return of writs, and he hath not served the writ; then the plaintiff shall have this writ directed to the sheriff, that he omit not on account of any franchise, but himself enter into the franchise and execute the king's writ.

This clause is now usually inserted in all processes addressed to sheriffs. Wharton, Lex., 9th ed.; 2 Will. IV. c. 39; 3 Chitty, Stat. 494; 3 Chitty, Fr. 180, 310.

NON-PLEVIN. In Old English Law. A neglect to replevin land taken into the hands of the king upon default, within fifteen days, by which seisin was lost, as by default. Hough. de Magn. Ch. c. 8. By 9 Edw. III. c. 2, no man shall lose his land by non-plevin.

NON PONENDIS IN ASSISSIS ET JURATIS. A writ which lay for persons who are summoned to attend the assizes or to sit on a jury and wish to be freed and discharged from the same. Reg. Orig. 100.

NON PROCEDENDO AD ASSISAM REGE INCONSULTO. A writ to put a stop to the trial of a cause appertaining unto one who is in the king's service, etc., until the king's pleasure respecting the same be known. Cowel.

NON PROS. An abbreviation of non prosequitur, he does not pursue. Where the plaintiff, at any stage of the proceedings, fails to prosecute his action, or any part of it, in due time, the defendant enters non prosequitur, and signs final judgment, and obtains costs against the plaintiff, who is said to be non pro'sd. 2 Archb. Pr., Chitty ed. 1409; 3 Bla. Com. 286; 3 Chitty, Pr. 10; Caines, Pr. 102. The name non pros. is applied to the judgment so rendered against the plaintiff; 1 Sell. Pr.; Steph. Pl. 195.

In modern English practice under the Jud. Act, 1875, a plaintiff, failing to deliver a statement of his claim in due time, may have his action dismissed for want of prosecution. And the same course may be taken with a plaintiff who fails to comply with an order to answer interrogatories; besides that the party so making default renders himself liable to "attachment." If the plaintiff fail in due time to give "notice of trial," the defendant may do so for him; Moz. & W.

NON-RESIDENCE. In Ecclesiastical Law. The absence of spiritual persons from their benefices.

NON-RESIDENT. Not residing in the jurisdiction. Service of process on non-resident defendants is void, excepting cases which proceed in rem, such as proceedings in admiralty or by foreign attachment, and the like, or where the property in litigation is within the jurisdiction of the court.
